and persuaded me to kill time by playing board games with her in the evening. After sitting together till the first watch, the two of us would lie down foot-to-foot on the same k'ang and go to sleep together. My brother, that's what my feelings were for you. But I don't know what your feelings were for me."

"You crazy oily mouth!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Although there are those others in the household, who is not aware that I prefer to spend my time with you?"

"That's enough of that," the woman responded. "Who do you think you're kidding? You tend to:

Wolf down the rice in your bowl,
While keeping an eye on the pot.

It's the same way you carried on with that wife of Lai-wang's:

Mixing oil in with the honey, while ignoring me completely. And afterwards, when Li P'ing-erh produced a son, you treated me just like an angry fighting cock. Now that the two of them have gone to their fates, whatever they may be, I'm the only one left at your disposal. You're just like:

A willow catkin in the wind,⁷⁰

Bobbing up and bobbing down.⁷¹

And now you've started to bestow your favor on Ju-i, that lousy splay-legged creature. No matter how you look at it, she's only a wet nurse, and since she manifestly already has a husband of her own, she's the wife of a flesh-and-blood person. If you insist on taking her for yourself, in the future, her husband is likely to:

Come grazing his sheep in front of your gate,

The better to befoul it with their droppings.

Since you are:

An incumbent, office-holding official, if word of this should get out, it will hardly redound to your credit. Just look at the way that lousy whore carried on the other day while you were away. In the course of a dispute with Ch'un-mei over a laundry bat, the two of them got into:

A vituperative altercation,

and she wouldn't allow me to get a word in edgewise."

"My child," admonished Hsi-men Ch'ing. "No matter how you look at it, she's only a servant. How could she have the:

Seven heads and eight galls,

to challenge you?

If you raise your hand,

She will be able to get by;

If you lower your hand,

She'll be unable to get by."

"Ai-ya!" the woman exclaimed. "You may say that I have the power to either raise my hand or prevent her from getting by, but after the death of Li P'ingerh, she took over her place in the nest. I've heard tell that you said to her, 'If you do your best to cater to me, I'll turn over your mistress's property to you.' Did you ever really say that to her?"

"Don't be so foolishly suspicious," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Since when did I say any such thing? If you are so magnanimous as to forgive her, I'll tell her to come kowtow to you and apologize tomorrow."

"There's no need for her to come and apologize to me," the woman said, "but I won't permit you to go on sleeping in her room."

"The only reason I sleep in her place," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is that I can't get over my feelings for Li P'ing-erh if I have to spend so much as a night or two away from her quarters. As for Ju-i, she's only there to keep vigil over her spirit tablet. Since when have I been indulging in any:

Illicit salt or illicit vinegar, with her."

"I don't believe those excuses of yours," declared the woman. "She's already been dead for more than a hundred days, so what need is there for anyone to keep vigil over her spirit tablet? She's not there to keep vigil over any spirit tablet. She's more like:

The watchman at a rice warehouse, who spends

The first half of the night ringing his bell,

And the second half, like a voyeuristic maid,

Listening to the sound of the pounding inside.

With these few words she managed to get under Hsi-men Ch'ing's skin, with the result that he embraced her by the neck and gave her a kiss, saying, "You crazy little whore! You're up to your usual tricks."

Thereupon, he had her turn over so he could:

Poke up the fire on the other side of the mountains, inserted his organ into her vagina, embraced her legs under the quilt, and proceeded to slam away at her with all his might until:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly,

causing the woman to cry out, "What an enormous thing!"

"Do you fear me, or not?" he demanded. "Will you dare to keep on trying to manage me in the future?"

"You crazy knave!" the woman exclaimed. "If there were no one to manage you, you would fly straight up to Heaven, I suppose. I'm well aware that you can't bring yourself to shake off that whore. In the future, however, you'd better get my permission before going over to her place. And if she asks you for anything, you'd better tell me about it, rather than giving it to her surreptitiously. If you violate this compact, and I find out about it, just see whether I kick up a real rumpus about it, or not. I'll put my life up against that whore's any day; what's it to me? It's just like the situation when Li P'ing-erh first entered the household and she cast such a spell on you that the rest of us very nearly ended up being:

Relegated to the realm of the superfluous.

She's nothing but a good-for-nothing, rotten, overripe peach; and it's true, I guess, that:

Bean sprouts don't lend themselves to being neatly bundled.

But, right now, I've got the upper hand over you both."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this outburst, saying, "You little whore! You're a fine one to play the role of a moralist, enforcing the observance of ritual prescriptions."

Thereupon, the two of them:

Entranced by the clouds and intoxicated by the rain, continued to go at it until the third watch before falling asleep. Truly:

If there is an open window and a bird to seize the occasion;
It will hold spring in its mouth as it warbles upon a branch.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Bearing raindrops, shrouded in mist,
she is rarely to be seen; Beguiling in stance, she appears to be unable to support herself.
Throughout the night, she deliberately unloads her fragrant heart; Holding onto the east wind to prevent it from returning home.⁷²

The two of them:

Head to head and thigh over thigh, slept together until the morrow dawned, but the woman's lascivious feelings were still unsatisfied, and she proceeded to relentlessly manipulate Hsi-men Ch'ing's organ with her hand.

While she manipulated his chowrie handle, she exclaimed, "My own daddy! The one thing I want is to lie on top of you."

So saying, she prostrated herself on Hsi-men Ch'ing's body, proceeded to "dip the candle upside down," embraced him by the neck, and fell to kneading away at him. She directed Hsi-men Ch'ing to grasp her waist with both hands, as tightly as possible, while she lay on top of him, thrusting and retracting for all she was worth. As she rubbed against him while lying prostrate on top of his body, his organ finally penetrated her to the root, but the clasp prevented it from entering quite all the way.

The woman then said, "My own daddy! During the day tomorrow, I'll make you a band of white satin. If you will put some of that aphrodisiac powder the Indian monk gave you inside it, I'll attach two long ribbons to it, and then, when we're ready to go to bed, you can fasten the band around the root of your organ, and tie the two ribbons securely behind your back. Not only will it be warm, but it will allow you to insert your organ all the way. It will be an improvement over that silver clasp, which not only chafes your partner till it hurts, but also prevents us from achieving complete satisfaction."

"My child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you might as well do as you say. The aphrodisiac powder is in that porcelain container on the table. You can go ahead and apply it yourself."

"No matter what," the woman said, "be sure to come back here tonight so we can try it out. How would that be?"

Thereupon, the two of them proceeded to play with each other yet another time.

Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who came in and asked Ch'un-mei, "Has Father gotten up yet? His Honor An Ch'en has sent someone to deliver the joint contributions toward the cost of the forthcoming event. He has also brought two jugs of Chin-hua wine, and four bonsai."

"Father isn't up yet," said Ch'un-mei. "Tell him he'll have to wait a while."

"It's not as though he's on a short mission," said Tai-an. "He still has to report back to the customs station at the port on the New Canal."

Who could have anticipated that Hsi-men Ch'ing overheard this exchange from the interior of the room and proceeded to question Tai-an through the window. On opening the accompanying document when it had been brought inside, he found that it read as follows:

Four sealed joint contributions are hereby respectfully offered, making a total of eight taels in all. Only for Ts'ai Hsiu do you need to provide an individual table setting. For the rest, communal seating will suffice. I trust that your servants will be fastidious in their preparations, which would be a more than ample demonstration of your consideration. In addition, I am providing four seasonally appropriate bonsai for your delectation, along with two jugs of Chekiang wine, in order to make a paltry contribution toward the provisions required for the occasion. I hope that you will deign to accept them with a smile. That would be fortunate indeed.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished perusing the document, he got up and, without bothering to comb his hair, donned a felt cap, put on a loosely cut woolen robe, and went out to the reception hall, where he ordered the messenger from His Honor An Ch'en into his presence, and the latter handed over the joint contributions. Upon observing that the additional gifts consisted of four bonsai, one of red plum, one of white plum, one of jasmine, and one of purple magnolia, along with two jugs of southern wine, Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted.

He promptly arranged for them to be put away, wrote a card in reply, rewarded the messenger with five mace of silver, and asked him, "At what time will the gentlemen be arriving tomorrow, and will they expect actors to be engaged for the occasion, or not?"

"They will probably be arriving early," replied the messenger. "As for the actors, you should engage those from Hai-yen, rather than local ones."

The messenger was then sent on his way.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his attendants to take the miniature flowering plants and put them in his studio in the Hidden Spring Grotto. He also engaged a mason to erect two heated k'angs there, with a firebox outside the retaining wall, so that the fumes from the burning charcoal would not affect the plants, and assigned Ch'un-hung and Lai-an the task of seeing that they were regularly watered, without fail. Hsi-men Ch'ing then sent Tai-an off to engage the services of the actors and weighed out an appropriate amount of silver for Lai-an so that he could purchase the necessary provisions. That day was also the eve of Meng Yü-lou's birthday, so arrangements were made to hire some boy musicians from the licensed quarter to play and sing in celebration of the occasion that evening. Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment.

To resume our story, while still at home, Ying Po-chüeh took five blank calling cards, had Ying Pao put them in a box, and set out for the house across the street from Hsi-men Ch'ing's place, in order to ask Licentiate Wen to inscribe them with invitations to the five ladies of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, asking them to come to his home for the full-month celebration of the birth of his son on the twenty-eighth.

He had just gone out the door and turned onto the main street when someone behind him called out in a loud voice, "Master Two, please come back here for a minute."

Ying Po-chüeh turned around to look back and, seeing that it was Li Ming, came to a standstill.

Li Ming walked up to him and asked, "Master Two, where are you going?"

"I'm on my way to Licentiate Wen's place," responded Ying Po-chüeh. "I've got something to ask of him."

"If you'll just return home for a minute," said Li Ming, "I've got something to say to you."

Noticing that he had an idler following closely behind him who was carrying a gift box, Ying Po-chüeh determined that he might do well to invite him back into the parlor of his residence. Upon arriving there, Li Ming promptly kowtowed to him and, getting up, directed that the gift box be brought inside and put down. When it was opened, it turned out to contain two roast ducks and two jars of vintage wine.

"Having nothing better to offer," said Li Ming, "these paltry gifts are merely an expression of my filial regard, for you to give away to someone if you like. I have made bold to come here, Master Two, in order to make a request of you."

So saying, he knelt down on the floor and refused to get up.

Ying Po-chüeh pulled him to his feet with one hand, saying, "You silly child! If you have something to say, just say it to me. What need was there for you to purchase any gifts for me?"

"Ever since I was a youngster," said Li Ming, "I have served in Father's household for lo these many years. But now, Father is patronizing others and is no longer calling upon me. No doubt, it is on account of that affair of Li Kuei-chieh's. But the two of us:

Maintain independent establishments, and the members of my household do not even know what she is up to. Since Father is upset with her, he is giving me a hard time, and as a result, I have:

Suffered injustice and harbor resentment, but I have no place to seek redress. That is why I have sought you out, Master Two. If you happen to visit his residence and run into Father, perhaps you could put in a good word on my behalf and explain the situation to him. Kueichieh may well be guilty of:

Some kind of misdeed or indiscretion, but that has nothing to do with me. The mere fact that Father has chosen to be irritated with me is neither here nor there, but my colleagues have also taken to treating me disdainfully."

"Do you mean to say that you actually haven't been performing in his household for all this time?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"I haven't been called upon to do so," replied Li Ming.

"No wonder, then," said Ying Po-chüeh, "that the other day, after your Father returned from the Eastern Capital, on the occasion when he hosted a welcoming party for Ho Yung-shou, to which I, along with his brother-in-law Wu K'ai and Licentiate Wen, were invited, he only engaged the services of Wu Hui, Cheng Ch'un, Cheng Feng, and Tso Shun. When I wondered why I didn't see you there and asked him about it, he said, 'If he doesn't show up, do you expect me to send for him?' You silly child! You would do well to bestir yourself. Who have you got to blame but yourself?"

"If someone from Father's household doesn't send for me," said Li Ming, "how can I simply go there on my own? The other day, he called on those four to perform for him, and since today is the eve of the Third Lady's birthday, early this morning, he sent Tai-an into the quarter to engage the services of another two musicians for the occasion. Tomorrow, Father is putting on another party, for which he has once again engaged the services of those four. But I am being left out in the cold. How could I not be upset about it? My only hope, Master Two, is that you will put in a word on my behalf, and if you are successful, I will come and kowtow to you tomorrow."

"I will not fail to speak up for you," said Ying Po-chüeh. "All this while, I don't know how many times I've intervened to help people out with their problems. How could I fail to speak up on your behalf about such a paltry matter as that you're asking me about? Do as I say, and take these gifts of yours back. What would I want with that hard-earned money of yours, anyway? Just come along with me now, and I'll find a way of gently approaching your Father on the subject."

"Master Two," objected Li Ming, "if you refuse to accept these gifts, I won't presume to accompany you. Though they may not mean much to you, they are merely intended to be:

A token of my gratitude."

So saying, with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude,

he implored his assistance again and again.

Ying Po-chüeh finally agreed to accept the gifts and came up with a gratuity of thirty candareens for the man who had carried the box before sending him on his way.

"Permit me to leave the box here at your place for the time being," said Li Ming. "I'll come back and get it after visiting the mansion."

Thereupon, he accompanied Ying Po-chüeh out the gate as they wended their way:

Rounding bends and turning corners,
to the house across the street from Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.

Upon reaching the gate to the studio therein, and rapping the door knocker, Ying Po-chüeh inquired, "Is the venerable gentleman Wen Pi-ku at home?"

Licentiate Wen, who was engaged at the time in writing a note under the studio window, promptly responded, "Please come in and have a seat."

Hua-t'ung opened the door for them, and Ying Po-chüeh took a seat in the well-lighted parlor within. At the upper end of the room four Tung-p'o chairs⁷³ were formally arrayed to either side of a hanging scroll depicting the philosopher Chuang-tzu regretting the evanescence of time. On the two side walls were displayed ink rubbings of the parallel statements:

The aroma of the plum blossoms in the vase invades the brush and inkstone;

The coldness of the snow outside the window permeates the zither and books.

The door of the room was protected by a cloth portiere.

When Licentiate Wen saw that they had arrived, he came out from inside to greet them and, after exchanging the customary amenities and asking them to be seated, said, "Venerable sir, you are up early today. What are you about?"

"I make so bold," said Ying Po-chüeh, "as to avail myself of your great literary talent to compose a few invitations for me. It so happens that the full-month celebration of the birth of my son falls on the twenty-eighth of the month, and I would like to invite the ladies of the Hsi-men household to come visit for the event."

"Where are the cards?" said Licentiate Wen. "Give them to me and your pupil will write them out for you."

Ying Po-chüeh told Ying Pao to take out the five cards and hand them over, after which, Licentiate Wen took them into his inner room and ground some new ink for the purpose.

He had only finished writing two of them when whom should they see but Ch'i-t'ung, who came inside in a state of obvious agitation and said, "Master Wen, write out another two cards in the First Lady's name. She also wants to invite Kinswoman Ch'iao from the eastern quarter, and Sister-in-law Wu. Have the two cards that Ch'in-t'ung came for a while ago, addressed to Mrs. Han, the Third Lady's elder sister from outside the city gate, and her second brother's wife Mrs. Meng, been sent off yet, or not?"

"Your brother-in-law, Ch'en Ching-chi, took care of sending them off some time ago," responded Licentiate Wen.

"Master Wen," said Ch'i-t'ung, "after you have done writing out these two invitations, you are requested to compose four more, for the wife of Pen the Fourth, the wife of Fu Ming, the wife of Han Tao-kuo, and the wife of Kan Jun. I'll have Lai-an come to pick them up."

After he had gone, when Lai-an came by to pick up the four additional invitations, Ying Po-chüeh asked him, "Is your Father at home, or has he gone to the yamen?"

"Father has not gone to the yamen today," said Lai-an. "He is in the reception hall, overseeing the reception of some presents sent by the household of his kinsman Ch'iao Hung. Master Two, you might as well go over there for a visit."

"As soon as these invitation cards have been written out I'll come over," responded Ying Po-chüeh.

"Last night," Licentiate Wen said, "the venerable gentleman arrived home rather late after attending a party at the Wang residence."

"Which Wang residence was that?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"It was the residence of the late Imperial Commissioner Wang," said Licentiate Wen.

The implications of this fact were not lost on Ying Po-chüeh.

It was sometime later, after Lai-an had waited for his cards and gone his way, before the remaining invitations for Ying Po-chüeh were completed, and he took Li Ming with him across the street. He found Hsi-men Ch'ing, with his hair still in disarray, supervising the reception of presents in the reception hall, and preparing the replies for them. The table settings he had ordered were arrayed to one side. When he saw Ying Po-chüeh come in, he greeted him with a bow and offered him a seat. A brazier was burning to heat the room.

Ying Po-chüeh thanked him for his hospitality the other day and then went on to ask, "Brother, who are these table settings provided for?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing explained that Secretary An Ch'en had shown up and asked him to host a party the following day for Ts'ai Hsiu, the prefect of Chiu-chiang.

"Will you be engaging the services of an acting troupe or boy musicians on that occasion?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"I have already hired a troupe of Hai-yen actors," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and have also engaged the services of four boy musicians to entertain the company.”

“Which four boy musicians might they be, Brother?” asked Ying Pochüeh.

“Wu Hui, Cheng Feng, Cheng Ch’un, and Tso Shun,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“Brother,” said Ying Po-chüeh, “why don’t you employ Li Ming?”

“He’s already flown to a higher branch,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “What interest would he have in a place like mine?”

“Brother, how can you say such a thing?” expostulated Ying Po-chüeh. “Only if you summon him would he presume to come. I also was unaware that you have been annoyed with him all this while. The two of them operate independently of each other, and the cause of your displeasure has nothing to do with him. He is hardly privy to the doings of Auntie Li the Third and her establishment. You ought not to do him the injustice of presuming such a thing. Early this morning, he showed up at my place, weeping and wailing, and said to me, ‘Quite aside from the fact that my elder sister is one of the ladies in Father’s household, I, too, have been accustomed to serve there for lo these many years. But now, he is employing others, and there is no longer any place there for me.’

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths,

he assured me again and again that he didn’t know a word about the goings on of Auntie Li the Third and her establishment. The fact that you have made him a target of your annoyance has made life very difficult for him. After all, for a person of such inferior status, what sort of standing does he possess? If you take it into your head to turn against him, how could he hope to withstand you?”

He then proceeded to summon Li Ming, saying, “Come over here and explain things to your Father in person. What are you keeping out of sight for? You’re acting like the proverbial:

Ugly daughter-in-law who is fearful of seeing her parents-in-law.”⁷⁴

Li Ming had moved closer and was standing by the latticework partition:

With lowered head and dragging feet,

Like a ghost trying to abide unseen,

as he observed the two of them discussing his case, without daring to utter a word.

Upon hearing Ying Po-chüeh call for him, he went inside, knelt stiff-leggedly down on the floor, and kowtowed, saying, “Father, you really ought to look more closely into what they’ve been up to over there. If I knew so much as a single word about it, I would deserve to be run over by a chariot, trampled by horses, subjected to judicial punishment, and put to death by dismemberment. The kindness you have shown me and my entire family all this while is:

As high as Heaven and as thick as Earth.”⁷⁵

Though:

My body should be pulverized and my bones shattered,

I could hardly hope to repay you. But now that you have chosen to show your displeasure toward me, I have been subjected to ridicule by the colleagues in my profession, and taken advantage of by them. Under the circumstances, where am I to turn in order to discover a patron?”

When he had finished speaking, he gave vent to loud sobs and cried out in pain as he knelt on the ground and refused to get up.

“That’s enough! That’s enough!” interjected Ying Po-chüeh from the sidelines. “Brother, you really ought to give him another chance. After all:

A great person does not deign to notice
the faults of petty persons.

Quite aside from the fact that he is not at fault, even if he had actually done something to offend you, his willingness to appeal to you in this way should lead you to make amends by forgiving him.”

“As for you,” he continued, addressing himself to Li Ming, “come over here. It has always been the case that:

If you don the black livery of a servant,
You must cling to even the blackest post.

Now that I have explained the situation to your Father, he should no longer hold anything against you.”

“What you say is true, Master Two,” responded Li Ming.

“If one is aware of a fault one must correct it.”⁷⁶

I will act accordingly in the future.”

Ying Po-chüeh said:

“You’ve only endured a slap with a flour sack, but you’ve done a complete about-face.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing thought to himself in silence for some time before saying, “Since Master Two has repeatedly interceded on your behalf, I will no longer harbor any resentment toward you. You can get up now, and remain in attendance.”

“You had better kowtow, and be quick about it,” chimed in Ying Po-chüeh.

Li Ming hastily performed a kowtow and then proceeded to stand in attendance to one side.

Only after this did Ying Po-chüeh tell Ying Pao to take out the five invitation cards and give them to Hsi-men Ch’ing, saying as he did so, “The twenty-eighth is the day for the full-month celebration of the birth of my baby son. I am inviting the entire group of my sisters-in-law to be so good as to pay a visit to my humble household in honor of the occasion.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened one of the invitations and saw that the text read as follows:

The twenty-eighth is the date for the full-month ceremony to celebrate the birth of our baby son. Our humble household has prepared a meager potation as a deferential compensation for your generous largess. It is our ardent wish that you will deign to mount your elegant equipages and condescend to attend. Our gratitude for your favor will know no bounds.
Respectfully indited with straightened skirts by the lady, née Tu, of the Ying family.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished perusing the text, he ordered Lai-an to take the invitations, together with the box that they came in, to show to the First Lady and then said to Ying Po-chüeh, "You can be certain that they won't be able to go to your place the day after tomorrow. The truth of the matter is that tomorrow is the Third Lady's birthday, and moreover, I will also be hosting a party for Secretary An Ch'en at my place. And on the twenty-eighth the First Lady is planning to pay a call on the wife of His Honor Hsia Yen-ling. So they will hardly be able to go to your place."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you're killing me. If they refuse to go:

Though one's orchard may contain a variety of fruits:

On which can one rely?

I guess I'll just have to go back to their quarters and invite them myself."

In a little while, whom should they see but Lai-an, who came out carrying the empty box and reported, "The First Lady says to thank you for the invitation, which is gratefully accepted."

Ying Po-chüeh turned the box over to Ying Pao and laughed, saying, "Brother, you were kidding me just now. If my sisters-in-law had refused the invitation I would have kowtowed to them until my head was bloody in order to induce them to attend, no matter what."

To this Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by saying, "Don't you go off now, but have a seat in the studio while I go inside to comb my hair, after which we can have something to eat together."

When he had finished speaking, he headed back into the rear compound.

Ying Po-chüeh then turned to Li Ming and said, "How do you like that? If I hadn't spoken to him the way I did just now, he would have continued to harbor his resentment against you. It's the nature of those possessed of money to insist on having their say, and you just have to put up with it. As the saying goes:

An angry fist does not strike a smiling face.⁷⁷

In this day and age, if you wish to play the role of a sycophant, whatever capital you may have for your undertaking, you must be prepared to sacrifice 30 percent of it in order to maintain goodwill. If you insist on propelling your craft against the current, who will pay any attention to you? Quite aside from the fact that you must be ready to:

Adjust yourself to circumstances as they arise,⁷⁸

only if you are prepared to move in any direction, as the flow of the current allows, will you be capable of making any money. If you insist on butting your head against the wall, others will be able to eat their fill while you suffer from starvation. You have been dancing attendance on him for all these years, but you still don't seem to understand his temperament. Tomorrow, if you get that Kuei-chieh of yours to follow hot on your heels in coming to celebrate the Third Lady's birthday, you can kill two birds with one stone. If she will only consent to make him a propitiatory obeisance, this problem, great as it is, can be brought to a successful conclusion."

"Master Two," responded Li Ming, "what you say makes sense. As soon as I get home, I'll go over and speak to Auntie Li the Third about it."

Whom should they see at this point but Lai-an, who came in to set the table and said, "Master Ying the Second, please have a seat. Father will be out in a minute."

Before long, Hsi-men Ch'ing, having performed his ablutions, came out and sat down to keep Ying Po-chüeh company, asking him as he did so, "Have you seen anything of Sun T'ien-hua or Chu Jih-nien recently?"

"I have run into them," replied Ying Po-chüeh, "but they are apprehensive lest you are still ill-disposed toward them. I said to them, 'Brother is a man of magnanimous feelings, who:

Looks up to those above and regards those below.⁷⁹

It is true that on that occasion:

The locust and the grasshopper,
Were swatted in the same breath, but what are you prepared to do about it?' They swore an oath that in the future they would not run around with that young rascal Wang the Third any more. I have heard that yesterday you attended a party at his place, but they didn't know anything about it."

"Yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "thus and so, he laid on quite a spread on my behalf and acknowledged me as his adopted father. I didn't get home afterwards until the second watch. As for their not associating with him any longer, so long as their actions don't interfere with mine, let them do as they please. What do I care? After all, I am not Wang the Third's real father, so I am not in a position to control his conduct."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "if that is the position you have decided to take, the two of them will seek you out in a day or two and offer you a propitiatory gift in order to ameliorate the rift between you."

"You can simply tell them to come by," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What need is there for any propitiatory gift?"

At this juncture, Lai-an brought in a repast, consisting of various tasty delicacies, both roasted and boiled, which Hsi-men Ch'ing partook of with his congee, while Ying Po-chüeh ate rice.

When they had finished eating, Hsi-men Ch'ing inquired, "Have those two boy actors shown up, or not?"

"They've already been here for some time," said Lai-an.

Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that they should be given something to eat, along with Li Ming. The two of them, whose names were Han Tso and Shao Ch'ien, came forward and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, after which they withdrew in order to eat.

After a while, Ying Po-chüeh stood up, and said, "I've got to go. The members of my household are, no doubt, anxiously awaiting me. People of humble status such as myself find it very hard to keep up appearances. Whenever we entertain, everything has to be newly purchased, from the base underneath the frame of the brazier to the door of the parlor."

"You go and take care of things," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and when you're done, come back for a visit this evening in order to offer your birthday greetings and kowtow to the Third Lady on the eve of her birthday, thereby demonstrating your filial respect."

"I'll be certain to come," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "and I'll have my wife send her a birthday present to boot."

When he had finished speaking, he took himself off without more ado.

Truly:

When a favored friend arrives, one's feelings
can never be satiated;

When a real confidant shows up, conversation
is mutually agreeable.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

If you wish to get along, say what people want to hear;
If you try to be honest, you'll only arouse antagonism.
In the affairs of this world, it is best to be lukewarm;
People's true sentiments become apparent only with time.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 73

P'AN CHIN-LIEN IS IRKED BY THE SONG "I REMEMBER HER FLUTE-PLAYING"; BIG SISTER YÜ SINGS "GETTING THROUGH THE FIVE WATCHES OF THE NIGHT"

If you're clever, you'll be considered labored,
if you're awkward, idle;
If you're good, you'll be disdained as weak,
if you're bad, callous.
If you're rich, you'll meet with envy,
if you're poor, disgrace;
If you're diligent, you'll be thought grasping,
if you're economical, stingy.
If you deal with things consistently,
you'll be scorned as simple;
If you adapt yourself to circumstances,
you'll be suspected of deceit.
If you think about it, it is hardly possible to satisfy anyone;
The role of human being is an arduous one,
to be a man is hard.¹

THE STORY GOES that, after Ying Po-chüeh went home, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the Hidden Spring Grotto in his garden and sat down to watch the mason working on the two heated k'angs, with a firebox outside the retaining wall, so that the floor of the interior would be as warm as spring, and the fumes from the burning charcoal would not affect the plants that had been placed there.

Who should suddenly appear at this point but P'ing-an, who brought in a calling card and reported, "His Honor Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command has sent a courier to deliver some joint contributions."

The box they came in contained five packets, enclosing five mace of silver and two ordinary handkerchiefs each, from Commandant Chou Hsiu, Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and the two eunuch directors Liu and Hsüeh, and were said to be deferentially presented as tokens of their respect. Hsi-men Ch'ing told his attendants to take them back to the rear compound and sent the courier off with a calling card in reply.

To resume our story, that day Aunt Yang, along with Sister-in-law Wu and old Mrs. P'an, arrived early in their sedan chairs and were followed by Nun Hsüeh, the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery, Nun Wang, Nun Hsüeh's two young disciples Miao-ch'ü and Miao-feng, and Big Sister Yü, all of whom had purchased gift boxes and had come to celebrate the eve of Meng Yü-lou's birthday. Wu Yüeh-niang served them with tea in the master suite, and the whole sorority of wives and concubines were also there to keep them company. Before long, they finished their tea and then proceeded to visit together at leisure.

Before anyone knew it, P'an Chin-lien, who remembered that she had promised to make a band of white satin in order to enhance Hsi-men Ch'ing's sexual performance, took herself off to her room, got out her sewing box, selected a strip of white satin, and employed backstitching in order to crimp it. She then reached into the porcelain container in her cabinet with her slender fingers, poured out some of the aphrodisiac powder called "The Quavery Voices of Amorous Beauties,"² and backstitched it securely inside the band with her deft technique, so that it would be ready that evening when she indulged with Hsi-men Ch'ing in:

The pleasures of clouds and rain.³

Who could have anticipated that at this juncture Nun Hsüeh suddenly came into the room in order to bring her the fertility potion containing the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that would enable her to conceive. The woman hurriedly put aside what she was doing and sat down to consult with her.

Nun Hsüeh, upon seeing that:

There was nobody about,

furtively handed the potion to her, saying, "It's all been properly prepared. If you select a jen-tzu day and imbibe it on an empty stomach before sleeping with your husband that night, you will be sure to conceive. For corroboration, you can look to the case of the First Bodhisattva in the rear compound. It was I who enabled her to conceive, and she's already got half a bulge in her belly to show for it. I've also got another trick to share with you. If you make a brocade scent bag, I'll slip you a charm inscribed with cinnabar and realgar. If you put it inside the scent bag and wear it next to your body, you are sure to give birth to a male child. It's guaranteed to be effective."

Upon hearing this, the woman was utterly delighted. On the one hand, she took the fertility potion and concealed it in a trunk, while on the other, she consulted a calendar and saw that the twenty-ninth was a jen-tzu day.

Thereupon, she weighed out three mace of silver and gave it to Nun Hsüeh, saying, "This doesn't amount to anything. Just take it home and use it to buy yourself a vegetable to eat. But should I really conceive, and you bring me the charm inscribed in cinnabar, I'll give you a bolt of silk to make a garment out of."

"Bodhisattva," said Nun Hsüeh, "there's no need for you to engage in such calculations. I'm not avaricious in the way that Nun Wang is. In the past, when I undertook to recite scriptures on behalf of that deceased Bodhisattva, she claimed that I was trying to do her out of a piece of patronage. The two of us had quite a quarrel over it, and she has been slandering me wherever she goes. My God! Let her suffer the consequences of her evil karma. I'm not going to waste my time contending with her, but devote myself instead to doing good deeds for others, and rescuing people from their calamities."

"Mistress Hsüeh," the woman said, "you can do as you like. It's just a case of:

Different people having different intentions.

But you mustn't mention a word of this business of mine to her."

Nun Hsüeh responded:

"The dharma must not be divulged to six ears.

How could I ever mention it to her? Last year, in connection with the pregnancy of the First Bodhisattva in the rear compound, she accused me of making a considerable profit behind her back, and I had to split the proceeds with her before she was willing to call it quits. Though she may be a member of the Buddhist sangha, she ignores her vows, and her avariciousness is notorious. Though she accepts alms from:

The patrons in the ten directions,⁴ she does not perform meritorious works on their behalf. When she dies in the future, she won't even deserve to be reborn:

With hair on her body and horns on her head."⁵

After they had talked for a while, the woman ordered Ch'un-mei to provide a serving of tea for Nun Hsüeh. When she had finished the tea, the two of them went over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters and paid their respects to her spirit tablet, after which they went back to join the others in the rear compound.

That afternoon, Wu Yüeh-niang had two tables put up in the room with the k'ang in her quarters and invited her guests to be seated there. She also saw to the setting up of:

Brocaded curtains and standing screens,⁶ in the parlor, along with an Eight Immortals table, replete with appetizers to go with the drinks.

That evening, when the time came for Meng Yü-lou to offer Hsi-men Ch'ing a drink, he wore the variegated flying fish python robe that Eunuch Director Ho Hsin had bestowed upon him, over a tunic of white satin, and occupied the position of honor together with Yüeh-niang, while the four other ladies of the household were arranged to either side of them. Before long, within the chamber:

Painted candles burned high,⁷ while in the flagons:

Yang-kao wine brimmed over.

The two boy actors, Shao Ch'ien and Han Tso, with their:

Silver psaltery, ivory clappers,

And moon-shaped balloon guitar, proceeded to accompany themselves as they sang the birthday song suite that begins with the tune "A Sprig of Flowers," the opening lines of which are:

Swirling around, the auspicious vapors blow;

One by one, the propitious clouds come down.⁸

Meng Yü-lou was made up so that she looked to be:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade; and

Her lotus face evoked an air of spring,⁹

as she offered a drink to Hsi-men Ch'ing and kowtowed to him four times:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying.

Only after this did she pay obeisance to Yüeh-niang and her fellow ladies and take her place at the table. Who should appear at this juncture but Ch'en Ching-chi, accompanied by Hsi-men Ta-chieh, who held the flagon as he offered drinks to Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang, before wishing Meng Yü-lou a happy birthday. When they had finished their obeisances, they sat down to one side. Meanwhile, birthday noodles and dessert treats were brought in together from the kitchen.

Who should appear at this point but Lai-an, who came in with a gift box, saying, "Ying Pao has come to deliver some presents."

Hsi-men Ch'ing told Yüeh-niang to accept them and then said to Lai-an, "Take a card in reply to Brother Ying's wife, and invite Ying the Second, along with Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, to come visit with us. I know that his wife will probably not consent to join us tomorrow, but ask Brother Ying the Second to come see us today. We'll take care of sending return gifts to them another day."

Lai-an, accordingly, took the return card and went off along with Ying Pao.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing sat at the head of the table, it occurred to him unconsciously that, on the occasion of Meng Yü-lou's birthday the previous year, Li P'ing-erh had been there with them; but that today, among the sorority of five ladies, only she was absent. As a result, he couldn't help being pained at heart, and tears began to drop from his eyes.

Sometime later, after the musicians had consumed their soup and rice below, Li Ming poured a round of drinks for the company, and the two boy actors came before them.

Wu Yüeh-niang asked them, "Do you know the song suite that begins with the tune 'Four Pieces of Jade,' the opening lines of which are:

Like lovebirds, flying wing to wing;
Or trees with intertwining branches?"¹⁰

"Yes we do," replied Han Tso.

They were just about to pick up their instruments and start to sing, when Hsi-men Ch'ing called them before him and ordered, "You perform the song suite that begins with the words:

I remember her flute-playing."

The two boy actors hastily switched modes and proceeded to perform the song suite in question, beginning with the tune "A Gathering of Worthy Guests":

I remember her flute-playing, but where is the jade damsel now?¹¹
Tonight, my lovesickness grows more intense.
The white dew is cold, and the scent of the autumn lotus blossoms is fading; Beneath the whitewashed wall the bright moon insists on sinking out of sight.
Though merely a case of temporary separation, the mirror is fractured and the hairpin divided;¹² Which is much better than a period of ten years in which news is interrupted and word cut off.
Facing the west wind, all I can do is lean against the belvedere and sigh to myself in vain.
The tiers upon tiers of trees upon the mountain ridge stretch as far as the eye can see.
What I fear is that time flows away like a galloping steed,
Or like a long snakelike formation of migrating geese.

TO THE TUNE "FREE AND EASY WANDERING"

The pleasure we shared on that previous evening,
Was presaged by the popping of the lantern-wick.
A fragrance wafted from the clasp of her girdle.
But no sooner had we discovered our mutual affinity,
Than, unexpectedly, we were obliged to be separated.
I constantly remember the way we laughed and joked as we snuggled up against each other.
Within the decorated hall everything that day was done with extravagant pretentiousness.
We enjoyed the wine, gleaming with glaucous foam,
The music of red ivory clappers under dancing fans,¹³
And the frolicking of butterflies upon the pillow.

TO THE TUNE "GOURD OF VINEGAR"

On the day that she and I first met, my visage revealed my embarrassment.
When we first engaged in amorous sport together
I was apprehensive at heart; Half feigning to be drunk, half feigning to be sober, half feigning to be silly.
Our feelings for each other were so intense that I have yet to get over them.
No sooner were we warm inside the brocade curtains,
beneath the mandarin duck bedding,
Than her phoenix hairpin ended up getting broken into some two or three pieces.

TO THE SAME TUNE

On her account, I struggled to compose good lines of poetry by lamplight,
The better to express my heartfelt feelings behind other people's backs, Until the shadow of the phoenix tree outside the window began to sink.
Loving flowers as I do, I fear to reveal the ardor of my spring feelings.
Treading the green moss, I step lightly on the tips of my shoes;
The pearls of dew constantly wetting my meadow-tripping boots.

TO THE SAME TUNE

On her account, I went so far as to tell lies even among my friends;
On my account, she engaged in deceptive conduct even before her mother.
On her account, I exhausted my artful tongue in order to deceive the family;
On my account, she doffed her skirt and accepted the bloodstains on the azalea.¹⁴

It so happens that when P'an Chin-lien heard the performance of this song suite, she was fully aware that Hsi-men Ch'ing had called for it because he was thinking of Li P'ing-erh.

Upon the singing of the last line, she deliberately began to stroke her cheek with her finger, first this way and then that, in order to embarrass Hsi-men Ch'ing in front of the company, saying, "My child, you're just like:

Chu Pa-chieh, sitting in a homeless shelter."¹⁵

How much more ugly can you get?

For someone who had been previously married and was certainly no virgin, how could she have come up with any 'bloodstains on the azalea'? What a shameless good-for-nothing you are."

"You crazy slave!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I understand the situation, but what do you know about it?"

The two boy actors continued to sing:

On her account, my ears were forever burning;
On my account, she hid her blushes with a fan.

TO THE TUNE "THE LEAVES OF THE PHOENIX TREE"

One of us was an amorous maiden from a minister's mansion,
One of us was a sword-strumming client from before his gate,¹⁶

Who happened to encounter each other in the course of our lives.

After only a few nights worth a thousand pieces of gold,

We were, all of a sudden, forced to abandon each other.

How could I ever consent to be so depraved as to,

Go and pick another flower from atop a garden wall?

TO THE TUNE "THE FLOWER IN THE REAR COURTYARD"

Upon my pillow, fluttering airily,
I dream of a butterfly;

As I hear the ding-donging of the chimes under the eaves.

No sooner did I have the temerity to tender

Wen Ch'iao's mirror stand,¹⁷
Than the vehicle of Cho Wen-chün's intended elopement was intercepted,¹⁸

Leaving me here, unable to do anything but sigh in distress.

The phoenix bed curtains are cold, the fragrance of orchid and musk has dissipated.¹⁹

Chin-lien Is Irked over "I Remember Her Flute-playing"

Beset by fatigue, I have just fallen asleep,
 But the road to the Radiant Terrace is long.
 How can I ever overcome this sorrow of mine?
 I am doomed to suffer from this lovesickness.
 Gazing at the Milky Way, it seems straight and then bent;
 Facing the lonely lamp, it lights up and then fades away.

TO THE TUNE "THE GREENHORN"

Ah! The wind wildly scatters the yellow leaves on the stairways, on the stairways;
 The clouds half conceal the waning moon amid the willow branches, the willow branches.
 This sorrow at separation has become even harder to endure than it seemed last spring.
 I am so affected that things are all a blur;²⁰
 I am so emaciated that I can hardly bear it.²¹
 Even when the mulberry fields are resubmerged and the sea has once again dried up,
 This karmic debt of love can never be fully repaid.²²

TO THE TUNE "BORNE ON THE WAVES"

No sooner had this sorrow ceased to hover about the corners of my eyes,

Than it came back to haunt me above the eyebrows, Wishing to engrave itself upon the spirits of the Three Corpses in my innermost heart.
If the day comes when, within the brocade curtains,
our jade bodies should touch again,
I will take the tips of her fingers in my hand and gently squeeze them,
As I talk to her until the handle of the Northern Dipper sets above our abode.²³

When they had finished singing, P'an Chin-lien was still upset at the fact that he had called for them to perform this particular song suite, and the two of them continued to bandy words about it in front of the company.

When Yüeh-niang could abide it no longer, she said, "Sister Six, show a little patience. What are the two of you squabbling about, anyway? Aunt Yang and Sister-in-law Wu have been left to themselves in the other room, without anyone to keep them company. Two of you ought to go there to visit with them, and I'll join you in a minute."

Thereupon, P'an Chin-lien and Li Chiao-erh proceeded to go into the other room to keep Aunt Yang, Old Mrs. P'an, and Sister-in-law Wu company.

Before long, who should appear but Lai-an, who came in and reported, "The card for Ying the Second's wife has been delivered, and Master Ying the Second himself has arrived. Brother-in-law Wu K'ai will be here shortly."

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by saying, "Go across the street and invite Master Wen to come join us."

Turning to Yüeh-niang, he said, "Tell the kitchen to send the refreshments out to us. I'm going to the front compound to keep them company."

He then called up Li Ming and said, "You go up to the front compound too, in order to sing for us."

Li Ming, accordingly, accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing out to the front compound, where they joined Ying Po-chüeh in the studio on the west side of the courtyard.

Hsi-men Ch'ing thanked Ying Po-chüeh for his gifts and said, "Whatever happens, be sure to invite your wife to come visit us tomorrow."

"I'm afraid she won't be able to come," said Ying Po-chüeh. "There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."

After some time, Licentiate Wen arrived, bowed to the company, and sat down.

Ying Po-chüeh raised his hand in greeting and said, "I really put you to a lot of trouble this morning, venerable sir."

"It was nothing worth mentioning," responded Licentiate Wen.

Brother-in-law Wu also arrived, and after he had exchanged greetings with the company and been offered a seat, Ch'in-t'ung came in with some candles, and the four of them sat down together around the brazier, while Lai-an brought in a platter of appetizers to go with the wine and placed it on the table.

Under the lamplight, Ying Po-chüeh observed that, over his white satin tunic, Hsi-men Ch'ing was wearing a green velvet variegated flying fish python robe, the coiled image on which was:

Showing its claws and brandishing its fangs,²⁴
The horns on its head projecting formidably;²⁵
Flaunting its whiskers and shaking its mane,
Its golds and greens setting each other off.

It gave him quite a start, and he asked, "Brother, where did that garment of yours come from?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by standing up and saying, "Take a good look at it, all of you, and then guess where it came from."

"How could we hope to guess correctly?" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"It was given to me by Eunuch Director Ho Hsin in the Eastern Capital," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I was having a drink at his place and was feeling cold, so he brought out this garment and gave it to me to put on. This is the flying fish version of the python robe. Since the Emperor had recently bestowed a regular python robe and a jade girdle upon him, he no longer planned to wear this one, so he gave it to me, which was a considerable favor."

Ying Po-chüeh, expressing himself in exaggerated terms, said, "Such an ornately decorated garment must, at the very least, be worth a good deal of money. This is a propitious omen for you, Brother. In the future, when you are promoted to the position of commander-in-chief, you need not worry about wearing a regular python robe and a jade girdle yourself, not to mention a flying fish robe, for your rank will entitle you to more than that."

As they talked together, Ch'in-t'ung set out the goblets and chopsticks, soup and rice, appetizers and wine, while Li Ming prepared to sing for their entertainment.

"I really ought to go inside and offer a cup of wine to my third sister-in-law," said Ying Po-chüeh, "before commencing to drink out here."

"My son," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you really have such filial intentions, you might as well go back to the rear compound and kowtow to her. What need is there to ask?"

"It doesn't matter," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I'll go and kowtow to her. And, if there's any problem with that, and I don't succeed in kowtowing to her, I'll simply come back out after giving her a taste of my prowess on the edge of the k'ang."

At this, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave him a sharp rap on the top of his head and cursed, saying, "You dog! As ever, you choose to ignore distinctions of status.”

“Even if we children of yours wished to,” responded Ying Po-chüeh, “which of us would feel it right to assume the superior position?”

The two of them continued to bandy words with each other for a while.

Before long, the birthday noodles were served, and Hsi-men Ch’ing offered portions of them to Brother-in-law Wu, Licentiate Wen, and Ying Po-chüeh. Because he had already eaten in the rear compound, he gave his own portion to Li Ming. When Li Ming had finished eating his noodles, he came before them once again to sing for their entertainment. Ying Po-chüeh urged Brother-in-law Wu to select a song suite for him to sing, but he demurred, saying, “I don’t want to put him to any trouble. Just let him sing one that he’s familiar with.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “My brother-in-law is fond of the suite that begins with the tune “The Earthenware Crock.”

He then told Ch’in-t’ung to pour another round of wine, while Li Ming, with:

The bridges on his psaltery ranged like wild geese,

Gently adjusted the icy strings, and proceeded to sing the song suite in question, the opening lines of which were:

It’s enough to cause one to stare at the scenery in silence;
As one’s fragrant countenance grows more emaciated by the day.²⁶

When he had finished singing, he retired.

Who should appear at this juncture but Lai-an, who came in and reported, “The chef is about to go home and wants to know how many people you will need for tomorrow.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “Tell him that I will need six cooks and two waiters for the banquet tomorrow. There will be five table settings, and I want them all to be properly prepared.”

Lai-an assented and went out.

At this point, Wu K’ai asked, “Brother-in-law, who are you entertaining tomorrow?”

Hsi-men Ch’ing explained about how Secretary An Ch’en of the Ministry of Works was hosting a party for Ts’ai Hsiu, the prefect of Chiu-chiang.

“If the secretary is going to be at the party tomorrow,” said Wu K’ai, “that’s very fortunate.”

“Why so?” asked Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“It’s on account of my part in supervising the repair of the local Charity Granary,” said Wu K’ai. “Since it is the secretary’s responsibility to submit a report on the project, I hope that you will speak to him about it tomorrow, and urge him to look upon my efforts favorably, in the hope that when his term of office expires at the end of the year he may be willing to put in a good word on my behalf. It would be a great favor to me, Brother-in-law, if you were to do so.”

“That’s no problem,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “If you will write out a card with your curriculum vitae and get it to me by tomorrow, I’ll speak to him about it when a convenient opportunity arises.”

Wu K’ai promptly got up and bowed to him in gratitude.

“Venerable Brother-in-law,” interjected Ying Po-chüeh, “you can relax about that. After all, you are a mainstay of the family. If he were unwilling to speak up on your behalf, on whose behalf would he consent to do so? You can rest assured that it will take but little in the way of a recommendation from him to insure that he will:

Hit the bull’s-eye with the first arrow.”

They continued drinking in the front compound until the second watch before the party broke up.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing was seeing Li Ming and the boy actors out the gate, he said, “See to it that you all report early tomorrow.”

When Li Ming and the others had left, the servants cleared up the utensils and took them back to the rear compound.

The master suite was still crowded with people, but when they heard that the party in the front compound had broken up, they went back to their various quarters.

To resume our story, P’an Chin-lien was expecting that Hsi-men Ch’ing would go straight to her own quarters, so she hastily headed out in that direction, but, contrary to her expectations, he made his way past the ceremonial gate into the rear compound. Chin-lien concealed herself in the black shadow behind the spirit screen to keep track of him, and when she saw that he went into the master suite, she surreptitiously crept under the window to eavesdrop on him.

Whom should she see at this juncture but Yü-hsiao, who was standing in the doorway of the parlor and said, “Fifth Lady, why don’t you go inside? Father is there, keeping company with the Third Lady, is he not?”

She also went on to ask, “And where is Old Mrs. P’an?”

“The old good-for-nothing,” responded Chin-lien, “is suffering from some bodily discomfort, so she has gone back to her room to sleep.”

Before long, she overheard Yüeh-niang saying, “Why ever did you engage the services of those two little bastards today? They hardly know how to sing. All they can sing is that song suite the first number of which, to the tune “Powdery Butterflies,” begins with the words:

Three Variations on the Plum Blossom.²⁷

“It was only toward the end,” said Meng Yü-lou, “when you asked them to sing that song suite the first number of which, to the tune ‘Drunk in the Flowers’ Shade,” begins with the words:

By the Phoenix Bank, the lotus blooms,²⁸ that they acceded to your request and sang the suite in question. What slippery little bastards they are. We don’t even know their names. All they did for the whole day they were here was to enjoy themselves.”

“One of them is called Han Tso,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “and the other one is called Shao Ch’ien.”

“Who cares whether they are called this or that?” said Yüeh-niang.

Before they knew it, P’an Chin-lien, who had slowly proceeded with:

Skulking step and lurking gait, to lift aside the portiere, sneak in, and position herself behind the heated k’ang, spoke up, saying, “What you should be asking him is why he didn’t let them sing the song suite that his legitimate wife had called for, but instead, for no good reason, proceeded to:

Fool with the branches and tug at the leaves, telling them to sing:

I remember her flute-playing,

that is to say, Li P’ing-erh’s flute-playing; thereby throwing the two little bastards into such consternation that they didn’t know who they were supposed to take their orders from?”

When Meng Yü-lou turned her head around and saw that it was Chin-lien who had spoken, she said, “So it’s Slavey Six, is it? Where did you appear from? When you suddenly intervened with that speech of yours, you gave me quite a start. You’re always up to mischief of some kind. How long have you been standing behind me there? How is it that I didn’t see you come in, or hear the sound of your footsteps?”

“The Fifth Lady has been there behind the Third Lady for some time already,” said Hsiao-yü.

Chin-lien nodded her head and then said to Hsi-men Ch’ing, “Brother, you’d do well to slack off a bit. Do you really think that no one else is onto those little tricks of yours? What kind of an ‘amorous maiden from a minister’s mansion’ was she, anyway? She was like me in that we had both been previously married. How can you pretend that on your account ‘she doffed her skirt and accepted the bloodstains on the azalea?’ It’s like:

Three officials, only two of whom bother to bow to each other:

Whoever saw such a thing?²⁹

My response is the one received by that oaf, Squire Sun, when he questioned his clever servant, Chu Chi,³⁰ that is to say, ‘I may be willing to overlook everything else; but this I will never accept.’ You actually went so far as to complain to someone, ‘Ever since she died, I haven’t been served so much as a single saucer of food that appeals to my taste.’ As the saying goes:

Since Butcher Wang is dead and gone,

One must eat pork with the bristles.³¹

The implication is that your bevy of womenfolk merely stand by with their eyes open as you are constrained to stuff yourself with shit every day. You may retain some respect for our elder sister as your legitimate wife, but the rest of us don’t count for anything, since none of us appeals to your taste. And even though our elder sister may be able to take charge of the household, she doesn’t seem to be able to satisfy your needs. Since only the Sixth Lady was good enough for you, it would seem, why didn’t you hold on to her and prevent her from dying? Originally, before she entered the household, you managed to get on all right, but now, no matter what the rest of us do, it fails to meet with your approval. Whenever the thought of her comes up, it causes your heart to start thumping away. But now that you’ve found someone else as a stand-in for her, it’s like:

Trying a new sauce with your noodles, and you’re as pleased as can be. Can it be that only the water from her quarters appeals to your taste?”

“Good Sister Six,” interjected Yüeh-niang, “as the saying puts it all too well:

Good people do not live for long,³²

The wicked live a thousand years.

It has always been true that:

What you can’t round on the lathe,

You can round with an axe.

You and I are only pieces of inferior merchandise, incapable of appealing to his taste. Let him say what he likes, and let it go at that.”

“It’s not that,” said Chin-lien. “It’s just that if I don’t call him to account, the things he says are too depressing. I’m merely pointing out that people can’t get over their resentment at the things he says.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing merely laughed at this and chided her, saying, “You crazy little whore! You’re talking nonsense. When did I ever say anything like that?”

“It was on that day when you were entertaining Eunuch Director Huang Ching-ch’en,” said Chin-lien. “While you were talking with Ying the Second and that southerner Licentiate Wen, did you not say to them, ‘Ever since she died, I haven’t been provided with so much as a single saucer’s worth of decent food?’ It’s no wonder you feel that way, since you act as though the rest of your womenfolk have all died off. Even when she was still alive, you didn’t pay much attention to the rest of us. No doubt, in the future, you’ll raise up someone else to be a match for her, won't you? You lousy, shameless, profligate good-for-nothing!"

This speech of hers got under Hsi-men Ch'ing's skin to such an extent that he jumped up and chased after her in the endeavor to give her a kick with his booted foot, but the woman had already made it out the door and disappeared in a puff of smoke. Hsi-men Ch'ing chased outside after her, but she was nowhere to be seen. The only thing he saw was Ch'un-mei, who was standing outside the door of the master suite, so he proceeded to grab her with one hand and set out for the front compound, supporting himself on the back of her shoulder.

Yüeh-niang, who had observed that he was drunk, had only been waiting for an opportunity to bundle him off to the front compound to sleep it off, because she wanted to spend the evening listening to the three nuns recite a precious scroll. Thereupon, she told Hsiao-yü to take a lantern and escort him to the front compound. Chin-lien and Yü-hsiao were standing concealed in the black shadow underneath the veranda, so Hsi-men Ch'ing did not see them.

Yü-hsiao said to Chin-lien, "My guess would be that Father is surely headed for your quarters."

"He's drunk enough to start acting up," responded Chin-lien. "Let him go to sleep first, and I'll join him a little later."

"If you'll wait for me," said Yü-hsiao, "I'll get you some fruit for your mother to eat."

Thereupon, she went into the bedroom, hid two tangerines, two apples, a package of candied sweetmeats, and three pomegranates in her sleeve and brought them out to give to the woman, who put them in her own sleeve, and then headed straight back toward the front compound.

Whom should she run into at this point but Hsiao-yü, who was on her way back after escorting Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "Fifth Lady, where have you been? Father has been looking all over for you."

When Chin-lien arrived at the door of her quarters, she didn't go inside but peeked through an aperture in the window lattice and saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was sitting on the bed, embracing Ch'un-mei and amusing himself with her.

Not wishing to disturb them, she hastily slipped into the other room, turned the fruit over to Ch'iu-chü, and asked her, "Has my mother gone to sleep yet, or not?"

"She's been asleep for some time already," replied Ch'iu-chü.

After enjoining her to be sure to put the fruit safely away in the cabinet, Chin-lien went back to the rear compound.

What should she find upon her arrival in the master suite but a whole roomful of people sitting together, including Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, Sister-in-law Wu, Aunt Yang, and the three nuns, along with their two teenage disciples Miao-ch'ü and Miao-feng. The nuns were seated on Yüeh-niang's k'ang, with their legs folded in the lotus position, and Nun Hsüeh in the center. A bed table had been placed in front of her, on which incense was burning, and the rest of the company were crowded around them, waiting to hear the exposition of the Buddhist dharma.

Whom should they see at this point but Chin-lien, who lifted the portiere aside with a smile and came in, causing Yüeh-niang to say, "You've brought a calamity down on your own head. He's gone to your quarters looking for you. If you haven't been able to get him to bed, what have you come back here for? Did he beat you when he got to your place?"

Chin-lien laughed at this, saying, "Just ask him whether he dares to beat me, or not."

"If he doesn't beat you," said Yüeh-niang, "it must be because he's afraid of the stink it would cause. It seems to me that you took him to task somewhat too severely just now. As the saying goes:

The male of the species has dog's hair growing on his face;³³

The woman of the species has the fleece of a female phoenix.

He was drunk, after all. My fear is that if you irritate him to the point where he loses his temper:

If he doesn't beat you,

Should he beat the dog instead?

I actually broke into a sweat on your behalf, but it turns out you're enough of a minx to tough it out."

"Even if he loses his temper with me," said Chin-lien, "I'm not afraid of him. But I can't put up with his sorting people differentially into:

Three classes and nine categories.

He didn't let them sing the song suite that his legitimate wife had called for but instead cast about:

Plowing the eastern ditch, and

Harrowing the western ditch;³⁴ thereby throwing the two little bastards into such confusion that they didn't know who they were supposed to take their orders from. Since this is our third sister Meng Yü-lou's birthday, it was inappropriate to sing a song suite like the one beginning with the words:

I remember her flute-playing,

which deals with the sorrows of separation. After all:

Nobody knows where the dead end up going to, but he insists on exhibiting this counterfeit compassion and fake filiality. I can't stomach it."

"You sisters have been quarreling with each other all this time," interjected Sister-in-law Wu, "and I don't even know what it's about. My brother-in-law came in and sat down politely, so why was he driven out again?"

"Sister-in-law," said Yüeh-niang, "you don't understand what happened. That husband of mine recalled the fact that Sister Li was still with us on the occasion of Sister Meng Yü-lou's birthday last year, but that she is no longer with us this year, which caused him to shed a few tears. So he told the boy actors to sing the song suite that begins with the words:

I remember her flute-playing, but where is the jade damsel now?

This sister here was angry at the fact that he called for this song suite and told him off so effectively that she got under his skin and caused him to chase after her with the intent of giving her a drubbing. That's why the rascal ran out on us."

"Sister," said Aunt Yang, "you ought to let your husband call for whatever song suite he likes. What's the point of taking him to task over it. I imagine that he's accustomed to seeing all you sisters together but noticed that Li P'ing-erh was not here today. How could his heart not be stricken under the circumstances?"

"My good lady," said Meng Yü-lou, "they've been singing what they were asked to sing for what seems like half a day already, and who among the rest of us objected to what they sang? But Sister Six here has always had a better understanding of the significance of the songs than the rest of us. This song suite suggests that Li P'ing-erh was superior to any of the female paragons of old, extols the closeness of their relationship, and how they swore to be as faithful as the hills and seas, you to me, and I to you, as though she were utterly incomparable. So this inveterate nitpicker of ours couldn't help taking him verbally to task for it and has been giving him a hard time ever since."

"So this sister of ours is as sharp as all that," remarked Aunt Yang.

"What songs are there that she doesn't know?" said Yüeh-niang.

"If you quote the first line,

She'll come up with the last.³⁵

As for the likes of me, if we engage the services of professional female singers or boy actors, all we can do is let them sing and leave it at that. She is the only one among us who can say, 'That segment wasn't performed correctly; that line wasn't sung right; or that section was left out.' Whenever our husband proposes a song, she starts to carry on with him, giving him tit for tat, until he really becomes annoyed, before laying off, while the rest of us merely let them go at it."

"Aunt Yang," Meng Yü-lou interjected humorously, "you may not be aware of it, but I've had three or four children, of whom this slavey is the only one who survived. She has always been clever but unmannerly, and now that she has grown up and become a woman, she no longer allows herself to be governed by me."

Chin-lien responded by giving her a playful slap and laughed, saying, "So you're playing the role of my mother again, are you?"

"You see," said Meng Yü-lou, "she's been spoiled to the point that she's so:

Discourteous and ill-bred,
as to strike a member of the older generation."

"Sister," said Aunt Yang, "you'd do well in the future to let that husband of yours have his say. As the sayings go:

One night as man and wife gives rise to a hundred nights of love.

To walk a hundred steps with one another,

Is enough to develop a lingering affinity.

She still seems vibrantly alive to him. You womenfolk of his are like his fingers. If he should lose one of them, how could he fail to think of it, to yearn for it, and to commemorate it?"

"Whether he thinks of her or not," responded Chin-lien, "there ought to be an appropriate time for it. We are all spouses of his after all. What does he mean by:

Raising one person up, and Putting another down?

Are we all nothing but:

The ghosts of Liu Chan's daughters,

Who don't amount to anything?³⁶

Our elder sister resides in the rear compound and may not be aware of it, or have seen what he's up to. Every day, when he comes home after drinking somewhere, he makes his way first to her quarters, where he bows deeply before her portrait, mutters some mumbo jumbo on her behalf, makes her an offering of soup and rice, and proffers her something with his chopsticks just as though she were alive. Who knows what all he's up to? And he criticizes the rest of us for not wearing mourning on her behalf. As we have pointed out to him, none of us stands to her in the position of a mother. We all wore mourning for her through the final weekly commemoration of her death. How much longer are we supposed to do so? But he continues to quarrel with us about it."

"Sisters," responded Aunt Yang, "you ought to:

Take notice of half of what he does,

And take no notice of the other half."

"How time flies," said Sister-in-law Wu. "The seventh weekly commemoration occurred some time ago, and now the hundredth-day anniversary of her death is about to come up."

"When will the hundredth-day anniversary occur?" asked Aunt Yang.

"It's early yet," said Yüeh-niang. "It will not be until the twenty-sixth day of the twelfth month."

“You’ll have to have a scripture-reading ceremony to mark the occasion,” said Nun Wang.

“It will fall too close to the New Year’s celebrations,” said Yüeh-niang, “for us to have any scripture-reading then. Father will probably put the scripture-reading off until after the New Year’s festival.”

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Hsiao-yü, who brought in a serving of tea flavored with taro, a cup of which was provided for each of them.

Shortly thereafter, when they had drunk their tea, Yüeh-niang washed her hands, lit some incense in the burner, and prepared to listen to Nun Hsüeh expound the Buddhist dharma.³⁷

Nun Hsüeh began by reciting a gatha, which went as follows:

The Ch’an school of the Buddhist teaching is really quite extraordinary;
It has been transmitted by the Buddhas and patriarchs to the human world.
It is easy enough for a wind-blown leaf to fall tumbling to the ground;
But for it ever to be reattached to its original branch is difficult.³⁸

These four lines of verse refer to the fact that for monks to adhere faithfully to their vows is difficult. It points out that man’s life is like a leaf on an iron tree, which may fall off easily, but will find it hard to ever be reattached to its original branch. It is easy enough to suffer the consequences of one’s evil karma, but difficult to become a Buddha or a patriarch.³⁹

To resume our story, originally, during the Chih-p’ing reign period (1064–67), in the ancient Ching-tz’u Hsiao-kuang Monastery on the Southern Mountain outside the Ch’ien-t’ang Gate of Ning-hai military prefecture in Chekiang province, there were two dedicated monks who had attained to an understanding of the Way. One of them was called Ch’an Master Wu-chieh (Five Precepts), and the other Ch’an Master Ming-wu (Clear Enlightenment). To what does the term Five Precepts refer? The first is to abstain from killing; the second is to abstain from stealing; the third is to abstain from lascivious music and alluring beauty;⁴⁰ the fourth is to abstain from drinking wine or eating meat;⁴¹ and the fifth is to abstain from uttering untrue or misleading statements.⁴² To what does the term Clear Enlightenment refer? It means to illuminate one’s mind and perceive one’s nature,⁴³ thereby achieving an understanding of one’s true self. Now this Ch’an Master Wu-chieh was just thirty years old in terms of lay reckoning, was not quite three feet tall, and presented an altogether most extraordinary aspect. He had been intelligent ever since his youth but was blind in one eye. His lay surname was Chin, and he was thoroughly versed in the Ch’an School and Buddhist doctrine. He and Ming-wu were like elder and younger brothers in the dharma. One day they visited the monastery together to call on the Ch’an Master Ta-hsing, and when the Master realized that Wu-chieh was so well versed in Buddhist doctrine, he retained him in the monastery in the post of rector. Some years later, when Ta-hsing passed away, the monks of the monastery made him the abbot, and henceforth he spent his days in meditation. The other one, Ming-wu, was twenty-eight years old and was born with a round head and large ears,⁴⁴ a broad face and a square mouth.⁴⁵ He was tall of stature,⁴⁶ and his appearance resembled that of an arhat. His lay surname was Wang, and the two of them were as close as though they were born of the same mother. When the time came to explicate the dharma, the two of them would mount the rostrum together.

One day, at the end of winter and the onset of spring, the weather was extremely cold. Snow had been falling for two days but had finally ended, and the sky was clear. Ch’an Master Wu-chieh was sitting on his meditation chair early that morning when his ears caught the sound of an infant crying in the distance. Turning to the trusted lay worker at his side, whose name was Ch’ing-i, he said to him, “Go out in front of the monastery gate to see what is going on, and report back to me.” The lay worker opened the gate of the monastery and saw a baby lying on a tattered mat on the snowy ground under a pine tree. “I wonder who could have left the child here?” he thought to himself. When he went closer to take a look, he found that it was a five- or six-month-old baby girl, wrapped in ragged clothing, who had a strip of paper on her breast inscribed with the eight characters indicating the year, month, date, and hour of her birth. Ch’ing-i thought to himself, “To save a single human life is better than building a seven-story pagoda.”⁴⁷

Hastening back to the abbot’s quarters, he told him what he had found. “Good!” said the abbot. “Someone with a heart as good as yours is hard to find. Take her back to your quarters and see that she is properly nourished. To have saved her life is a good deed.” When she had lived through her first year, the abbot gave her the name Hung-lien, or Red Lotus.

As the days went and the months came,⁴⁸ the lay worker Ch’ing-i raised her in his quarters in the monastery, without anyone being the wiser,⁴⁹ and in a while the abbot himself forgot all about it.

Before anyone knew it, Hung-lien grew to the age of fifteen. The lay worker Ch’ing-i kept her secluded in his own quarters, locking the door every day, each time he went out or came in, just as though she were his own daughter. The girl’s clothing, shoes, and socks were all those of a male novice, and she was favored with a naturally clear-cut appearance. When she had nothing else to do, she devoted herself to needlework in her room. The only hope of Ch’ing-i was that he might find her a husband so that the two of them could support him in his old age and arrange for his funeral.⁵⁰

One day, during the hot weather of the sixth month, Ch’an Master Wu-chieh happened to remember the events that had occurred more than ten years before and went directly back to the lay worker Ch’ing-i’s quarters behind the Hall of a Thousand Buddhas. “You seldom venture here,” said Ch’ing-i. “What brings you here today?” “Where is that girl Hung-lien?” asked Ch’an Master Wu-chieh. Ch’ing-i did not dare to conceal the truth of the matter⁵¹ and led the abbot into his quarters.

No sooner did he catch sight of Hung-lien than his thoughts were led astray,⁵² and lustful desires were suddenly aroused. “Tonight you must bring her to my quarters,” he instructed Ch’ing-i. “You must do so without fail.⁵³ If you consent to do as I say, I will see to it that your lot is improved in the future, but you must not let anyone else into the secret.” Ch’ing-i did not dare not to comply, but thought to himself, “Tonight this girl of mine is sure to lose her virginity.” When the abbot saw that his response was somewhat reluctant, he called him into his own quarters and gave him ten taels of silver, along with an ordination certificate that would entitle him to become a monk himself. Ch’ing-i felt that he had no alternative but to accept the silver.

That evening, he took Hung-lien to the abbot’s quarters, and the abbot accordingly deflowered her. After this, the abbot kept her hidden out of sight in a paper-curtained cabinet behind his bed and personally provided her with enough food to eat.

To resume our story, that very night, when the abbot’s brother-monk Ch’an Master Ming-wu emerged from a trance while sitting on his meditation couch, he was already aware that Wu-chieh had allowed his thoughts to stray and had broken his vow to abstain from sexual activity by violating the girl Hung-lien, thereby allowing his virtuous conduct of many years to be cast aside on a single day. “I had better go and admonish him to mend his ways,” he thought to himself.

The next day, the lotus flowers were in bloom in front of the monastery gate. Ming-wu ordered an acolyte to pluck a white lotus for him, put it in a gallbladder-shaped vase, and then invite Wu-chieh to come join him in enjoying the lotus blossoms, and composing verses, while chatting and laughing together. Before long, Wu-chieh arrived, and the two Ch’an Masters sat down beside each other. “My Brother,” said Ming-wu, “I noticed today that these flowers were in full bloom and invited you to come enjoy them with me, and each compose a verse on the subject.”

When the acolyte had served them with tea, and they had finished drinking it, they were provided with the four treasures of the writer’s studio.⁵⁴

“Let’s choose the lotus root as our topic,” said Wu-chieh, but Ming-wu said, “No, let’s choose the lotus flowers as our topic instead.” Wu-chieh took up his brush and composed a quatrain, as follows:

The petals of the stalk of lotus flowers are in full bloom; Accompanied by the hollyhocks, exuding their rich fragrance.
The fiery red pomegranates are ablaze
like rolls of brocade;
But their scent is no match for that of the green-coated caltrops.

“Since my elder brother has composed a poem,” said Ming-wu, “how could I fail to do so?” Whereupon, he also picked up his brush and composed a quatrain, as follows:

In spring, the peach trees, apricots, and willows begin to flourish;
Their thousand blossoms and myriad blooms contending in fragrance.
In summer, one enjoys the caltrop and the lotus, in all their glory;
But the red lotus is no match for the white lotus in its fragrance.⁵⁵

When he had finished writing it out, he laughed out loud.

Upon hearing the words of this poem, Wu-chieh realized their significance, and his embarrassment showed in his face.⁵⁶ Turning around and excusing himself, he returned to the abbot’s quarters, where he told an acolyte to heat some bath water. After bathing himself, and changing into a new set of clothing, he took paper and brush and hastily wrote a farewell elegy of eight lines, as follows:

Now I have existed forty-seven years,
The myriad phenomena revert to unity.
Only because my thoughts went astray,
I must now suddenly depart this life.
My message to my fellow monk Ming-wu,
Is, "There is no need to pressure me."
My ephemeral body is like lightning,
That leaves the sky azure as before.

When he had finished writing it, he placed it in front of an image of the Buddha, returned to his meditation couch, and passed away in the lotus position.

An acolyte hastened to report this event to Ming-wu, who was greatly surprised to hear it. Upon going in front of the Buddha's image and reading the farewell elegy, he said, "You were not a bad monk, after all, but it's too bad that you made this one false move. And now, although you may be reborn as a man, you will grow up not believing in the Three Jewels, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha; and are sure to disparage the Buddha and slander the clergy, bringing bitter consequences on yourself in future lives, and preventing yourself from reverting to the true path."⁵⁷ It is greatly to be regretted. Do you really think that you have gotten away, and that I will not be able to catch up with you?"

Thereupon, he returned to his quarters, told an acolyte to heat bath water for him, bathed, and sat down on his meditation couch. Turning to the acolyte, he said, "I am going to pursue my fellow monk Wu-chieh. You can place our bodies in two caskets, and see that they are properly cremated together, after lying in state for three days." When he had finished speaking, he also passed away while sitting in the lotus position.

His fellow monks were all astonished at this extraordinary event, and word that two monks at the monastery had passed away sitting in the lotus position on successive days quickly spread to the four quarters. As a result, when their caskets were carried out in front of the monastery and cremated, mountains and seas of people came to burn incense, pay their respects, and offer donations. The lay worker Ch'ing-i subsequently married Hung-lien to a commoner so that they could support him in his old age. But no more of this.

In later days, Wu-chieh was reborn as the son of the layman Su Hsün of Mei prefecture in western Szechwan, who was given the name Su Shih,⁵⁸ and is also known by the courtesy name Tzu-chan, and the cognomen Tung-p'o. Ming-wu was reborn as the son of one Hsieh Tao-ch'ing from the same prefecture, who was given the name Tuan-ch'ing, and later left home to become a monk,⁵⁹ who took the name Fo-yin. The two of them continued to confront each other in their new incarnations, and their relationship remained extremely close. Truly:

Since he arrived in Szechwan several decades have gone by;
During which he has devoted himself to the Buddha Vairocana.⁶⁰
Although he apprehended the crux of Chao-chou's⁶¹ sayings;
His good affinity has turned out to be a bad affinity.
The red peach blossoms and the green willows remain the same;
The water flowing over the boulders makes a gurgling sound.
Today, the road to enlightenment has been pointed out to you; Never again allow your thoughts to stray for love of Hung-lien.⁶²

When Nun Hsüeh finished her recitation, whom should they see but Lan-hsiang, from Meng Yü-lou's quarters, who brought in two square boxes of fastidiously prepared vegetarian fare, saucers of fruit, tea pastries, and sweetmeats, which were placed on the table after the incense burner had been removed. A kettle of tea was also provided, and the audience joined the three nuns in enjoying the repast. After this, some meat dishes were served, a jug of Ma-ku wine was opened, and the company gathered around the brazier to enjoy the wine.

Yüeh-niang and Sister-in-law Wu began to throw dice as they played "Competing for the Red," while Chin-lien and Li Chiao-erh played guess-fingers with each other. Yü-hsiao stood beside them to pour the wine and at the same time passed information to Chin-lien underneath the table, which enabled her to win round after round, forcing Li Chiao-erh to down several cups of wine.

"Let me play with you," said Meng Yü-lou. "You seem bent only on beating her."

She then went on to say, "Chin-lien, expose your hands. You mustn't conceal them in your sleeves that way. And Yü-hsiao must not be allowed to stay so close to you."

As a result, that evening, she succeeded in overcoming Chin-lien, who was forced to down several cups of wine.

They also asked Big Sister Yü to play and sing for them, Yüeh-niang telling her, "Sing a version of 'Getting through the Five Watches of the Night' for us."

Big Sister Yü, thereupon, tuned the strings of her instrument and sang in a loud voice the song suite that begins with the tune "Interlaced Jade Branches":

Amid dense masses of dark clouds,
Like bits of goose down, the snowflakes are dancing wildly.
The north wind is piercingly cold,⁶³ as it penetrates the windows.
Your heart is hard, and I have been the victim of it.
The abuse I have suffered at the hands of my parents is too cruel.
The promises you made me have been utterly ignored.
All I can do is count the watches of the night.

TO THE TUNE "SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD":

The night is long, and I have been left all alone.
It is desolate in the quiet of the early watches.

You have not sent me a single sheet of news about yourself.
My cheeks are streaked with pearly tears.
Our good times together are nothing to you.
During the first watch, my suffering is unbounded.

TO THE TUNE “INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES”:

The first watch is finally over;
But I have been left all alone here amid the bed curtains.

I toss first this way and then that,
but how am I to sleep?
During the second watch my pearly tears fall.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

The second watch is hard to endure.
In trying to go to sleep, I do periodically nod off, Hoping that this night, this night, he will appear to me in my dreams.
I long for him; he longs for me.
When he first left, the flowering crab apple had just begun to bloom;
But by this time, the leaves of the tree have all fallen;
Leaving me with no recourse but to foolishly wait in vain.

TO THE TUNE “SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD”:

I have been foolishly waiting
for you all day long;
When will you ever consent to come?
We spend less time together than apart;⁶⁴
it's just my bad luck, bad luck.
I have been left all alone, but what can I do about it?
It makes it really hard to keep going.
During the third watch, my dreams are recurrent.

TO THE TUNE “INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES”:

By the third watch the moon has risen.
How hard it is to bear this interminable night.
The candle in its silver stand is sputtering out.
My pearly tears fall in two or three streaks.
Under my red satin comforter, half the bed is empty.
Where has he bestowed the handkerchief that I recently stitched for him?
My waist has become emaciated, as emaciated
as that of Shen Yüeh.⁶⁵

TO THE TUNE “SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD”:

My waist has become as emaciated as that of Shen Yüeh.
Every day I am more brokenhearted than ever with sorrow.
Yearning for my lover,⁶⁶ I shed tears in two streams, two streams.
Facing the caltrop-patterned mirror, I am reluctant to make myself up.
My alluring figure has become emaciated.⁶⁷
During the fourth watch, the night seems longer than ever.

TO THE TUNE “INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES”:

The fourth watch is as long as the day.
As I think of him on my pillow, before I know it, my tears begin to flow.
In the numinous god's temple, we swore fealty to each other.
We exchanged snippets of black hair
as tokens of our love.
But the promises he made to me have not been kept.
By now, he has abandoned me just like that “willow” in the quarter;⁶⁸
And I am left foolishly waiting for him in vain.

TO THE TUNE “SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD”:

I have been foolishly waiting
for you all day long;
When will this ever cease?
Longing for my lover, in vain do I lean on the belvedere, lean on the belvedere.
I fear my lover has wiped the slate clean with a single stroke.
I can't help knitting my brows.
During the fifth watch my pearly tears flow.

TO THE TUNE “INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES”:

At the fifth watch the cock crows.⁶⁹
Gradually I perceive that the day is beginning to dawn.
Breaking into tears, I am about to break into tears,
But I fear that other people will only laugh at me.
For a time my heart is on fire;
Burning incense, I seek my fortune before the gods.
The intentions of my fickle lover are known only to Heaven;
And I am left foolishly waiting
for him in vain.

TO THE TUNE “SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD”:

I have been foolishly waiting
for you all day long;
When will this ever end?
Beyond the eaves, ding-dong the wind chimes sound, the wind chimes sound;
Making it impossible for me to sleep.
While, at the same time, the cold ravens caw; Desolately and disconsolately,⁷⁰
right up till dawn.

TO THE TUNE “INTERLACED JADE BRANCHES”:

At dawn I do my hair and wash my face;
But, confronting my dressing mirror, I am reluctant to paint my eyebrows.
Then, on the eaves of my room, auspicious
magpies begin to chatter;
And my maidservant comes to report the good news, Saying, “Your lover has actually chosen to return.”
As the two of us enter the silken bed curtains together, I tell him, “You come closer. ‘I’ve got something to ask you.’”

TO THE TUNE “THE FLOWER IN THE REAR COURTYARD”:

“I’ve got something to ask you, you unfaithful scoundrel.
As you well know, you’ve been away for half a year now;
So why didn’t you send me so much as a single letter?
I believed that you had gone to take the examinations in order to become an official;
How could I know you were bewitched by ‘misty willows’
and addicted to the wine cup?
On your account, I had no choice but to endure loneliness;
While you were there, cuddling the red and hugging the turquoise.
On your account, I am sick with depression and unable to eat,
So that my jade body has become utterly emaciated.
I can endure the clear mornings, but fear the evenings.
During the first watch, I heard the cry of the solitary wild goose at the sky’s edge;
During the second watch, I suffered my dreaming soul to yearn after my absent lover;
But, during the fifth watch, upon my awakening,
I was unable to see any trace of you.”

TO THE TUNE “THE LEAVES OF THE WILLOW TREE”:

“Ah! I found myself all alone beneath my mandarin duck brocade quilt;

Deserted for my swallows' tryst, swallows'

By this time, Chin-lien had lost a series of rounds as she played at guess-fingers with Meng Yü-lou and had been forced to down ten or twenty cups of wine. No longer able to sit at her place, she set off for her quarters in the front compound, where she had to call out for what seemed like half a day before the postern gate was opened for her by Ch'iu-chü, who was still rubbing the sleep out of her eyes.

"So, you lousy slave, you've been asleep have you?" the woman said to her accusingly.

"I haven't been to sleep," protested Ch'iu-chü.

"It's obvious that you've just gotten up," the woman said. "You're just trying to deceive me. You've been taking it easy, rather than thinking of coming back to the rear compound to get me."

She then went on to ask, "Has Father gone to bed yet?"

"Father's been asleep for some time already," responded Ch'iu-chü.

The woman then went into the room that was furnished with a k'ang, where she pulled up her skirt and sat down on the k'ang to warm herself, while calling for some tea.

Ch'iu-chü hastily poured out a cup of tea for her, but the woman said, "You lousy slave! You'd pour tea for me to drink with those dirty hands of yours, would you? I won't drink any of that stale tea that has been steeped for so long it smells of the pot. Go call Ch'un-mei, and tell her to fill a little kettle with sweet water, put in an abundance of tea leaves, and boil it until it is good and strong, for me to drink."

"She's asleep in the other room with the bed in it," said Ch'iu-chü. "Wait till I call her to bring it for you."

"Don't call her, but let her sleep," the woman said.

Ch'iu-chü did not obey her but went into the other room, where she found Ch'un-mei lying fast asleep at Hsi-men Ch'ing's feet.

Shaking her awake, she said, "Mother has come back and wants some tea to drink. Haven't you even gotten up yet?"

Ch'un-mei spat at her, and cursed, saying, "You slave! You've been seeing things! So Mother has come back. So what? Why should you be in such a frightful stew over it, for no good reason?"

She then proceeded to get up:

Just as slow and easy as you please, stretched her waist, pulled on her trousers, and came to see the woman, still rubbing her eyes as she approached the k'ang.

The woman, for her part, chose to criticize Ch'iu-chü, saying, "That slave! You were fast asleep, and she woke you up."

"The kerchief on your head has jumped out of place," she then remarked to Ch'un-mei. "Why don't you pull it back down where it belongs?"

She went on to ask, "How is it that you're only wearing one pendant earring? Where did the other one go?"

When Ch'un-mei felt her ears, she found that she was, indeed, wearing only one gold openwork pendant earring. Lighting a lamp, she went to take a look at the bed in the other room but failed to find the missing object. After some time, unexpectedly, she found that it had fallen onto the footboard of the bed and picked it up.

"Where did you find it?" the woman asked her.

"It was all her fault," said Ch'un-mei, "when she insisted on:

Making such an unnecessary fuss,⁷⁶ over waking me up. It got caught on a curtain hook and fell onto the footboard, where I was able to recover it."

"I told her not to disturb you," the woman explained, "but she insisted on waking you up anyway."

"She said that you wanted some tea to drink," said Ch'un-mei.

"I do want a drink of tea," the woman said, "but I fear that her hands are not clean."

Ch'un-mei then dipped up a little kettleful of water, placed it on the brazier, and raked some charcoal around it. Before long it was hot enough to brew tea, and after rinsing out a cup, she poured out a strong serving of tea and handed it to the woman.

The woman then asked Ch'un-mei, "How long has Father been asleep?"

"I helped him to bed some time ago," responded Ch'un-mei. "He asked where you were, and I told him that you had not yet returned from the rear compound."

When the woman had finished her tea, she said to Ch'un-mei, "A while ago, I brought back some fruit and candied sweetmeats in my sleeve, that had been given to me by Yü-hsiao for my mother to eat. I turned them over to this slave here to take inside for you to put away."

"I haven't seen anything of them," said Ch'un-mei. "Who knows where she put them?"

The woman then called in Ch'iu-chü and asked her, "Where did you put that fruit?"

"It's here," responded Ch'iu-chü. "I put it in the cabinet."

So saying, she went and brought the things over to her.

The woman counted them over and, finding that a tangerine was missing, asked her what had happened to it.

"When Mother gave them to me," said Ch'iu-chü, "I brought them inside and put them in the cabinet. Surely you don't imagine I was suffering from such an avid craving as to blight my own mouth with it, do you?"

"You lousy slave!" the woman responded. "You still insist on talking back, do you? If you didn't snatch it, where did it go? I counted them with my own hand before turning them over to you. You lousy slave! You've simply been picking them up and secreting them for yourself, until only these measly:

Odds and ends,⁷⁷

are left. You've already consumed more than half of them. Under the circumstances, I'll have to teach you a lesson."

Then, turning to Ch'un-mei, she said, "You give that slave ten slaps on each side of her face."

"Those dirty cheeks of hers," responded Ch'un-mei. "I'd only be dirtying this hand of mine."

"You drag her over to me, then," the woman said.

Ch'un-mei pushed her over in front of the woman with both hands, and the woman pinched her cheeks, while taking her to task, saying, "You lousy slave! It was you who snatched this tangerine to eat, wasn't it? If you tell me the truth, I won't beat you. But if you don't, I'll get the riding crop, strip you naked, and whip you until I lose track of the strokes. No doubt, you thought I was drunk enough so that you could snatch it for yourself, while pulling the wool over my eyes, didn't you?"

She then turned to Ch'un-mei and asked her, "Am I drunk, or not?"

"Mother is perfectly sober," replied Ch'un-mei. "What does wine have to do with it? If you believe her, then she didn't eat it. But if you don't believe her, try groping inside her sleeve. I wouldn't be surprised if there were still tangerine peels in her sleeve."

The woman, then, pulled the sleeve over and started to grope inside it, but Ch'iu-chü tried to brush her aside with one hand, in order to prevent her from doing so. Ch'un-mei, then, intervened by pulling her hand away and, sure enough, was able to grope out some remnants of tangerine peel.

The woman responded by pinching her cheeks twice, as hard as she could, and giving her two full-handed slaps on the face, as she reviled her, saying, "You lousy slave! You hopeless scamp of a slave! You're hardly good at anything else, but it seems you're proficient at telling tales and snitching food to eat. These tangerine peels in your sleeve constitute:

Irrefutable proof of your guilt,⁷⁸

so you can hardly try to blame anyone else. I would give you a whipping right now, but Father is asleep here, and it's not an appropriate time to whip you while;

Anticipating tea or recovering from wine.

Tomorrow, when I'm completely myself, I'll settle accounts with you."

"Mother," said Ch'un-mei, "you ought not to be perfunctory about it tomorrow, but have her stripped completely naked, and get someone to give her a real shellacking, administering several tens of strokes with the bamboo. If she is made to suffer some real pain, it might throw some fear into her. If you merely touch her up with a few strokes of the rod, as if you were playing with a monkey, she won't take it to heart."

Ch'iu-chü's face was swollen from the pinches she had received at the woman's hands, and she took herself off to the kitchen with a pout on her lips.

The woman divided the other tangerine in two and also took an apple, and a pomegranate, and offered them to Ch'un-mei, saying, "I'm giving you these things to eat, while the rest should be kept for my mother."

Ch'un-mei did not evince any interest in these offerings but accepted them as indifferently as though she were:

Uncertain whether they were there or not,
and tossed them into a drawer.

The woman was also about to divide up the candied sweetmeats, but Ch'un-mei said, "There is no need for you to divide them. I am disinclined to eat such sweet things. Save them for your mother."

For this reason, the woman did not divide them and set them aside for her mother. But no more of this.

The woman sat down on the commode and urinated, after which she told Ch'un-mei to bring in the portable bidet and washed her private parts.

She then went on to ask Ch'un-mei, "What time is it by now?"

"The moon is sinking in the West," said Ch'un-mei, "so it must be sometime in the third watch."

The woman took off her jewelry and went into the bedroom, where she saw that the silver lamp on the table was guttering out, and proceeded to trim the wick. When she looked at the bed, she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing was lying there fast asleep and snoring loudly. Unfastening her silken girdle and doffing her skirt, she sat down to change into her sleeping shoes, took off her drawers, climbed into bed, and bored her way under the covers, where she:

Lay down head to head on the same pillow,⁷⁹ with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After lying there for a little while, she reached between his loins and felt for his organ. Although she manipulated it for a while, it refused to stand up. It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had engaged in sexual intercourse with Ch'un-mei not long before, so that his organ was as flaccid as cotton and could not be made to rise immediately. The woman, who had a bellyful of wine, and whose:

Lecherous desires were on fire,⁸⁰ squatted down underneath the bedding and began to suck his organ. Titillating the mouth of his urethra with her tongue, she engulfed his turtle head with her mouth and proceeded to move it:

Back and forth without ceasing.⁸¹

Hsi-men Ch'ing abruptly woke up and, seeing what she was up to under the covers, said, "You crazy little whore! Why did you not come back until now?"

"We have been drinking wine in the rear compound," explained the woman, "where Meng the Third had provided two square boxes of delicacies to go with the wine, and Big Sister Yü was singing to entertain us. We were keeping company with Sister-in-law Wu and Aunt Yang and have been enjoying ourselves all this time playing at guess-fingers and throwing dice. I defeated Li Chiao-erh and made her drunk in the process, but afterwards, Meng the Third out-played me at guess-fingers, and I had to drink several goblets of wine. You're lucky to have had some sleep, but if you think you can hold out on me, just see if I put up with it, or not."

"Have you got that band you were going to make?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"It's right here under the mattress," the woman said, pulling it out and showing it to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

She then proceeded to fasten it around the root of his chowrie handle, and then tie the two ribbons attached to it securely behind his back.

"Have you taken anything?" she went on to ask; to which Hsi-men Ch'ing replied, "Yes I have."

Before long, thanks to the woman's manipulation of his organ, behold:

Its protuberances swelled, its head sprang up, and

Its body swelled itself erect, until it reached the exceptional length of more than seven inches. The woman crawled on top of him and, finding that his turtle head was proud and large, stretched her labia apart with both hands and abruptly inserted it into her vagina. The woman embraced Hsi-men Ch'ing around the neck with both hands and told him to clasp her waist, while she continued to knead away at him in her superior position until his organ finally penetrated her to the root.

"Daddy," the woman cried out to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "take my bodice and put it under your waist to prop it up."

Hsi-men Ch'ing picked up her bodice of crimson satin from the head of the bed, folded it over itself four times, and used it to prop up his waist, while the woman straddled his body on all fours. After no more than a few thrusts, his organ penetrated her to the hilt.

Hsi-men Ch'ing First Tries Out the Band of White Satin

"Daddy," the woman said, "you can feel it with your own hand. It's gone all the way in and has stretched me to capacity on the inside. In case you're not satisfied yet, you can try to thrust it in further."

Hsi-men Ch'ing investigated with his hand and found that it had penetrated all the way to the root:

Without leaving a gap of even a hairsbreadth,⁸²

while only his two testicles remained outside,⁸³ and inside he felt a melting sensation the pleasure of which was indescribable.

"You certainly were in a hurry," the woman said. "The problem is that it's so cold we can't light a lamp and enjoy the sight of what we're doing. It's not as nice as it is in the summer. During these winter months, it's altogether too cold."

She then went on to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing, "How do you find this band compares with that silver clasp? It certainly seems superior to me, in that it doesn't hurt when it rubs against my labia. This band makes your organ grow even larger and increases its length significantly. If you don't believe me, try feeling my lower abdomen. It has penetrated almost as far as my heart."

She then went on to say, "You hold me. Today, I'd like to go to sleep on top of you."

"My child," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "go ahead and sleep. Daddy will hold you."

The woman stuck her tongue into his mouth and had him hold it there, while her starry eyes grew dim, as he embraced her fragrant shoulders.

After sleeping for a brief period, she could not prevent the flames of desire from enveloping her body, as her fragrant heart became disturbed.

Thereupon, supporting herself with her hands on his shoulders, she alternately raised and lowered herself, while he retracted his organ as far as the knob of the glans, and then plunged it in all the way up to the root, as she called out, "My own darling! That's enough. Your Fivey is dying."

But he continued coming and going, thrusting and retracting another three hundred times, until she finally came.

"My own daddy!" the woman cried out. "Squeeze me tightly around the waist."

At the same time, she offered Hsi-men Ch'ing a nipple to suck, and then, before she knew it:

She swooned completely away, and

Her vaginal fluids overflowed.

Before long, as the two of them lay in a mutual embrace, the woman became aware that:

Her heart was hopping like a little fawn.⁸⁴

In no time at all:

Her four limbs had become limp, and

Her cloudy locks were in disarray.

But, when Hsi-men Ch'ing's organ was withdrawn, it was still as stiff and hard as ever.

The woman wiped it off with a handkerchief, saying, "My own daddy! How is it that you haven't ejaculated?"

"Wait until we've had some sleep," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "after which, we can start to play again."

"I'm not sure I'll be up to it," the woman said, "my body's feeling so flaccid and feverish."

Afterwards, once:

The clouds dispersed and the rain evaporated,
the two of them:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,

went to sleep on the bed:

Unaware that the sun had already risen in the East.⁸⁵

Truly:

If one were to casually shine the light of a silver lamp upon them;

They would appear to be a natural-born pair of interlocking branches.

Chapter 74

CENSOR SUNG CH'IAO-NIEN SOLICITS THE EIGHT IMMORTALS TRIPOD; WU YÜEH-NIANG LISTENS TO THE PRECIOUS SCROLL ON WOMAN HUANG

Years ago, when I was traveling in the South, you entertained me as a guest;
Provided with cups of Tun-hsün wine,¹ together we enjoyed the verdant spring.
Foaming over from its sparrow-shaped vessels,
the barbarian wine was smooth;
As you remind me with the jeweled words of your message on new Szechwan paper.
The flowers were allured by our passing steeds, their reds following the bridles;
The grass was attracted by our moving vehicles,
its green surrounding the wheels.
Since we parted amid the flourishing foliage on the road south of Cheng-chou, Who knows who has been heir to those beauties of the breeze and the moonlight?²

THE STORY GOES that Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced P'an Chin-lien and slept until the dawn of the following day.

When the woman saw that his organ was still standing straight up as though it were a stick, she said, "Daddy, you'd better make the best of it by letting me off for now. I can't handle any more. Let me suck you off instead."

"You crazy little whore!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You might as well give it a suck. If you succeed in sucking it off, it will be your good fortune."

The woman actually squatted down between his loins and, pillowing her head on one of his thighs, proceeded to manipulate his organ with her mouth, sucking away at it for a good hour, without getting it to ejaculate. Hsi-men Ch'ing held onto her powdered neck with one hand while alternately submerging and exposing the knob of his glans, and wobbling his organ back and forth. She pumped it in and out of her mouth unceasingly, until white saliva overflowed from her lips, and rouge stains appeared on the stem of his organ.

Just as he was about to ejaculate, the woman questioned Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "Ying the Second has sent invitations inviting us to his place on the twenty-eighth. Are we going to go, or not?"

"Why shouldn't you go?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You should all get yourselves ready and go."

"There is something I'd like to ask of you," the woman said. "Will you agree to it, or not?"

"You crazy little whore!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What have you got to ask? Why not just come out with it?"

"I'd like you to get out that fur coat of Sister Li's and let me wear it," the woman said. "Tomorrow, when we come back from the party, the others will all be wearing their fur coats, but I alone will be without one to wear."

"There is that fur coat that was pawned with us last year by the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You might as well wear that."

"I don't want to wear something that's been pawned," the woman said. "Besides, you've already turned it over to Li Chiao-erh to wear, and given Li Chiao-erh's fur coat to Sun Hsüeh-o. I'd like to wear that fur coat of Sister Li's. If you get it out and give it to me today, I'll attach two crimson brocaded sleeve linings and wear it with my white satin jacket. If you let me have it, rather than giving it to anyone else, it will be an acknowledgment that I've been a good wife to you all this time."

"You lousy little whore!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "All you care about is gaining petty advantages for yourself. That fur coat of hers is worth sixty taels of silver, with its glossy, jet black fur trimming. If you wear it, you will only make an ostentatious show of yourself."

"You crazy slave!" the woman retorted. "It's not as though you were giving it away to the wife of some nobody. After all, it's your own spouse you're giving it to, and it will only serve to enhance your prestige. What's the point of making such a fuss about it? How would you like it if I refused to comply with your wishes in the future?"

"You're:

Asking a favor on the one hand, and Being hard-boiled on the other,"

said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You crazy indecent good-for-nothing!" the woman said. "Am I no more than a maidservant in your room, who must give in to your every demand?"

As she spoke, she laid his organ against her powdered cheek and brushed it back and forth for some time before, once again, inserting it into her mouth,³ and titillating the orifice of his urethra with her tongue. After a while, she fell to licking his frenum with the tip of her tongue and toying with the knob of his glans and then, engulfing it with her ruby lips, devoted herself to moving it back and forth.

P'an Chin-lien Uses Her Fragrant Cheek to Caress the Jade

The extremity of Hsi-men Ch'ing's magic rhinoceros horn felt anointed, his brain was flooded with a range of lustful feelings,⁴ and in a little while, as his semen began to rise, he called out repeatedly, "You little whore! Squeeze it tightly. I'm about to come."

Before he had finished speaking, his semen ejaculated all over the woman's mouth and face, and she dutifully swallowed it down, mouthful after mouthful. Truly:

Past mistress of the intimate arts,
she caters to his every whim;
How quick she is, and diligent,
to "play the purple flute."

That day was the one on which Secretary An Ch'en had arranged to host a party on his premises, so Hsi-men Ch'ing got up to comb his hair and wash his face and had started to go outside when the woman, who was still lying under the covers, said, "You'd better take this opportunity to find that fur coat for me. If you put it off, you won't have any time to spare."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, made his way over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters, where the wet nurse and maidservant had already arisen, straightened things up, and prepared a kettle of tea water in anticipation of his arrival.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came in and sat down, he asked, "Have you presented an offering to your mistress, or not?"

"By now," said Ju-i, "it is already quite a while since the offering was presented."

Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that Ju-i was wearing a jade-colored jacket that opened down the middle, over a white cotton skirt, and pale green satin shoes with high sand-green heels. Her face was lightly daubed with rouge and powder,⁵ her mothlike eyebrows were painted long, her lips were tinted bright red with shiny rouge, from her ears were suspended two gold clove-shaped ear pendants, and on her hands she sported four black gold rings that had been bestowed upon her by Li P'ing-erh. With an ingratiating smile, she presented him with tea and then sat down to one side in order to chat with him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Ying-ch'un back to the rear compound to get the keys to the bedroom, and Ju-i asked him, "Father, what are you getting them for?"

"I am looking for her fur coat," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "in order to let the Fifth Lady wear it."

"Do you mean that sable coat of Mother's?" asked Ju-i.

"Yes," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She would like to wear it, so I am going to give it to her now."

When Ying-ch'un had departed on her errand, Hsi-men Ch'ing took the woman onto his lap, cupped her breasts with his two hands in order to stimulate her nipples, and remarked, "My child, though you have borne a child, your nipples are still tight."

The two of them then fell to kissing each other face to face, and sucking each other's tongues.

"I have noticed, Father," said Ju-i, "that you are constantly choosing to spend your time with the Fifth Lady. I haven't seen you frequenting the quarters of any of the other ladies. Whatever her other characteristics may be, she is altogether too touchy and unable to make allowances for others. Some time ago, while you were still away from home, she got into a big row with me over the laundry bat, but fortunately Auntie Han and the Third Lady were able to intervene and separate us. Later on, when you returned home, I did not venture to mention it to you; but some talkative person, I don't know who, not only mentioned it to you, but also told her that you had been making out with me. Did she also tell you about our quarrel?"

"Yes, she did tell me about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "In the future, you would do well to offer her an apology. If she manages to pick up so much as a sweet date from someone, she's as pleased as can be. Although she may be sharp-tongued, she doesn't really mean what she says."

"When you came home, the day after we had our quarrel," said Ju-i, "she made a point of speaking nicely to me, saying that since you chose to spend much of your time with her, the other ladies of the household were prone to cut her some slack. 'But if you are careful not to keep me in the dark about anything,' she went on to say:

'There's water enough in the channel for all the boats,

why should I go out of my way to make trouble for you?'"

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "the two of you ought to be reconciled to each other."

He then went on to promise the woman, "If you wait up for me, I'll come to this room to sleep tonight."

"Are you really going to come?" asked Ju-i. "Don't try to deceive me."

"Who's trying to deceive you?" Hsi-men Ch'ing protested.

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Ying-ch'un, who came back with the keys. Hsi-men Ch'ing told her to unlock the bedroom door and then open the cabinet and get out the fur coat. After giving it a good shaking and wrapping it up in a package, he told Ying-ch'un to take it over to the adjacent room.

Ju-i then said to Hsi-men Ch'ing in a low voice, "I don't have a good fur coat myself. How about taking advantage of the occasion to find another one for me? And if any of Mother's undergarments are available, you might also provide me with a set of them."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly told her to open the trunk and came up with a set of clothes consisting of a kingfisher-blue satin jacket, a yellow cotton skirt, a pair of blue Lu-chou silk drawers, and a pair of figured ankle leggings. He turned them over to her, and the woman kowtowed to him in thanks, after which Hsi-men Ch'ing locked the bedroom door and went out, telling her to take the fur coat and deliver it to Chin-lien's quarters next door.

Chin-lien had just gotten up, and was still sitting on her bed engaged in putting on her foot bindings, when Ch'un-mei announced, "Ju-i has come to deliver the fur coat."

The woman, who understood the significance of the fact that she had been sent on this errand, said, "Tell her to come in," and, when she had done so, asked her, "Was it Father that sent you?"

"It was Father who told me to bring it for you to wear," Ju-i replied.

"And did he also present you with anything, or not?" Chin-lien inquired.

"Father did provide me with two items of silk clothing to wear during the New Year's celebrations," said Ju-i. "And he also told me to come and kowtow to you."

So saying, she came forward and kowtowed to her four times.

"That is not appropriate among sisters," the woman said. "If your master has taken a fancy to you, as the saying goes:

A multitude of boats need not clog the channel,

A multitude of carts need not block the road.

Why should I go out of my way to make trouble for you? So long as you do nothing to offend me, I'll have no reason to interfere with you. I've got one shadow too many around here as it is."

"Ever since my mistress died," said Ju-i, "although the First Lady in the rear compound has taken her place, you are still the presiding mistress of the front compound, and the one I look to for support, early and late. If I presumed to take any liberties with you, where would I be when:

The fallen leaves return to the root?"⁶

"As for those items of clothing that you have received," the woman said, "you had better mention the matter to the First Lady, hadn't you?"

"I asked the First Lady for them a while ago," said Ju-i, "and she said, 'Wait until Father opens her bedroom someday, and he'll give you an item or two.'"

"So long as you have spoken to her about it, it should be all right," the woman said.

Ju-i thereupon took her leave and returned to Li P'ing-erh's quarters next door, where she found that Hsi-men Ch'ing had already gone out to the front reception hall.

Ju-i then asked Ying-ch'un, "When you went to get the keys, just now, did the First Lady have anything to say about it?"

"The First Lady asked me, 'What does Father want the keys for?'" replied Ying-ch'un. "But I didn't tell her that he wanted to give her fur coat to the Fifth Lady, but merely said, 'I don't know.' The First Lady didn't have anything further to say."

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the reception hall, he saw that the preparations for the banquet were under way. The troupe of Hai-yen actors, including Chang Mei, Hsü Shun, and Kou Tzu-hsiao, performers of the leading male and female roles, arrived, bearing their costume trunk, and, along with the four boy musicians, Li Ming and company, who had come earlier, they all proceeded to kowtow to him. Hsi-men Ch'ing directed that food should be provided for all of them and then ordered that Li Ming and two of the other boy musicians should perform in the front reception hall, while Tso Shun should entertain the female guests in the rear compound.

That day, Han Tao-kuo's wife Wang Liu-erh did not attend but sent Second Sister Shen in a sedan chair, with two boxes of gifts, accompanied by their servant Chin-ts'ai, in order to help celebrate Meng Yü-lou's birthday. Wang Ching escorted them back to the rear compound and sent the sedan chair on its way. That day, Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, the wife of Han Ming-ch'uan, and her sister-in-law, Meng the Elder's wife, from outside the city gate, also came, as well as the wives of Fu Ming and Kan Jun, Big Sister Tuan, the wife of Ts'ui Pen, and Pen the Fourth's wife.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was in the reception hall when he saw Tai-an escorting a woman through the enclosed passageway who was petite in stature and was attired in a green satin jacket over a red skirt and a blue gold lamé headband, whose face was devoid of rouge and powder,⁷ and whose two eyes were mere slits, reminding him of the appearance of Cheng Ai-yüeh. When Hsi-men Ch'ing asked who it was, Tai-an replied that it was the wife of Pen the Fourth. On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing had nothing further to say but went back to the rear compound to see Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh-niang was serving tea to her guests when Hsi-men Ch'ing came in to eat some congee and handed the keys back to her.

"What did you open her bedroom door for?" asked Yüeh-niang.

Hsi-men Ch'ing explained, "P'an the Sixth said that when you all go to attend the party at Ying the Second's place tomorrow she will be the only one without a fur coat and would like to have Li P'ing-erh's fur coat to wear."

Yüeh-niang gave him a look and said, "You don't seem able to control your own mouth. When she died, you were angry that anyone would even suggest reassigning the maidservants in her quarters, but in the present case, you haven't a word to say about disposing of her property. There is a fur coat available for her, but she refuses to wear it and adamantly insists on having this particular coat to wear. It's lucky for you that Li P'ing-erh is dead, so you can hanker after this fur coat of hers. If she weren't dead, you wouldn't be entitled to do anything more than take a look at it."

With these few words, she succeeded in reducing Hsi-men Ch'ing to silence.

Suddenly, it was reported that School Official Liu had come to return the silver he had borrowed, and Hsi-men Ch'ing went out to the reception hall to receive him.

Who should appear at this point but Tai-an, who came in with a calling card and said, "The household of Imperial Commissioner Wang has delivered some presents."

"What sort of presents are they?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"They are congratulatory gifts," said Tai-an, "consisting of a bolt of fabric, a jar of southern wine, and four delicacies to go with the wine."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the calling card read, "Deferentially presented as a token of his respect by your kinsman and pupil Wang Ts'ai."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly summoned Wang Ching and told him to prepare a thank-you note in reply, award the messenger with five mace of silver, and send him on his way.

Who should appear at this point but Li Kuei-chieh, who got out of her sedan chair at the front gate, accompanied by a male servant from her establishment bearing four square boxes of gifts.

This threw Tai-an into such consternation that he offered to carry her felt bag for her, saying, "Kuei-chieh, let me escort you inside through the enclosed passageway. School Official Liu is being entertained in the reception hall."

Li Kuei-chieh, accordingly, made her way back into the rear compound through the enclosed passageway, while Lai-an carried the gift boxes into Yüeh-niang's room.

"Has Father seen these gifts, or not?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Father is entertaining a guest and hasn't seen them yet," explained Tai-an.

"Leave the gifts in their boxes and put them in the parlor for the time being," directed Yüeh-niang.

After a while, when School Official Liu had left, Hsi-men Ch'ing came back to the master suite to have something to eat, and Yüeh-niang told him, "Li Kuei-chieh has brought some gifts for us here."

"I didn't know anything about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When Yüeh-niang told Hsiao-yü to open up the boxes, they saw that one contained molded cakes of glutinous rice flour, with a sweet stuffing, and the character for long life embossed on their surfaces; one contained molded cakes embossed with the images of the Eight Immortals and flavored with attar of roses; one contained two roast ducks; and one contained a pair of pig's trotters.

Whom should they see at this point but Li Kuei-chieh, who came out from one of the inner rooms.

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, further enhanced with a white drawnwork kerchief, and she wore a crimson jacket that opened down the middle, over a blue satin skirt. Facing Hsi-men Ch'ing, she proceeded to kowtow to him four times.

"That's enough of that," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What did you go to the trouble of buying these presents for?"

"Just now," said Yüeh-niang, "Kuei-chieh told me that she was afraid you were annoyed with her, but that she was not responsible for what happened. If you consider the matter, it was all her mother's fault. On the day in question, Kuei-chieh was suffering from a headache, when Wang the Third, with a bunch of followers, who was on his way to Ch'in Yü-chih's place to engage her services, happened to pass by the door of her establishment and dropped in for a cup of tea. That was when the authorities stormed in and broke up the party, but Kuei-chieh never even came out to see him."

"On that occasion you never came out to see him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and on this occasion you never came out to see him. Your story simply doesn't hold water. But, on due consideration, I'm hardly in a position to control you. It's not as though the door of your Verdant Spring Bordello were piled high with baked wheat cakes, or anything like that."

The hole in the cash has much the same shape wherever you find it.

I'm really not annoyed with you."

Li Kuei-chieh remained kneeling on the floor and refused to get up, saying, "Father is right to be annoyed. But if he ever laid a hand on me, may my body rot completely away, and develop an abscess in every hair follicle. It was all the fault of my senile old dotard of a mother, who doesn't know what she's doing. She indiscriminately welcomes both the good and the bad into our place and only ends up annoying Father for no good reason."

"Well, since you're here," interjected Yüeh-niang, "you might as well make it up between you. What's the point of continuing to be annoyed?"

"You can get up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm no longer annoyed with you, that's all."

Li Kuei-chieh, putting on a deliberate act, said, "Father, you'll have to give me a smile before I'll get up. If you refuse to give me a smile, I'll remain kneeling here for a year without getting up."

Without any warning, P'an Chin-lien interrupted from the sidelines, saying, "Kuei-chieh, you should stand up for yourself. As long as you continue to kneel there, beseeching the favor of that pip-squeak, you're only encouraging him to put on airs. At present, you may be kneeling to him here, but in the future, when he visits your establishment, he will have to kneel to you. When that happens, you should pay no attention to him."

This speech caused both Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang to laugh, and it was only then that Li Kuei-chieh stood up.

Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who came inside in a state of obvious agitation and announced that His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien and His Honor An Ch'en had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing sent for his formal clothes, put them on, and went out to welcome them.

Li Kuei-chieh then said to Yüeh-niang, "Ai-ya-ya! From now on, I'll have nothing to do with Father but will continue to be a daughter to you, Mother."

"As for those empty oaths of yours," said Yüeh-niang, "I've already heard enough of them. On two earlier occasions when he went into the quarter to visit you, you were nowhere to be found."

"My Heavens!" exclaimed Li Kuei-chieh. "You're killing me. Father never came to my place. If he ever paid a visit to my place and I allowed him to lay a hand on me, may I die an early death, and my whole body break out in abscesses. Mother, you've been taken in by a false report. It wasn't my place he visited on those two occasions but was probably that of Cheng Ai-yüeh, where he's been patronizing that young powdered face. This accusation must have been fabricated by her and been motivated by jealousy. Why else should Father be annoyed with me?"

"Each of us has her own life to live," interjected Chin-lien. "Why should she make such an accusation against you?"

"Fifth Lady," said Kuei-chieh, "you don't understand the nature of people in our profession, who are given to taking out their anger on one another."

Yüeh-niang picked up where she left off, saying, "What is the difference between you denizens of the quarter and the rest of us? We are all alike in that when we get angry with each other, the one with the most favor will trample the other underfoot."

Yüeh-niang then proceeded to provide her with a serving of tea. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing had welcomed Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien and Secretary An Ch'en into the reception hall, they exchanged greetings, and each of them affirmed his esteem by presenting him with the customary gifts of a piece of fabric and a book. Upon seeing the meticulous preparations that had been made for the banquet, they:

Expressed their gratitude without end.⁸

After the three had taken their seats in the positions appropriate for guests and host, the actors were summoned into their presence and instructed that when His Honor Ts'ai Hsiu arrived they should do their utmost to put on a good performance.

Before long, after they had consumed a serving of tea, Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien said, "Your pupil has a request that he would like to trouble you with, Ssu-ch'üan. At present, the Grand Coordinator of Shantung, Hou Meng, has just been promoted to the post of chief minister of the Court of Imperial Sacrifices. Your pupil, along with the officials of the Two Provincial Offices, would like to host a party in his honor on the thirtieth, if we could borrow your distinguished premises in order to proffer him a farewell cup of wine, since he is scheduled to leave for the capital on the second day of the coming month. But we don't know if you are willing to consent to this, or not."

"Whatever you propose, venerable sir," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I will not fail to comply with your command. But I do not know how many table settings will be required."

"Your pupil has some joint contributions here," said Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien."

He then summoned an attendant and took out of his felt bag contributions from the officers of the Provincial Administration Commission and Provincial Surveillance Commission, including one from himself, making a total of twelve in all. Each person having contributed one tael, this amounted to a sum of twelve taels of silver.

"We will need," he went on to say, "one table setting of the kind intended as much for display as for eating, while, for the rest, communal seating will suffice. And you will also need to engage a troupe of actors for the occasion."

Hsi-men Ch'ing consented to the proposal and accepted the contributions, whereupon Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien got up from his place and bowed in gratitude.

In a little while, they were invited to take their seats in the great summer-house in the garden, the Hall of Assembled Vistas, where they were joined before long by the secretary of the Ministry of Revenue in charge of the Lin-ch'ing customs station, Ch'ien Lung-yeh. After greeting each other, and consuming another serving of tea, the three officials proceeded to set out the pieces and play a board game with each other.

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien observed that in Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence:

The buildings were spacious,
The courtyards were secluded, and
The books, paintings, and other cultural objects,
Were among the finest of the day.

He noticed that suspended in the chamber there was an antique horizontal scroll depicting four male figures holding aloft the character for long life. At the upper end of the room there was also a standing screen inlaid with mother-of-pearl, in front of which there stood an incense burner in the shape of a gilded tripod depicting the Eight Immortals bearing birthday gifts, which was several feet high and of exquisite craftsmanship. On seeing that the smoke of aloeswood incense was emerging from the mouths of the auspicious tortoise, crane, and deer depicted thereon, he went up to examine it, praising it unceasingly.

"This incense burning tripod is beautifully made, is it not?" he remarked to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Then, turning to the other two officials, he said, "Your pupil has written to his fellow graduate Mr. Liu in Huai-an, asking him to send such a vessel to me for presentation to the venerable Ts'ai Hsiu, but it has not yet arrived. Where did you ever get such a piece, Ssu-ch'üan?"

"It was also presented to your pupil by someone from the Huai region," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When this conversation ended, they continued to play at their board game. Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered his servants to bring in two partitioned tabletop boxes of assorted delicacies and stuffed pastries, and he also called for the actors who played the male and female leads to entertain them with some southern-style songs.

"The guest of honor has not yet arrived," said Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien. "It would hardly do for him to find the faces of his hosts already flushed from drinking."

"In this cold weather," opined Secretary An Ch'en, "it will do no harm to have a cup."

It so happens that Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien had already deputed a functionary to go and extend their invitation to Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu aboard the boat he was traveling on. Around noontime, this messenger reported back that he had conveyed the invitation, and that Ts'ai Hsiu was currently playing a game of chess at the home of Minister Huang Pao-kuang of the Imperial Brickyard but would arrive shortly. Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien accordingly dismissed him but told him to remain in waiting.

As they continued to play at their board game and drink wine, Secretary An Ch'en called for the players and said to them, "Sing that song suite that begins with the tune 'A Song of Spring' to go with our wine."

Thereupon, the actor who played the t'ieh-tan (supporting female role) began to sing to the tune "A Song of Spring".⁹

T'ieh-tan (playing the part of Hung-niang):

First, in order to allay your anxiety,
Second, to thank you for your efforts,
She has slain a sheep and provided refreshments.
By the time you show up, everything will have been prepared.
Uninvolved persons have not been invited;

It is no party for kinfolk and neighbors;
It is to celebrate your betrothal with Ying-ying.
I can see that nothing in Heaven or Earth could make him happier,
As he says, "I respectfully accept the invitation."¹⁰

TO THE TUNE "FIVE OFFERINGS":

Back and forth, he regards his image in the mirror.
What a pedantic scholar he seems to be;
what a foppish fellow!
He devotes all this attention to slicking his hair;
Sooner or later, a fly will lose his footing on it.
It is so shiny that it bids fair to blind one's eyes.
His affectedness is enough to set one's teeth on edge.
What a born young gallant;
What a congenital prodigy!

TO THE TUNE "AN ORIOLE AS ALLURING AS JADE":

During your happy engagement tonight,
Remember that Ying-ying has scarcely had any experience.¹¹

You must do everything you can to be tender and gentle.¹²

When entwining your necks like mandarin ducks under the lamplight,
Give your inamorata a real looking over.
Whether or not you are equally devoted,
The two of you can demonstrate to each other tonight.

Sheng (male lead):

Thank you sweetheart.
I am touched, Hung-niang, by your misplaced affection,
And your help in consummating this match.

TO THE TUNE "RELIEVING THREE HANGOVERS":

T'ieh-tan:

Tortoiseshell mats are spread; incense smolders in precious tripods;
Beyond the brocade curtains, the breeze sweeps the deserted courtyard.
Fallen red petals cover the ground,
their rouge now cold;
On the green jade balustrade,¹³ flowers cast their shadows.
Awaiting you are gold lamé bed curtains depicting mandarin ducks in the moonlight;
And folding jade screens adorned with kingfishers enjoying the breezes of spring.
The music of wedding bells,
Will be accompanied with phoenix flutes and ivory clappers,¹⁴
Patterned cithara and phoenix pipes.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

Sheng:

Alas, I am a wayfarer with only my books and sword,¹⁵ and can offer little as a betrothal gift.
If this match should actually be consummated,
I cannot thank you enough.
If preparations have really been made for me to enjoy a wedding celebration,¹⁶
I cannot but respond by plucking the cassia¹⁷ in order to ensure our future.
If we are fortunate enough to ride off together astride a pair of phoenixes,¹⁸ Tonight you can recline while contemplating the Herd Boy and the Weaving Maid.¹⁹
It is not mere luck that I may revel amid clustering pearls and kingfisher ornaments;
And thus conclude my former routine of devotion to yellow scrolls under a blue lamp.²⁰

CODA:

T'ieh-tan:

My venerable mistress is anxiously awaiting you.

Sheng:

As the saying goes, a respectful demeanor is not as good as obedient compliance.²¹

T'ieh-tan:

Don't make Hung-niang come to summon you again.²²

When they had finished singing, a docket officer suddenly came in and announced that His Honor Ts'ai Hsiu and His Honor Huang Pao-kuang had arrived. Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien promptly ordered that the table should be cleared, and, after adjusting their attire, they went out to receive their guests.

Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu was wearing a plain gown and a girdle with a plaque of gold and was accompanied by a considerable number of functionaries. He presented his calling card, which read, "Your devoted servant Ts'ai Hsiu," to Hsi-men Ch'ing, and then proceeded into the reception hall.

"This is our host, His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing," Secretary An Ch'en said by way of introduction. "He is currently serving as a battalion commander here and is also a protégé of your venerable father in the capital."

Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu bowed to him once again, saying politely, "I have long been an admirer of yours."

"I shall owe you a return visit," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

When they had finished with the customary amenities, they all loosened their clothing before sitting down, while the attendants served them with tea. After chatting for some time, they took their places at the table, and Hsi-men Ch'ing directed the boy actors to stand by in order to play and sing for them. Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu occupied the seat of honor, while the other four took their places as hosts. The chef came out and carved the entrée, which was accompanied by soup and rice, and the Hai-yen actors presented the list of pieces they were prepared to perform, from which Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu selected the drama Shuang-chung chi, or The Loyal Pair.²³

After two scenes had been performed, and:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed,

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien called for the players of the leading male and female roles to serve them with drinks and then perform the song suite that begins with the tune "Fresh Water Song," the first line of which is:

On my proud piebald steed I depart
the imperial capital.²⁴

Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu laughed, saying, "What an appropriate choice of a piece for performance, sir. You can be said to be:

The censor on a new piebald steed;
while these three gentlemen are like:

The purple-bearded adjutant of old."²⁵

"Today," said Secretary An Ch'en, "one can hardly say:

The marshall of Chiang-chou's blue gown is wet with tears."²⁶

When he finished speaking, they all broke out laughing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered Ch'un-hung to sing the song suite the first line of which is:

At the palace gate he has presented a memorial about pacifying the barbarians,²⁷ which made Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien as pleased as could be.

He then turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "This lad is quite adorable."

"He is one of my servants," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and is a native of Yang-chou."

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien took him by the hand, asked him to pour a cup of wine for him, and rewarded him with three mace of silver, for which Ch'un-hung kowtowed to him in thanks. Truly:

The sunlight outside the window goes its way
in a snap of the fingers;
The flower shadows in the banquet hall move among the revelers' seats.
No cup is drained but to the accompaniment of the music of pipes and song;
As, from below the steps, one hears the news that it is already 4:00PM.²⁸

Before anyone knew it:

The sun began to sink in the West.²⁹

When Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu became aware that it was getting late, he ordered his attendants to fetch his outer garments, put them on, and announced his departure. The other members of the company were unable to detain him any longer and escorted him to the front gate to see him off. Two docket officers were immediately dispatched to deliver his table setting of mutton and wine and a complimentary bolt of fabric to the port on the New Canal where he was staying overnight. But no more of this.

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien also bade Hsi-men Ch'ing farewell, saying, "I will not bother to express my gratitude today, since we will be troubling you again in a few days."

He and his fellow officials then got into their sedan chairs and departed.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing came back inside after seeing them off, he dismissed the actors and enjoined them, saying, "You are engaged to come back and perform again two days from tomorrow. Be sure to bring some of your best singers with you. His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien is entertaining Grand Coordinator Hou Meng that day."

"We understand," the actors replied.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered that another table for a drinking party be set up and sent Tai-an to invite Licentiate Wen to join him, and Lai-an to go and invite Ying Po-chüeh. It was not long before they arrived, one after the other, bowed in greeting, and took their seats, while three boy musicians stood by to entertain them and pour the wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then turned to Ying Po-chüeh and said, "When your sisters-in-law attend your celebration tomorrow, have you engaged singing girls, or vaudeville performers, for the occasion?"

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "you have a nice way of putting it. How could a poor household like mine accommodate such numbers? I've merely engaged two singing girls, that's all. I hope that my sisters-in-law will deign to come by early tomorrow."

To resume our story, the two boy musicians, Cheng Ch'un and Tso Shun, had been singing all day to entertain the ladies in the rear compound, when Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, and her sister-in-law, Meng the Elder's wife, were the first to get up and go.

Later on, Aunt Yang also prepared to leave, but Yüeh-niang said, "Auntie, why don't you stay another day before going home? Nun Hsüeh has instructed her disciples to bring a precious scroll with them, and they are going to recite it for us tonight."

"To tell you the truth," said Aunt Yang, "I would prefer to stay, were it not for the fact that my second nephew, Yang Tsung-pao, from outside the city gate, has sent someone to invite me to his betrothal party, which is taking place tomorrow, and I would like to attend."

Thereupon, she said her farewells and departed.

Yüeh-niang kept the wives of Fu Ming and Kan Jun, along with Pen the Fourth's wife, and Big Sister Tuan, in the master suite to keep company with Sister-in-law Wu, Old Mrs. P'an, and Li Kuei-chieh, while Second Sister Shen and Big Sister Yü took turns singing song suites to entertain them, the two boy musicians having been sent off to the reception hall in the front compound. The party continued until after the lamps had been lighted, when the wives of Hsi-men Ch'ing's three employees said goodbye and left. Only Big Sister Tuan remained, and she went off to spend the night in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters in the rear compound, while Old Mrs. P'an made her way to P'an Chin-lien's quarters. The only people left sitting in Yüeh-niang's room were Sister-in-law Wu, Li Kuei-chieh, Second Sister Shen, and the three nuns, along with Big Sister Yü, and Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien.

Suddenly, they learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing's drinking party had broken up, and the page boys began to bring back the utensils, at which Chin-lien hastily withdrew and set out toward the front compound. When she arrived there, she stood silently in the dark shadows beside the postern gate, where she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing, being supported by Lai-an, as he staggered in the direction of Li P'ing-erh's quarters. When he caught sight of Chin-lien standing by the gate, he took her by the hand and accompanied her into her quarters, while Lai-an proceeded back to the master suite to turn over the goblets and chopsticks he was carrying.

Yüeh-niang, assuming that Hsi-men Ch'ing was on his way back, sent Second Sister Shen, Li Kuei-chieh, and Big Sister Yü off to Li Chiao-erh's quarters and asked Lai-an, "Has Father come with you? What's he doing in the front compound?"

"Father has retired to the Fifth Lady's quarters," replied Lai-an. "He's had enough of it for this evening."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she became annoyed at heart and said to Meng Yü-lou, "Just look at that feckless good-for-nothing! I assumed that tonight, of all nights, when he came back inside, he would plan to go into your quarters, but instead, without anyone's knowing it, he has groped his way into that place of hers. These last few days, he has been so driven by his lecherous desires that all he wants to do is fool around with her in the front compound."

"Sister," said Meng Yü-lou, "let him fool around if he likes. If we object, it makes it look as though we give this one thing priority over everything else and are merely competing with each other for his favors. It reminds me of the punchline in that joke of Nun Wang's. After all, he has the run of all six chambers, does he not?³⁰ What Father lusts after in his heart is not something that you or I can control."

"It must surely have been prearranged," remarked Yüeh-niang. "Just now, upon hearing that the party up front had broken up, she took off for the front compound as though her life depended on it."

She then turned to Hsiao-yü and said, "If there is no longer anyone working in the kitchen, you can lock the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds for me, and then invite the three nuns to come back here, so we can listen to them recite a precious scroll for us."

She also invited Li Kuei-chieh, Second Sister Shen, Big Sister Tuan, and Big Sister Yü to rejoin them, after which, she turned to Sister-in-law Wu and explained, "I have already asked the nuns to send one of their disciples to fetch a copy of Huang-shih nü chüan, or The Precious Scroll on Woman Huang, to recite for us. It's too bad that Aunt Yang has already left today."

She then ordered Yü-hsiao to brew some good tea, but Meng Yü-lou addressed Li Chiao-erh, saying, "Let the two of us take turns providing the tea. It's not appropriate to impose a further burden on Elder Sister's staff."

Thereupon, they each went back to their own quarters and told their maidservants to take care of the tea.

Before long, when the three nuns had come in, and a bed table had been placed on the k'ang, they seated themselves behind it, in the lotus position, while the rest of the company crowded into the room and took their seats in order to hear the recitation of the precious scroll. Yüeh-niang washed her hands and lit some incense, while Nun Hsüeh opened The Precious Scroll on Woman Huang and proceeded to declaim it in a loud voice as follows.³¹

I have heard tell that, although the Dharma is not subject to annihilation, it is through extinction that we achieve nirvana; although the Way is not created, it is through creation that it is negated. The dharmakāya gave rise to the eight phases of the Buddha's life; the eight phases were manifestations of the dharmakāya. The lamp of wisdom is burning brightly,³² the better to open the doorways of this world; the mirror of the Buddha is shining clearly, in order to illuminate the paths of darkness.³³ The events of our hundred years of life elapse in an instant; the four elements that form our bodies³⁴ are as ephemeral as bubbles or shadows. Every day we exhaust ourselves in mundane labor; all day long we are obsessed by karmic consciousness. How can we comprehend perfect enlightenment³⁵ when our six senses are devoted to greed and lust? World-famous achievements³⁶ are merely grandiose dreams;³⁷ the most amazing wealth and distinction will not enable us to evade the word impermanence.³⁸ When we expire like wind or fire, neither the old nor the young are spared;³⁹ when the hills and streams are eroded away, what heroes will there be?⁴⁰ What I propose to do is: broadcast a gatha to the ten directions, summoning all eight classes of supernatural beings to the altar,⁴¹ to save them from incineration in the burning house,⁴² and give them a key to nirvana.

Nun Hstieh Recites a Precious Scroll in the Buddhist Style

Gatha:

Wealth and distinction, poverty and want,⁴³
 each have their causes;
 Since they are predetermined, there is no reason to question them.
 If you have neglected to plant your seeds
 during the springtime;
 It is vain to expect your barren fields to produce an autumn harvest.⁴⁴

If you assembled bodhisattvas will listen to my exposition of the Buddhist dharma, this gatha of four lines that I have just recited was bequeathed to us by a patriarch of old. How should we explain the line:

Wealth and distinction, poverty and want,
 each have their causes?

In the case of you bodhisattvas, you are married to a husband who is possessed of high office and ample emolument,⁴⁵ and you reside in vast courtyards and secluded mansions. You have slaves and maidservants at your beck and call and are studded with gold and decked with silver. You grew up amid nests of satin and brocade and were born amid piles of silk and gauze.⁴⁶ When you desire clothing, you have a thousand trunks of satin and brocade; when you want food, you have delicacies of every variety.⁴⁷ You are fated to bask in glory and luxury, and enjoy wealth and distinction. These are all the results of the karma accumulated in your prior lives, which has bequeathed you a solid foundation, to which you are entitled without having to ask for it. For the same reason, I am fortunate to be here promulgating the scriptures and reciting Buddha's name, as well as enjoying such delicious refreshments, thanks to your benevolent hospitality. That I am fated to fare so well is no inconsequential matter.⁴⁸ We are all predestined to be present at the Dragon Flower Assembly,⁴⁹ thanks to the good karma that we have earned during our previous lives. Had we failed to do so, it would be like neglecting to plant seeds in the springtime, only to face barren fields at the time of the autumn harvest. In such a case, where would the ripened seed-bearing fruit come from? Truly:

Sweep clear the spirit tower of your mind,
the better to begin to work;
However happy and gratified you may become,
do not relax your efforts.
Struggle to wash clean the five impurities along with the six senses;
Only then will you apprehend the mysterious doctrine⁵⁰ and find the truth.

The hundred years of one's human existence⁵¹ vanish in the blink of an eye;
This body of ours is fated to be transformed into nothing but flying ashes.
Who is able during this present incarnation to attain true enlightenment;
To arrive at total comprehension of the need to revert to the noncreated?⁵²

Human existence is absolutely impermanent,⁵³ gone in the space of a breath;
It resembles the sight of the red sun as it sinks behind the western hills.
Just like returning empty-handed after one traverses a hill of treasures;
Once your human life is lost,⁵⁴ it may be hard to recover in a myriad kalpas.⁵⁵

When one comes to think about it, wealth and honor, glory and luxury,⁵⁶ are like snow when sprinkled with scalding water.⁵⁷ Upon careful consideration, not one of them amounts to anything; but will prove to be as evanescent as an interrupted dream. Though you may, at present, have achieved incarnation as a human being, in your heart you are distressed⁵⁸ and troubled lest, upon your death, the four elements of which you are constituted may be transformed to dust,⁵⁹ and you do not even know where what is left of your soul will be sent to suffer. If you are fearful of the revolving wheel of life and death,⁶⁰ you must resolve to take a step in order to move forward.⁶¹

TO THE TUNE "A SINGLE MISSIVE":

Confronted with the alternatives of life and death,
One's days are spent sighing over this floating life.
Though one may have rooms full of boys and girls,
When death comes, one is forced to face it oneself.
One's life is like a spring dream,⁶² certain to be short; One's fate is but a wind-blown lamp⁶³ that cannot last long.⁶⁴
When one thinks about it,
One can only be saddened;
To bring it up is enough to cause one's heart to break.⁶⁵

The prolegomenon of the precious scroll says: The Buddha who reveals himself in response to cries of distress, who neither comes nor goes,⁶⁶ the supreme patriarch Amitābha, whose great vows are so vast and profound, has sworn his forty-eight vows⁶⁷ to work for the salvation of all living beings, until each and every one of them is enabled to achieve the realization of his true nature. The mind of Amitābha is ever pure, enabling him to ferry all living beings across the sea of bitterness, the great waves of the sea of bitterness, so they may attain the wonderful fruits of enlightenment. The recitation of this text will serve to alleviate sins as numerous as the sands of the Ganges; the invocation of this text will serve to augment good fortune without limit. Those who copy this text or recite it will be reborn in the Heaven of the Lotus Treasury,⁶⁸ those who either read it or hear it, upon their deaths will proceed to the Pure Land of the Western Paradise. All those who recite Buddha's name will achieve unlimited merit. Relying on his compassion, his compassion, his great compassion, commit yourselves to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha in all ten directions, sincerely paying homage to the eternal nature of the Three Jewels, for the wheel of the law turns unceasingly, to save all living beings.⁶⁹

Gatha:

The subtle and mysterious dharma of utmost profundity, Is difficult to encounter even in myriads of kalpas.
Now that we have heard it, and are able to keep it,
We wish to understand the true meaning of the Tathāgata.⁷⁰

The Precious Scroll on Woman Huang has just been opened;
May all the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas⁷¹
come down to hear it.⁷²
The incense in the burner permeates
the world of vacuity;
The sound of Buddha's names shakes
the nine directions.

In former days, when the Han emperor governed the world, the rains were seasonable, the winds were favorable,⁷³ the country prospered, and the people were content,⁷⁴ which elicited the birth of a good-hearted woman, the daughter of a householder named Huang, who resided in Nan-hua district of Ts'ao-chou prefecture. She possessed well-proportioned and good-looking features and was only six years old when she determined to restrict herself to vegetarian fare,⁷⁵ and recite the Diamond Sutra, in order to repay the profound kindness of her father and mother.⁷⁶ She did this every day without fail, which moved the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin to manifest herself to her in midair. When her parents saw that she devoted herself all day long to the recitation of the sutra, they did their best to dissuade her, but she refused to comply. One day, they sought out a go-between, selected a propitious day and hour,⁷⁷ and married her off to a son-in-law, whose name was Chao Ling-fang, and who was a butcher by vocation. They remained married for twelve years, during which they gave birth to one son and two daughters. One day, Woman Huang said to her husband, "You and I have been married for twelve years and have given birth to these attractive children, but to devote ourselves solely to our mutual affection is to be eternally immersed in samsara."⁷⁸ I happen to know a little lyric, which I would persuade you to listen to, my husband. It goes as follows:

Our fates determined that we should become a couple as husband and wife.
Although we have a son and daughters,
Who can enable us to stave off death?
I humbly hope that you as my husband,
Will reach a determination like mine,
To practice religious cultivation,
For the rest of our natural lives.
Our fondness for wealth and honor,
Should be given a diminished role.
Ceasing to long for fame and fortune,
We should live out our allotted days.

When Chao Ling-fang had assimilated the content of the lyric, he did not feel that he could accept it. One day, he said farewell and set out for Shantung in order to purchase some pigs. Woman Huang, seeing that her husband was not at home, took her rest in a purified chamber every day, faithfully performed her ablutions, lit incense, and devoted herself to the reverent recitation of the Diamond Sutra.

Chao Ling-fang, at the time, had already departed for Shantung; While their three boys and girls were to be found in the parlor.

Gatha in decasyllabic verse:

The Woman Huang, in her western chamber, bathed in perfumed water;⁷⁹ Changed her clothes, removed her earrings, and made herself up lightly.
Every single day, she faced toward the west,
burnt incense, and worshipped;
Confronted her rosary, and precious scroll, and recited the Diamond Sutra.
While perusing the text, before she had done,
the incense smoke dispersed;
Reciting Buddha's name, her voice resounded, pervading the empty firmament.
At the gates of Hell, and the halls of Heaven, rays of light became manifest;
When King Yama himself, became aware of this,
his face was suffused with joy.
"It must be that, in the realm of the living,
a Buddhist patriarch has appeared."
Hastily calling his two underworld Assessors, he bade them ascertain the details.
The Assessors reported back, "Your Majesty, the testimony heard affirms that,
In Nan-hua district, of Ts'ao-chou prefecture,
there is a virtuous believer;
The Woman Huang, who studies the sacred texts, and eats only vegetarian fare;
Whose good deeds, and meritorious austerities, have startled the halls of Heaven."

TO THE TUNE "SUTRA IN LETTERS OF GOLD":

On hearing these words, King Yama's heart was moved to respond,
And he hastily called before him a pair of messengers of death.
The pair of messengers speedily hastened to the Chao family's home.
The Woman Huang was at the time engaged in reading the sacred texts,
When she suddenly observed that there were two immortal lads before her.

RECITATION IN HEPTASYLLABIC VERSE:

Virtuous persons are summoned to the shades
by immortal lads;
Whereas evil persons must have yakshas sent to summon them.
Woman Huang, while perusing her sacred text, quickly enquired,
"Whose young lads are you that have chosen to come visit me?"
The immortal lads responded to Woman Huang with the words,
"Good-hearted woman that you are, you need not be concerned.
We do not belong among the mortal denizens of the mundane world,

 But are, rather, immortal lads who come from the world of shades.
 At present, because you so assiduously study
 the sacred texts,
 King Yama himself has sent you an invitation, good-hearted lady.”
 Upon hearing these words, Woman Huang became disturbed at heart, Proceeding, one point at a time, to plead with
 the immortal lads,
 “You must be looking for someone of the same name and surname.
 Why should you be so insistent on summoning me before King Yama?
 I am not unwilling to suffer a thousand or ten thousand deaths.⁸⁰
 But how can I abandon my precious boy and my two daughters?
 My eldest daughter, Chiao-ku, is only eight years of age.
 Pan-chiao is only five. How could she manage without her mother?
 My precious son, Ch’ang-shou, is merely two years of age.
 I constantly cradle him in my arms and could never forget him.
 If you can, somehow, find a way to spare this soul of mine,
 I undertake to perform more meritorious deeds on your behalf.”
 The immortal lads only replied to Woman Huang
 by reiterating, “Who is there as assiduous as you in reciting the Diamond Sutra?”

PROSE:

The two lads responsible for recording good and evil deeds⁸¹ were piteously pleaded with by Woman Huang, who repeatedly expressed her reluctance⁸² to proceed to the Underworld because of her love for her three children, whom she could bear neither to leave nor to abandon. The immortal lads urged her, saying, “Good-hearted woman:

If the Underworld decides to summon you during the third watch;
 The hour of your death cannot be delayed until the fourth watch.⁸³

The situation is not like that in the world of the living, where deadlines can be evaded. When you are summoned by the Underworld, if the deadline is not met, we are held strictly accountable, with no room for allowances.”

RECITATION IN HEPTASYLLABIC VERSE:

Woman Huang, after considering the situation in her heart, Proceeded to order a maidservant to heat hot water for her.
 No sooner did she finish bathing herself in perfumed water,
 Than she proceeded to make her way into the Buddhist chapel,
 Where she sat down in the lotus position and remained silent,
 While her numinous soul’s true being appeared before King Yama.⁸⁴

TO THE TUNE “AUTUMN ON THE CH’U RIVER”:

During the dream of mankind’s life,⁸⁵
 One’s allotted time is not enduring.
 When faced with danger, each of us is but a wind-blown lamp;
 In no time at all, we must return once more to face King Yama.
 One must hastily prepare for the journey,
 And gaze upon one’s home from the Terrace of Homeward Gazing Spirits.⁸⁶
 As one’s sons cry and one’s daughters weep,⁸⁷
 it is a scene of desolation.
 To the tune of clanging cymbals and beating drums, the funeral is held; Donning hempen garments and mourning apparel, one’s family lays one to rest.

RECITATION IN HEPTASYLLABIC VERSE:

Rather than speaking of Chao Ling-fang’s sense of desolation,
 Let us tell of the trip of Woman Huang’s soul to the underworld.

As she gradually approached the bank of the River of No Recourse,
 She came to a Golden Bridge that enabled her to cross unharmed.
 Should you enquire what the function of this bridge might be,
 It is only for those who read sutras and recite Buddha's name.⁸⁸
 By the banks of the River of No Recourse flow waves of blood,
 In which are seen the numerous drowning souls of sinful beings.
 The sorrowful sound of their weeping and wailing is ever present,
 As, on all sides, poisonous serpents bite into their exposed sinews.
 As she continued, she came to the Mountain of Damaged Paper Money.
 Woman Huang then stepped forward and asked to have it explained to her.
 "When you inhabitants of the world of the living burn paper money,
 And neglectfully discard it before it has been completely incinerated,
 The remains of it are blown about, reduced to tattered fragments,
 And are collected here to form the Mountain
 of Damaged Paper Money."
 Her route then took her by the base of the City of the Unjustly Dead,⁸⁹
 Where there were innumerable homeless souls who had not yet been reborn.
 When Woman Huang learned of this, her heart was filled with compassion, And, lifting up her voice, she proceeded to recite the Diamond Sutra.
 At this, the sinful beings in the River of No Recourse opened their eyes;
 Lunar woods became perceptible to the corpses of the burned and flayed;
 Lotus blossoms appeared to those in boiling cauldrons and lakes of fire;
 And auspicious clouds, forthwith, descended to envelop the Avici Hell.
 Thereupon, the immortal lads could not help feeling the pressing need,
 To hasten as quickly as possible in order to make a report to King Yama.

TO THE TUNE "SHEEP ON THE MOUNTAIN SLOPE":

When Woman Huang found herself in the Sen-lo Palace of King Yama, A lad reported that they had brought the scripture-reading person.
 King Yama decreed that she be invited into his presence,
 And Woman Huang kowtowed to him beneath the golden steps, Unable to do anything other than to genuflect before him.
 King Yama asked, "How many years ago did you start to recite the Diamond Sutra?
 And on what day, month, and year did you move Kuan-yin to appear before you?"
 Woman Huang folded her hands in front of her and related the preceding events.
 "Ever since I was six, I have eaten vegetarian fare and worshipped Her Holiness.
 I hope that Your Highness will consent to believe me when I state that, Since becoming married, my zeal for reciting the sutra has not diminished."

RECITATION IN HEPTASYLLABIC VERSE:

King Yama, upon hearing this, hastened to transmit an injunction, Saying, "Good-hearted woman, pay heed to what I have to ask you.
 How many characters are contained in the text of the Diamond Sutra?
 And how many strokes are required to render its esoteric profundities?
 With what character does it begin, and with what character does it end?

And what two characters are found to be situated at its midpoint?
 If you prove capable of reciting the sutra without making any errors,
 Your soul will be released in order to return to the world of the living.”
 Woman Huang, at this juncture, stood beneath the steps and replied, saying, “I hope that Your Majesty will listen to my report on the Diamond Sutra.
 The text consists of exactly five thousand and forty-nine characters,
 Which are written with eighty-four thousand dots and strokes of the brush.
 It commences with the character ju, and it ends with the character hsing.
 The two characters ho-tan are found to be situated at its midpoint.”
 Before Woman Huang had even finished her explication of the sutra,
 In his palace, King Yama emitted rays of light between his eyebrows.
 Raising his hand, and evincing pleasure on his dragon countenance,
 He stated, “Your soul is hereby released to return to the human world.”
 Upon taking in these words, Woman Huang hastened to respond, saying, “I hope that Your Majesty will condescend to pay heed to my requests.
 Firstly, I do not wish to be reincarnated in the home of a butcher.
 Secondly, I do not wish to be reincarnated in the household of a dyer.
 My only desire is to be reincarnated into the home of a good family, Where I can spend my time reading sutras and reciting Buddha’s name.” King Yama thereupon took up his brush and promptly issued a decision, “You will be reborn as a male child in the Chang family of Ts’ao-chou.
 That household has accumulated a fortune of considerable proportions,
 But lacks a filial son to offer sacrifices at the family burial ground.
 The householder and his spouse are equally devoted to cultivating virtue,
 And their reputation for so doing is widely known within the four seas.”
 No sooner did Woman Huang swallow a cup of a soul-disorienting drug,⁹⁰
 Than the wife of householder Chang conceived a male child in her belly.
 Once the ten months of her pregnancy were fulfilled, she bore a son,
 On whose left rib cage were inscribed two lines of characters in red, Reading, “This is a reincarnation of Woman
 Huang who recited the sutras,
 And was formerly married to Chao Ling-fang, who is a native of Kuan-shui.
 This reincarnation is the karmic result of her dedication to the sutras, Which has enabled her to become a man who is fated to live a long life.”
 When householder Chang had finished reading this text with his own eyes,
 He cherished his child as a precious jewel,⁹¹ showing his joy on his face.

TO THE TUNE “BLACK SILK ROBE”:

Woman Huang was reincarnated in the home of householder Chang, Her transformation into a male having occurred without a hitch.
 When householder Chang beheld his son,
 his pleasure was enhanced.
 After his first three years, it became clear he would grow up.
 By the time he was six years old, his intelligence was obvious.
 He assiduously studied his lessons and practiced his characters,

And took the name Chün-ta, or “Clever One.”
At the age of seventeen, he earned first place in the examinations.

PROSE:

To resume our story, when Chang Chün-ta was in his seventeenth year, he was successful in passing the examinations and was appointed magistrate of Nan-hua district in Ts'ao-chou prefecture. Suddenly, he recalled that this had been his native place during his former incarnation. After going to the district to take up his office, he first saw to the payment of the taxes owed to the government and then took his place in the courtroom in order to preside over his jurisdiction. As his first order of business, he dispatched two runners to summon Chao Ling-fang on the grounds that he had something to say to him. The two runners did not dare to be remiss but went immediately to the home of Chao Ling-fang in order to summon him to court.

RECITATION IN DECASYLLABIC VERSE:

Chao Ling-fang, in his home, was reading sutras and reciting Buddha's name.
The two runners, greeting him with a bow, hastened to explain their mission.
In no time at all, he adjusted his attire,
and accompanied them to the yamen.
Once in the courtroom, he performed a bow,
and proceeded to identify himself.
Magistrate Chang rose and returned his bow, directing him to take a seat.
Exchanging amenities, they sat down as guest and host, while tea was served.
“You really are,” he declared, “my husband, whose name is Chao Ling-fang; While I am none other than your former wife, known by the name Woman Huang.
If you doubt me, in a quiet room, I'll undress so you can see for yourself.
On my left rib cage, in cinnabar characters, is an explanatory inscription.
Our eldest daughter, whose name is Chiao-ku, has already found a married home.
Our second daughter, whose name is Pan-chiao, is wed to a man called Ts'ao Chen.
Our son Ch'ang-shou was so concerned for me,
that he kept vigil by my grave.
Let the two of us ride our horses together, to visit our ancestral tombs.”

PROSE:

Magistrate Chang, together with Chao Ling-fang and their children, five persons in all, proceeded to the grave of Woman Huang, where, upon opening her coffin and examining her corpse, they found that her countenance remained unaltered. After going home, they conducted a religious service for seven days, and Chao Ling-fang declaimed the Diamond Sutra, whereupon, in a flutter of propitious snow,⁹² all five of them, men and women, ascended to Heaven on an auspicious cloud. There is a lyric to the tune “Immortal at the River” that testifies to this:

Woman Huang read the Diamond Sutra and reaped the true fruit.
That same day, mounting to paradise,
All five of them ascended to Heaven.
Good people, pray to Kuan-yin, “Bodhisattva come and save us.”

PROSE:

Now that the recitation of the precious scroll is finished, the Buddhas and holy saints are aware of it. Since the dharma realm is responsive,⁹³ may it enable us all to ascend to the celestial assembly. Homage to the infinite significance of the Mahāyāna school of the One Vehicle, as embodied in the truly empty yet marvelously existing truth of the Diamond Sutra.⁹⁴ May the Buddhas in their vast assembly heed our invocation from afar, that they may enable all of us, in our multitudes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, to proceed to the Pure Land of the Western Paradise. It is our humble wish that the sound of the recitation of the sutra and the names of the Buddhas should penetrate the halls of Heaven above and the courts of the Underworld below, with the result that those who recite the Buddha's name may be delivered from the Sea of Bitterness;⁹⁵ those who commit evil deeds may be eternally immersed in samsara; those who achieve enlightenment may be conducted on the way toward salvation by the host of Buddhas, whose rays of glory illuminate the ten directions,⁹⁶ so that, to both east and west, the fading light may return to illuminate their path.⁹⁷ to both north and south, they may be able to find their way to their true home, and attain nirvana, as their drifting boats reach the shore.⁹⁸ Like little children, they may be reunited with their mother. Upon reentering their mother's womb, they will no longer have to fear the three calamities.⁹⁹ For a myriad kalpas, they may attain eternal peace.¹⁰⁰

Gatha:

The karmic encumbrances that have been produced by living beings,
From their very nonbeginning, on down
until the present time,
Have isolated them from the Sacred Peak,¹⁰¹ obscuring their true natures,¹⁰²
But, a single ray of numinous light¹⁰³ can deliver all forms of life.

Firstly, we must repay the kindness of Heaven and Earth for supporting us; Secondly, we must repay the kindness of the sun and moon for shining on us;
Thirdly, we must repay the kindness of our ruler for governing our land; Fourthly, we must repay the kindness of our parents for nurturing us; Fifthly, we must repay the kindness of our mentors for teaching the dharma; Sixthly, we must pray that the ten classes of homeless souls may all be reborn,
And attain the perfection of wisdom, enabling them to reach the other shore. ¹⁰⁴

By the time Nun Hsüeh finished reciting the precious scroll, it was already the second watch. Even before she was done, Yüan-hsiao from Li Chiao-erh's quarters had brought out some tea and served it to the company. After it was over, Lan-hsiang from Meng Yü-lou's quarters brought out a selection of exquisitely prepared appetizers, a jug of wine, and a large container of fine tea and served them to Sister-in-law Wu, Big Sister Tuan, Li Kuei-chieh, and the rest of the company. Yüeh-niang also directed Yü-hsiao to bring out four boxes of fine pastries and sweets to go with the tea for the three nuns.

Li Kuei-chieh ventured to say, "Since our three preceptors have entertained us by reciting a precious scroll, I ought to show my gratitude by singing a song for you."

"Kuei-chieh," said Yüeh-niang, "it would be an imposition to ask you to sing once again."

Big Sister Yü said, "Let me sing something for you first."

"All right," said Yüeh-niang, "let Big Sister Yü be the first to sing."

Second Sister Shen said, "After my elder sister has sung her piece, I will also sing a song for you."

Li Kuei-chieh, however, insisted on being the first to sing and asked Yüeh-niang, "What would you like to hear?"

Yüeh-niang responded, "Sing us that set of songs that begins with the words:

Late at night, all is silent."

Thereupon, Li Kuei-chieh, after serving the company with wine, took up her balloon guitar:

Defly extended her slender fingers,

Gently strummed the silken strings,

Opened her ruby lips,

Exposed her white teeth, and proceeded to sing to the tune "Flowers in the Moonlight":

Late at night, all is silent.

I have fumigated my bedclothes,

And waited until the moon has risen above
the flowering branches.

It is as quiet as can be, and I have not heard any news at all.

Only after the watch-drums have finished beating does he appear.

Upon seeing this face of mine, he pays it no attention whatever,

But kneels down at my side to make his plea.

I deliberately pretend to be angry;

He surreptitiously gives me a look;

But before I can even clench my teeth,

I simply can't help starting to smile.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

That profligate is hard at work,

Like a moth darting into the flame.

He does his best to keep me in the dark about his intentions,

But, for my part, it costs me no effort to figure them out.

Recently, however, I've had some trouble holding onto the rudder.

He's gone to such pains to manipulate me that my heart is touched,

Turning it into a honey-filled pastry.

Whoever it might be,

To say nothing of me,

Though I were made out of iron,

I might find it hard to resist.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

He is altogether too untrustworthy,

My fickle lover leaves me helpless.

For two or three nights, he has failed to come back to me;

Yet, when questioned, he makes excuses and pays no attention.

I can't help thinking that, maybe, I should simply put up with it.

With an ingratiating smile, he proceeds to turn down the bedclothes,

Waiting for me, half-exposed under the covers.

I pretend to be sewing a shoe, and ignore him.

That he is so exasperated with me,

Only causes me to be angry at him.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

He visits the flower lanes and willow markets, ¹⁰⁵

The bee go-betweens and butterfly ambassadors.¹⁰⁶

While I remain here, as pure as jade and immaculate as ice,¹⁰⁷

He is there, enjoying the sweet melons and honeyed apricots.

Upon returning, though sober, he pretends to be under the influence,

And devotes himself to beating the bushes to scare off the snakes.¹⁰⁸

He engages in such egregious nitpicking,

That I am tempted to scratch his cheeks,
But I fear it might destroy our intimacy.

Though I may want to let him have his way,

I'm too angry to let him get away with it.¹⁰⁹

When Li Kuei-chieh had finished singing, Big Sister Yü was about to take over the balloon guitar, but Second Sister Shen grabbed it away from her, hung it over her arm, and said, "I'll entertain Sister-in-law Wu and the rest of you by singing a song from a sequence on the twelve monthly festivals, to the tune "The Hanging Portrait." She then proceeded to sing the song suite that begins with the lines:

On the fifteenth day of the first month we celebrate the Lantern Festival,¹¹⁰

Burning so much incense that both Heaven and Earth seem to be on fire.

When she had finished singing, Yüeh-niang smiled and said, "We can continue to chat at our leisure. After all, the night is long enough for us to go on as long as we like."

At the time, Sister-in-law Wu was feeling fatigued by the lateness of the hour and retired without waiting to hear Big Sister Yü's performance. At this, after drinking a round of tea, the party broke up, and they all went back to their rooms to sleep. Li Kuei-chieh went back to Li Chiao-erh's quarters, Big Sister Tuan went to Meng Yü-lou's quarters, and the three nuns went to Sun Hsüeh-ho's quarters in the rear compound to spend the night. Big Sister Yü and Second Sister Shen went to bed with Yü-hsiao and Hsiao-yü in the room with the k'ang, while Yüeh-niang and Sister-in-law Wu spent the night in the bedroom of the master suite. But no more of this. Truly:

Orion is sinking, the Dipper is turning,¹¹¹

it is after the third watch;

The solitary hook of the waning moon¹¹² appears in the gauze window.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 75

CH'UN-MEI VILELY ABUSES SECOND SISTER SHEN; YÜ-HSIAO SPILLS THE BEANS TO P'AN CHIN-LIEN

The newly dug graves throughout the realm are all those of the young;
One should start to cultivate one's virtue before one's hair turns gray.
The fact that death and life are important matters¹ must be understood;
The length of time one may suffer in Hell is no trivial consideration.
If one's good karma has not been built up, on what can one hope to rely?
Once one loses the status of a human being,² when can it ever be recovered?
The path ahead of one is cloaked in darkness,
the thoroughfare is dangerous;
Throughout the twenty-four hours of the day
one should bear this in mind.³

THESE EIGHT LINES of verse merely reiterate the message that:

Good will be rewarded with good,
Evil will be rewarded with evil,⁴
Just as shadow follows shape,⁵
Or as valleys return an echo.

You may think that only those who:

Assume the lotus position to practice meditation,⁶
Will all be successful in reaping the true fruit.⁷

But even:

Simple men and simple women,⁸
Who cultivate piety at home, are not precluded from achieving the Way.
Those who worship the Buddha,
Will benefit from his virtue;
Those who recite Buddha's name,
Will benefit from his kindness;
Those who consider the sutras,
Will grasp the Buddha's truth;
Those who practice meditation,
Will tread the Buddha's realm;
Those who achieve enlightenment,
Will exhibit the Buddha's truth.⁹

But:

There is nothing easy about it.¹⁰

There are many who:

Commit sin first and practice austerity later,
Or practice austerity first only to sin again.¹¹

To take the case of Wu Yüeh-niang, although she received her just reward for daily:

Honoring goodness and reciting scriptures,

Worshipping Buddha and dispensing charity, she ought not, on the present occasion, while:

She was pregnant with a child in her womb,¹² to have listened to the recitation of such a piece of religious literature. Although whether one is fated to be rich or poor, to enjoy a long life or a short, or to be wise or foolish, may all be determined by the endowment one receives from one's parents at the time of conception; nevertheless, these things may also be affected by the environmental influences to which one is exposed during pregnancy.

In olden times, when mothers were pregnant, they did not sit in awkward positions, or lie upon their sides, and did not listen to lascivious sounds, or gaze upon suggestive sights.¹³ They would amuse themselves with the practice of poetry and calligraphy, or the appreciation of exotic objects of gold or jade, and would engage blind musicians to entertain them with ancient lyrics. As a result, when they subsequently gave birth to children of either sex, they would be well-formed and attractive and would grow up to be clever and intelligent. This is the mode of prenatal education prescribed by King Wen of the Chou dynasty.¹⁴

On this occasion, when Wu Yüeh-niang was pregnant, she ought not to have ordered Buddhist nuns to recite precious scrolls that dealt with the revolving wheel of life and death. Later on, this inspired an ancient Buddha to manifest himself by:

Entering her womb and taking an abode, only to subsequently vanish into thin air, so that she was left without an heir to carry on the family line, which was very much to be regretted. Truly:

The path ahead of one is clothed in darkness,

the thoroughfare is dangerous;

Throughout the twenty-four hours of the day

one should bear this in mind.

But this is a subsequent event; having mentioned it, we will say no more about it.

At this point, in the rear compound, once the recitation of the Precious Scroll on Woman Huang was finished, everyone went back to their rooms for the night.

Let us now return to the story of P'an Chin-lien, who had been standing for some time beside the postern gate when she saw Hsi-men Ch'ing coming by and, taking him by the hand, conducted him into her quarters.

When she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing simply sat down on her bed, she asked him, "Why aren't you taking your clothes off?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced the woman and proceeded to say with an ingratiating smile, "I came expressly to tell you that I would like to spend the night next door, and to ask you to get out the bag of sexual implements for me."

"You lousy jailbird!" the woman swore at him. "You think you can fool me with your tricks by putting such a good face on things, do you? If I hadn't been standing by the postern gate just now, you'd have been over there already and would hardly have had the patience to come ask me for anything. This is something that you and that splay-legged creature must have agreed on between you this morning, so that the two of you could go at it together. You're merely trying to fool me with a trumped up excuse for coming over here. It's not surprising that, a while ago, rather than sending a maidservant, you sent her to deliver that fur coat to me, and kowtow to me into the bargain. That lousy little splay-legged creature! Who do you take me for, that you should try to play such tricks on me? Back when Li P'ing-erh was still alive, you may have thought you could bury me alive, but:

The sparrow is no longer in that nest.

I'm not jealous of the likes of her."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, saying, "Nothing of the kind ever happened. If she had not kowtowed to you, you would have been just as critical of her."

The woman thought to herself in silence for some time before saying, "I'll let you go then, but I won't let you take that bag of sexual implements with you. If you go at it with that splay-legged creature they'll get:

Polluted and unclean, and are likely to remain contaminated when you come to sleep with me in the future."

"If you won't give them to me," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I've come to depend on them. What am I to do?"

After they had disputed about it for what seemed like half a day, the woman tossed the silver clasp to him, saying, "If you insist, you can take this gadget with you."

"I guess that will have to do," said Hsi-men Ch'ing as he tucked it into his sleeve and started to stagger outside.

"Come back here," the woman said. "I've got something to ask you. No doubt you intend to:

Sleep together all night long, staying on the same bed the whole time, which would cause even the two maidservants to feel embarrassed. It would be better if you were to sleep together for a while, and then get her to go sleep somewhere else."

"Who intends to sleep with her all that long?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing as he started outside.

The woman called him back again, saying, "Come over here. I've got something else to say to you. What are you in such a hurry about?"

"What else have you got to say?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Since I'm permitting you to sleep with her," the woman said, "go ahead and sleep with her. But I won't permit you to exchange any idle gossip with her:

Emboldening her to take liberties with me.

If I ever hear anything of that kind, you had better stay away from my place, or I'll bite your balls off."

"You crazy little whore!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You're nit-picking me to death."

So saying, he headed straight for Li P'ing-erh's quarters next door.

Ch'un-mei admonished the woman, saying, "Let him go. What's the point of trying to control him that way?"

The more loquacious a mother-in-law gets,

The less her daughter-in-law will listen.

After all, you don't want to end up:

Feeling resentment and harboring hostility, toward each other. And besides, it gets in the way of our enjoying a board game together."

On the one hand, she then proceeded to tell Ch'iu-chü to lock the postern gate, while on the other, she set up a table and laid out the pieces for a board game.

"Is my mother asleep yet?" the woman asked.

"No sooner did the party break up in the rear compound," said Ch'un-mei, "than she came back to her room and went to sleep."

There in their room Ch'un-mei and her mistress sat down to their board game. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in Li P'ing-erh's quarters and lifted aside the portiere, he found that Ju-i, together with Ying-ch'un and Hsiu-ch'un, were sitting on the k'ang eating their supper. On seeing Hsi-men Ch'ing come in, they jumped to their feet in consternation.

"Go ahead and finish your supper," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Thereupon, he went into the parlor and sat down on a folding chair in front of Li P'ing-erh's portrait.

Before long, whom should he see but Ju-i, who came into the parlor with an ingratiating smile and said, "Father, it's cold in here. Why don't you go into the bedroom?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled her onto his lap with one hand, embraced her, and gave her a kiss; after which, he went into the bedroom and sat down on the front of the bed. A pot of tea was brewing on the brazier, and Ying-ch'un promptly poured out a cup for him.

Ju-i stood beside the k'ang warming herself at the brazier, as she said, "Father, you don't seem to have had much wine today. The party in the front compound must have broken up early."

"Tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I have to get an early start in order to go and pay my respects to Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu on his boat. Were that not the case, I might well have stayed a little longer."

"Father," said Ju-i, "if you'd like some more wine, I can pour some for you. The table of dishes sent out from the rear compound as an offering for my mistress, together with a flask of Chin-hua wine, are still here. We have eaten the soup and rice but did not presume to touch the wine and the other dishes, leaving them for you to enjoy."

"What you've eaten is no problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As far as something to eat for me is concerned, I don't need anything else. Just a few saucers of delicacies will do. But I don't want any of the Chin-hua wine."

He then turned to Hsiu-ch'un and said, "You take a lantern and go into the garden, to my studio in the Hidden Spring Grotto. There is a jug of grape wine there. Ask Wang Ching to get it out for you. That's the wine I'd like to drink."

Hsiu-ch'un assented, took the lantern, and set out on her errand, while Ying-ch'un hastily set up a table and got out the delicacies he had requested.

"Sister," said Ju-i, "open up the containers and let me select a delicacy or two for Father to consume with his wine."

Thereupon, under the lamplight, she chose a saucer of duck meat, a saucer of squab, a saucer of pickled herring, a saucer of lotus root and bean sprouts, a saucer of jellyfish flavored with chives, a saucer of roast chitterlings and fermented sausage, a saucer of sautéed whitebait, and a saucer of sautéed bamboo shoots flavored with potherb mustard greens. The two square containers, each holding four boxes of delicacies, were laid out on the table, and a goblet and pair of chopsticks that had been wiped clean were placed before Hsi-men Ch'ing. Before long, Hsiu-ch'un came back with the wine. After it had been opened up and heated, Ju-i poured some into a goblet and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to taste. It turned out to be an incomparably fine wine of a dark red color.

Ju-i moved closer and remained standing next to the table in order to pour wine for Hsi-men Ch'ing and also personally peeled roasted chestnuts for him, to go with the wine. Ying-ch'un, who understood the situation, tactfully withdrew and went back to the kitchen, where she sat down with Hsiu-ch'un.

As soon as Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that they were alone, he had the woman sit on his knee and embraced her, as the two of them drank wine together, passing the same goblet back and forth between them.

The woman continued to peel chestnuts and put them into his mouth, while Hsi-men Ch'ing unfastened her jade-colored silk jacket that opened down the middle by undoing the buttons, removed her bodice, revealing the creamy texture of her pale and fragrant breasts, and proceeded to fondle her nipples with his hand, as he exclaimed, "My child, the one thing your daddy loves more than anything else about you is the pure whiteness of your flesh, which is just like your mistress's. When I embrace you, it feels just as though I were embracing her."

"Needless to say," Ju-i responded with a laugh, "my mistress's body was whiter than mine. It seems to me that although the Fifth Lady looks good enough, her appearance is only mediocre, her flesh displaying tints of both red and white. The color of her flesh is not as white as that of the First Lady or the Third Lady in the rear compound, though the Third Lady's skin is marred by a few pockmarks. Sun Hsüeh-o, on the other hand, is not only naturally attractive but has pure white skin and is petite in stature."

She then went on to say, "There's something else I want to bring up with you. Sister Ying-ch'un has a pin for the front of the coiffure in the shape of a Taoist goddess that she is prepared to give to me, but she would like to ask you for the gold tiger-shaped tiara that our mistress used to wear, so that she can wear it during the New Year's celebrations next month. Are you willing to let her have it?"

"If you don't have anything for the front of your coiffure," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll have a silversmith make something out of gold for you. Your mistress's jewelry box has been taken back to the master suite by the First Lady, and I would hardly feel comfortable asking for it."

"All right," the woman said, "have another tiger-shaped tiara made for me then."

So saying, she moved in front of him and kowtowed in thanks.

After the two of them had been drinking for what seemed like half a day, Ju-i said, "Father, why not ask my sister to come share a cup of wine with us, lest she feel resentful at being left out."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then called for Ying-ch'un, but there was no response.

The woman then went back to the kitchen herself and said, "Sister, Father is calling for you."

Ying-ch'un, accordingly, went back into his presence, and Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ju-i, "Pour her a cup of wine, and pick out a few chopsticks' worth of delicacies and put them on a tray for her."

Ying-ch'un stood beside them while she consumed what had been offered to her.

"Why don't you call Sister Hsiu-ch'un to come in and have something as well," the woman said.

Ying-ch'un went off on this errand but came back and said, "She doesn't want anything to eat."

After some time, she picked up her bedding from the k'ang and headed to the kitchen to sleep, saying, "If I don't go back there, but try to sleep on the bench in the parlor, I'll freeze to death. I'm going to the kitchen to sleep on the k'ang with Hsiu-ch'un. Father's tea is on the brazier. You can pour it for him yourself."

"Sister," said Ju-i, "close the back door on your way out, so I can put the latch on it."

Ying-ch'un, carrying her bundle of bedding, then went straight back to the rear.

Meanwhile, the woman, after continuing to drink wine with Hsi-men Ch'ing for a while, put the utensils away, poured out some tea for Hsi-men Ch'ing, and put the latch on the back door.

It so happens that she had prepared a separate set of bedding for Hsi-men Ch'ing to sleep on, replete with satin and chiffon, and a pillow with an embroidered pattern, all of which had been heating on the k'ang until it was nice and warm.

The woman then asked him, "Father, do you want to sleep on the k'ang, or on the bed?"

"I'd prefer to sleep on the bed," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ju-i then proceeded to bundle up the bedding and take it over to put in place on the bed. Telling Hsi-men Ch'ing that he should get into bed and take off his clothes, she helped him off with his boots. She then fetched some water, took it into the parlor, and washed her private parts, closed the door to the bedroom, and put the lampstand on a small table beside the bed, after which she took off her drawers, climbed onto the bed, and bored her way under the covers, where she and Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to hug and embrace each other, as they:

Lay down head to head on the same pillow.

When the woman manipulated his organ with her hand, she found that the clasp was already in place:

It was aroused and its head sprang up;

So that she was both happy and fearful.

The two of them:

Stuck out their clove-shaped tongues, and proceeded to engage each other. When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that she was reclining face-up on the bedding:

Without a stitch of clothing on her,¹⁵

he was afraid that she would be cold and, reaching for her bodice, placed it over her chest, after which, he took her pair of feet in his two hands and started thrusting and retracting for all he was worth.

The woman was reduced to:

Panting and puffing,

as he plunged away at her until:

Her face was fiery red.

"This bodice was given to me by my mistress while she was still alive," she explained.

"My own darling!" exclaimed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "That's not a problem. Tomorrow, I'll get half a bolt of red chiffon from the shop, which you can use to make underwear for yourself. You can also make a pair of red chiffon sleeping shoes to wear on your feet when you're indulging me."

"That would be fine," the woman said. "After you've given it to me, I'll make them up as soon as I have the time to do so."

"I happen to have forgotten," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how old you are this year, as well as your maiden name, and your position among your siblings. All I can remember is that your husband is surnamed Hsiung."

"His surname is Hsiung, and his full name is Hsiung Wang," the woman said. "My maiden name is Chang, and I am the fourth sibling in my generation. This year I am thirty-one years old."

"It turns out then that I am one year older than you," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

On the one hand, he continued to couple with her, while on the other, he called out to her, "Chang the Fourth, my child, if you will devote yourself wholeheartedly to serving me, when the First Lady gives birth to her child, you can be responsible for breast-feeding it. And if you are fortunate enough yourself to come up with so much as:

A single boy or half a girl,

I'll raise your status to that of one of my concubines, so you can take over your mistress's place in the nest. What do you think of that?"

"My husband is already dead," the woman said, "and I have no relatives left on my side of the family. I will be more than happy to devote myself single-mindedly to you, Father. I am not of two minds about it, having no wish to leave your home before I die. If you deign to take pity on me, that would be wonderful."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that her response was just what he fancied, he was more delighted than ever. Grasping her two snow-white legs, which were adorned with a pair of green silk shoes with an embroidered pattern, he continued to alternately submerge and expose the knob of his glans. The two of them rammed away at each other, thrusting and retracting, to such effect that the woman, in her abject position, left nothing unsaid as she gave vent to her feelings:

Groaning in a quavery voice,

As her starry eyes grew dim.

After some time, he told her to get down on all fours and stick her two feet straight back, while he put the red satin bedspread over him and proceeded to straddle her body, as he stuck his organ into her orifice.

Under the lamplight, he took hold of her snow-white bottom and began banging away at it, as he called out, "Chang the Fourth, if you keep on crying, 'My own daddy,' without stopping, I'll come for you."

The woman, in her abject position, proceeded to raise her haunches in response to him, while:

In a trembling voice and faint tones,

She called out, "Daddy!" unceasingly.

They continued to play with each other for a full two-hour period before Hsi-men Ch'ing finally ejaculated. Sometime later, he pulled out his chowrie handle, and the woman took a handkerchief and wiped it off for him, after which they fell asleep in each other's arms and did not wake up until the cock crowed during the fifth watch.

The woman then began to suck him off, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said to her, "The Fifth Lady once sucked away at me for half the night, and, fearing lest I get cold, wouldn't even let me get out of bed to urinate, but swallowed it for me."

"That's no problem," the woman said. "I'll swallow it for you too, if you like."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then actually pissed a whole bladderful of his urine into the woman's mouth. The two of them continued their:

Impassioned love-making,

In all its myriad forms,

as they went at it together all night long.

The next day, the woman got up first, opened the door, and fetched a basin and towel for him, as Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his clothes and performed his ablutions. Upon leaving, he headed for the front compound, where he told Tai-an to dispatch two orderlies to take the gilded Eight Immortals tripod from its place of honor in the summerhouse, have a note written to accompany it, and carry it to Sung Ch'iao-nien at the office of the regional investigating censor of Shantung, where, after it had been duly delivered, he was to solicit a written reply. He also told Ch'en Ching-chi to seal up a bolt of satin brocade, and a bolt of variegated satin, and have Ch'in-t'ung stow them in a felt bag and saddle his horse for him, so he could make an early departure to go pay his respects to Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu at the port on the New Canal.

He was engaged in eating his breakfast congee in Yüeh-niang's room, when she asked him, "Are all of us expected to go to Brother Ying the Second's place today? We had better leave someone behind to look after the place. One of us sisters should remain at home to keep company with Sister-in-law Wu."

"I've already prepared five sets of presents for the occasion," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Yours includes a waistband, a gold pendant, and five mace of silver; while those for the other four of you consist of two mace of silver and a handkerchief apiece. All of you ought to go together. After all, my daughter Ta-chieh will be here to keep Sister-in-law Wu company. That will do just as well. I have already promised Ying the Second that all of you would come to his place for the occasion."

Yüeh-niang, upon hearing this, did not have another word to say on the subject.

Li Kuei-chieh, then, proposed to take her leave, saying, "Mother, I'm going to go home today."

"What's your hurry?" responded Yüeh-niang. "Why don't you stay over another day?"

"I have no reason to deceive you, Mother," said Li Kuei-chieh, "but my mother is not feeling well, and my elder sister is not at home, so there's no one to look after the place. Someday soon, during the first month of the coming year, I'll come and stay for a couple of days."

She then said her farewells to Hsi-men Ch'ing, while Yüeh-niang filled two food boxes with delicacies for her and presented her with a tael of silver, after which, having drunk a serving of tea, she was sent on her way.

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing put on his formal clothes and go out to the front compound.

Unexpectedly, P'ing-an came in and reported, "His Honor, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, has come to pay you his respects."

Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately went out to welcome him into the reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities.

Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, who was attired in a round-collared robe with a mandarin square, a pair of earmuffs, and a girdle with a plaque of gold around his waist, after making his obeisance in the reception hall, said, "Not having seen you for a long time, I have been negligent in paying my respects. I have failed, thus far, to congratulate you on your lofty promotion.”

“I am much obliged for your magnanimity,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “I, too, have not yet been able to offer you my congratulations.”

When they had finished expressing:

The sentiments they had felt while apart, they sat down in the positions of guest and host, and an attendant provided a serving of tea.

Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung then said, “I see your fine steed is waiting for you. Where are you going?”

Hsi-men Ch’ing explained, “The prefect of Chiu-chiang, Ts’ai Hsiu, who is the ninth son of His Honor Grand Preceptor Ts’ai Ching in the capital, is passing by on his way to court. Yesterday, the regional investigating censor of Shantung, Sung Ch’iao-nien, along with Secretary An Ch’en of the Ministry of Works, Secretary Ch’ien Lung-yeh of the Ministry of Revenue, and Huang Pao-kuang from the Imperial Brickyard, borrowed my place in order to host a banquet in his honor. Since he took the trouble to present me with a calling card upon his arrival yesterday, I could hardly fail to return the courtesy by paying a call upon him. I am concerned lest he depart before I am able to do so.”

“There is a request that I have come to trouble you with,” said Ching Chung. “Censor Sung Ch’iao-nien’s term of office will expire at the end of the year next month, and he will submit a report evaluating the performance of the local officials in his jurisdiction. I hope that I can prevail upon you to put in a good word with him on my behalf. Upon learning that he was entertained at your place yesterday, I have screwed up the courage to presume on your goodwill in this matter.

Should I advance but an inch in my career,

I will never dare to forget it.”

“This is a good deed,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Since you and I are on the best of terms, how could I fail to comply with your command? You should write out an explanatory note for me. Fortunately, he will be attending another banquet at my place the day after tomorrow, so I can speak to him in person. That would be even better.”

Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung promptly got up from his place and bowed to Hsi-men Ch’ing, saying, “I am deeply moved by your lavish generosity, I will:

Carry rings and knot grass,¹⁶ and never forget it.”

He then went on to say, “I have already prepared a copy of my curriculum vitae for you.”

So saying, he called in his clerk to get it out and presented it for Hsi-men Ch’ing’s perusal with his own hands. It read as follows:

The military director-in-chief from Shantung, and assistant commander of the left battalion of the Ch’ing-ho Guard, Ching Chung, who is thirty-one years of age, is a native of the ultramontane prefecture of T’an-chou. Owing to the military accomplishments of his ancestors, he was promoted to the post of commander of the left battalion of the said guard. Having passed the military examinations in such-and such a year, he was successively promoted to his present post as military director-in-chief of Chi-chou.

The years in which these successive promotions took place were duly enumerated.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing had finished reading this document, Ching Chung also pulled out of his sleeve a card describing the gift he proposed to give him and presented it to him, saying, “This meager gift is offered in the hope that you will consent to accept it with a smile.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw that the words “Two hundred piculs of white rice”¹⁷ were written on it, he said, “Whoever heard of such a thing? This is something that I absolutely cannot accept. To do so would make a mockery of the relationship between friends.”

“That is not so,” responded Ching Chung. “If you refuse to accept it, Ssu-ch’üan, you can pass it on to Sung Ch’iao-nien if you like. It amounts to the same thing. How can you be so adamant in refusing to take it? If you won’t accept it, I will not presume to trouble you any further.”

After objecting repeatedly, Hsi-men Ch’ing finally consented to take it, saying as he did so, “I will accept it provisionally. When I have spoken to him day after tomorrow, I’ll send someone to report back to you.”

After the tea had been twice replenished, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung expressed his gratitude with a bow, got up, and departed.

When Hsi-men Ch’ing had seen him off, he instructed P’ing-an, saying, “If anyone comes to see me, simply accept their calling cards, and if you have to vacate your post at the gate for any reason, depute four orderlies to guard the gate on your behalf.”

When he had finished speaking, he mounted his horse and, accompanied by Ch’in-t’ung, set off to pay his respects to Prefect Ts’ai Hsiu.

To resume our story, after Yü-hsiao had seen Hsi-men Ch’ing on his way that morning, she went over to P’an Chin-lien’s quarters and said, “Fifth Lady, why did you not remain in the rear compound yesterday? Last night, the ladies all gathered there to hear Nun Hsüeh recite the Precious Scroll on Woman Huang, which went on until late in the evening. After it was over, the Second Lady provided the company with tea, and a maidservant from the Third Lady’s quarters also served wine and appetizers, after which they listened to Li Kuei-chieh and Second Sister Shen compete in singing songs for them. It was the third watch before we were able to go to sleep.

“My mistress was really critical of you, Fifth Lady. She said that when you heard that Father’s party in the front compound had broken up, you couldn’t wait to head off to your own quarters; that yesterday was the eve of the Third Lady’s birthday, but that you wouldn’t even let him visit her quarters, you were so anxious to monopolize his favors. The Third Lady responded by saying, ‘How embarrassing can you get? Who has the patience to contend for him? After all, since he has all these quarters to choose from, let him go wherever he chooses.’”

“I can hardly respond to that without resorting to obscenity!” exclaimed Chin-lien. “Has she been fucked so blind she doesn’t have an aperture left to see out of? Does she really suppose that it was my quarters he slept in last night?”

"He generally does choose to frequent your quarters in the front compound," said Yü-hsiao. "Since the death of the Sixth Lady, who else's quarters should Father prefer to frequent?"

Chin-lien said:

"Though chickens may not piddle,

People all have to go somewhere.

When somebody dies, there's always someone to take their place."

Yü-hsiao went on to say, "My mistress is really annoyed at you for asking Father for that fur coat without consulting her. Later on, when Father went back to the master suite in order to return the keys, my mistress really gave him a hard time about it. She said, 'When Li P'ing-erh died, you were angry that anyone would even consider reassigning the maidservants in her quarters, but now, you're taking the fur coat she was so fond of, and giving it away to someone else to wear, without saying so much as a word about it.' Father protested, 'But she doesn't have a fur coat of her own to wear right now.' To which my mistress responded, 'How can you say she doesn't have a fur coat to wear? There is a fur coat available for her, but she refuses to wear it and adamantly insists on having this particular fur coat to wear. It's lucky for her that Li P'ing-erh is dead, so she can hanker after her things. If she were not dead, she could hardly presume to covet them.'"

"She should stop talking through her cunt!" exclaimed Chin-lien. "A husband has the right to do as he sees fit. Are you my mother-in-law, seeking to exert control over me? I'm monopolizing him, am I? No doubt I've managed to tie him up by the legs with a length of rope, the better to monopolize him for a while. You're just shooting off your cunt as usual."

"What I'm here to tell you," said Yü-hsiao, "you must keep to yourself. Don't let anyone else know I told you about it. Today, Li Kuei-chieh has already left for home, and my mistress is putting on her jewelry. She wanted to leave Sun Hsüeh-o at home today, to keep Sister-in-law Wu company, but Father wouldn't agree to it. He has already prepared gifts to present for the occasion and wants all five of you to go together. You ought to start getting ready to go yourself."

When she had finished speaking, Yü-hsiao headed back to the rear compound.

Chin-lien, accordingly, sat down before the mirror:

Putting on makeup and applying powder,¹⁸

Sticking flowery trinkets in her hair, while sending Ch'un-mei to ask Meng Yü-lou, "What color of clothing are you planning to wear today?"

"Father will be annoyed if we change out of mourning garb," said Meng Yü-lou. "He wants us all to wear pale-colored clothing."

The five ladies agreed that they would wear white frets over their chignons, with pearl headbands, covered with kingfisher-blue kerchiefs of gold lamé damask. On their heads:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles,

while below, they wore pink silk brocade jackets that opened down the middle, over blue silk skirts. Wu Yüeh-niang alone donned a white crepe gilt-ridged cap under a sealskin toque, with a pearl headband and pearl earrings, while below, she wore an aloeswood-colored jacket of figured silk brocade emblazoned with a mandarin square, over a sand-green brocade skirt. When they were ready to set out in one large sedan chair and four small sedan chairs, which had been furnished with brass foot-warmers, accompanied by Wang Ching, Ch'i-t'ung, and Lai-an, and with orderlies shouting to clear the way, they said goodbye to Sister-in-law Wu, the three nuns, and Old Mrs. P'an and headed for Ying Po-chüeh's house to attend the full-month celebration for the birth of his son. But no more of this.

To resume our story, in Li P'ing-erh's quarters in the front compound, Ju-i and Ying-ch'un refurbished the table of delicacies that had been left over from Hsi-men Ch'ing's wine drinking the night before. They had the flask of Chin-hua wine and poured out a flask of the grape wine as well. That noon, they invited Old Mrs. P'an and Ch'un-mei to join them, as well as Big Sister Yü in order to play and sing for their entertainment. The four or five of them had forgathered there and were in the midst of enjoying their repast, but this was one of those occasions on which:

Something was bound to happen.

Ch'un-mei happened to remark, "Second Sister Shen is said to be adept at singing songs to the tune 'The Hanging Portrait.' Why don't we send someone to the rear compound and get her to come here so we can induce her to sing a song to that tune for us?"

Ying-ch'un was about to send Hsiu-ch'un on this errand, when who should appear but Ch'un-hung, who came in and started to warm himself at the brazier.

"You lousy little jailbird of a southerner!" Ch'un-mei said to him. "How come you didn't go to accompany the sedan chairs today?"

"Father deputed Wang Ching to accompany them," said Ch'un-hung, "and told me to stay home and look after the house."

"You lousy little jailbird of a southerner!" resumed Ch'un-mei. "You must be frozen, or you wouldn't have barged in here to warm yourself at the fire."

She then said to Ying-ch'un, "Pour out half a cup of wine for him to drink."

Turning back to Ch'un-hung, she went on, "When you've finished drinking it, go back to the rear compound on my behalf, and ask Second Sister Shen to come here. Tell her that I want her to sing a song for Old Mrs. P'an."

Ch'un-hung promptly finished off the wine and headed back to the rear compound. Who could have anticipated that Second Sister Shen was sitting in the master suite, together with Sister-in-law Wu, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, the three nuns, and Yü-hsiao, engaged in drinking a serving of tea flavored with coriander and sesame seeds?

Unexpectedly, they saw Ch'un-hung lift aside the portiere and come in, saying, "Second Sister Shen, the young lady in the front compound wants you to come sing a song for their entertainment."

"The young lady of the household is right here," responded Second Sister Shen. "Do you mean to say that another young lady has appeared?"

"It is Ch'un-mei from the front compound who is calling for you," said Ch'un-hung.

"What's so special about Ch'un-mei," responded Second Sister Shen, "that gives her the right to order me about? Big Sister Yü is there, who can do just as well as I can. I am singing here in order to entertain Sister-in-law Wu."

"That's all right," said Sister-in-law Wu. "Second Sister Shen, you might as well go ahead, and come back later."

Second Sister Shen simply remained sitting where she was, without making a move.

Ch'un-hung went straight back to the front compound and said to Ch'un-mei, "I summoned her, but she wouldn't come. They are all sitting there together in the master suite."

"Tell her that I'm the one calling for her," said Ch'un-mei, "then she'll come."

"I told her that it was you," said Ch'un-hung. "I said, 'It is the young lady in the front compound who is calling for you.' But she was not affected by that, saying, 'The young lady of the household is right here. Do you mean to say that another young lady has emerged out of nowhere?' I said, 'It is Ch'un-mei,' and she said, 'Since when has Ch'un-mei had the status to order me around? I'm too busy right now, singing for Sister-in-law Wu.' Sister-in-law Wu actually said, 'You might as well go ahead, and come back later,' but she refused to come."

If Ch'un-mei had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them:

The spirits of her Three Corpses became agitated;

The breaths of her Five Viscera ascended to Heaven.¹⁹

A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and

In an instant her cheeks turned purple.

Before anyone could stop her, like a whirlwind, she swept into the master suite, pointed her finger at Second Sister Shen, and began a tirade against her, saying, "How dare you say of me to a page boy that 'another young lady has emerged out of nowhere,' or express amazement that I should have the nerve to order you around? Are you the wife of some regional commander, that I would not dare send for? Whose cunt do you suppose I was squeezed out of, only to be sized up by the likes of you, who pronounce that I've emerged out of nowhere? As for you, you're nothing but a lousy dog-fucked blind whore, who frequents:

The doors of a thousand households,

The gates of ten thousand families.

How long have you been coming to this household, that you have the audacity to evaluate its members? And what kind of presentable song suites are you able to perform? You merely cast about with your:

Oily mouth and canine tongue,

Plowing the eastern ditch, and Harrowing the western ditch, in search of:

Suggestive songs and lewd tunes,

Not worth committing to writing,

and then start:

Assuming attitudes and putting on airs.

I don't know how many professional singing girls from the licensed quarter have performed here. What makes you so special? That whore, the wife of Han Tao-kuo, may hold you in high regard, but we here do nothing of the kind. You can repeat what I say to that whore if you like. I'm not afraid of you. You would do well to get out of here as quick as you can. Or else, like a dishonest nanny, I'll have you:

Driven away from this door for good."

Sister-in-law Wu tried to intervene, saying, "You should stop bandying words that way immediately."

Second Sister Shen was reduced by this tirade to staring with wide-open eyes, but:

Though she dared to be angry,

She dared not speak.

"Ai-ya-ya!" she exclaimed in due course. "How can this young lady be so crude? I didn't say anything wrong to the servant just now that would justify such a spate of uninhibited abuse.

If there is no room for me here,

There are other places I can go."²⁰

This only made Ch'un-mei angrier than ever, and she continued to curse her, saying, "You lousy blind whore! You're ready to be:

Laid by every man in the street, and Fucked by every guy in the alley.

Since your family has been blessed with such a fine young lady as yourself, who is possessed of such a temperament, you ought hardly to spend your time begging for food and clothing in other peoples' homes, and singing for their amusement. You'd better get out of here immediately, and never come back again."

"I'm no dependent of your household," protested Second Sister Shen.

"If you were a dependent of this household," responded Ch'un-mei, "I'd have the page boys pluck the hair off your head."

Sister-in-law Wu intervened, saying, "My child. Why are you acting up this way today? You had better go back to the front compound."

Ch'un-mei simply remained where she was, without making a move.

Second Sister Shen then got down off the k'ang, weeping and wailing, said goodbye to Sister-in-law Wu, and collected her bag of clothing. She was unwilling to wait for a sedan chair, but asked Sister-in-law Wu to send P'ing-an across the street to summon Hua-t'ung, so he could escort her back to the home of Han Tao-kuo.

Ch'un-mei, having vented her spleen, then made her way back to the front compound.

After she had left, Sister-in-law Wu turned to Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Yü-hsiao and said, "She must have been drinking wine up front before coming back here. Otherwise, how could she have resorted to such offensive language? It was an embarrassment to me the way she carried on. She could just as well have allowed her to take her time in getting her things together, rather than driving her out so precipitously, and without even arranging for a page boy to escort her.

If the water is too deep, no one can cross it.

What did she expect her to do? It is really upsetting."

"They probably had been drinking up front," agreed Yü-hsiao.

To resume our story, when Ch'un-mei returned to the front compound, she was still in a fit of high dudgeon and, turning to the company assembled there, said, "I gave that lousy blind whore a piece of my mind and saw to it that she was driven out of the house forthwith. If it hadn't been for the intervention of Sister-in-law Wu, I would have given that lousy blind whore a couple of good slaps in the face. She still doesn't seem to know who I am. When I called for her, she had the nerve to put on quite a scene:

Assuming attitudes and putting on airs."

Ying-ch'un admonished her, saying:

"For every branch you chop down,

A hundred trees are threatened.

You ought to be a little more tactful. Big Sister Yü is here, and you keep ranting about blind whores."

"That's not it at all," said Ch'un-mei. "Big Sister Yü has been performing in this household for lo these many years, and all that time she has never spoken ill of anyone of whatever status, high or low. When called upon to sing, she has sung. Since when has she exhibited the nerve of this lousy blind whore, who can only perform such a limited selection of tunes? What presentable song suites does that whore know? And yet she continues to put on such outlandish airs.

Trying first this and then that, all she can come up with are the vulgar suggestive words of tunes such as 'Sheep on the Mountain Slope' and 'Shrouding the Southern Branch,' that are scarcely fit to be performed in the best company. I no sooner heard her propose to sing such songs here than I sensed that she was trying to push Big Sister Yü aside so she could take her place."

"Something like that did happen," said Big Sister Yü. "Last night, the First Lady asked me to sing some songs, but she promptly grabbed the balloon guitar away from me and said that she would sing first. After which, the First Lady said, 'Big Sister Yü, let her sing first, and you can sing afterwards.'"

Big Sister Yü then went on to say, "Young lady, you ought not to hold it against her. After all, she was not familiar with the relative standings of the people in this household and didn't know how it was appropriate to respond to you. Such things are not easy to understand."

"I pointed that out to her just now," said Ch'un-mei. "I told her she could report back to that lousy whore, the wife of Han Tao-kuo. 'You can repeat my words to her if you like,' I said. 'I'm not afraid of her.'"

"My child," protested Old Mrs. P'an, "you have no reason to get so worked up about it."

"Let me pour out a cup of wine for my elder sister, in order to assuage her anger," said Ju-i.

"This daughter of mine," joshed Ying-ch'un, "is prone to vent her anger whenever she is annoyed."

She then went on to say, "Big Sister Yü, why don't you choose a set of good songs and perform them in order to propitiate her?"

Big Sister Yü, accordingly, picked up the balloon guitar and said, "Let me sing a set of songs for Old Mrs. P'an and the young lady to the tune 'Sheep on the Mountain Slope' on the topic 'Ts'ui Ying-ying Makes a Fuss in Her Boudoir.'"²¹

"You concentrate on your singing," said Ju-i, "while I pour out some wine."

Ying-ch'un then picked up the cup of wine and offered it to Ch'un-mei, saying, "Enough! Enough! My elder sister, although you've been angered and annoyed, be good enough to down this cup of wine offered you by your mother."

Ch'un-mei couldn't help laughing, as she chided Ying-ch'un, saying, "You crazy little whore! You're playing the role of my mother again, are you?"

"Big Sister Yü," she went on to say, "don't sing those songs to the tune 'Sheep on the Mountain Slope.' Sing that set of songs to the tune 'River Water, with Two Variations' for us."

Big Sister Yü stood up beside them and strummed her balloon guitar, as she sang:

My flowerlike countenance and moonlike allure have faded completely away.
The double gates are always closed.
It is just the time when the east wind is chilly, Fine rain sprinkles continuously, and Fallen red petals by the thousands dot the ground.
I am too indolent to burn another coil of incense,

And reluctant to pick up my needle.
My emaciated body is cadaverous,
Beset as it is by spectral visitations.
When I reexamine the old feelings that we had for each other, Sorrow weighs down the turquoise peaks of my painted eyebrows;
Which only serves to arouse the distaste of my young lover,
So that, for some time, despite the orioles and the flowers,
I have not bothered to roll up my curtain.²²

TO THE SAME TUNE:

The courtyard, shaded by its locust trees,²³ is as tranquil as can be.
The plantain flowers have just opened.
I can see the orioles flying in pairs,
And the fluttering of the butterflies,
But my lover is as distant as the heavens.
Atop the tall willows cicadas are murmuring,²⁴
In the limpid waves the mandarin ducks play.
As I pass before the railing,
And sit down by the poolside,
All I can hear is someone singing a lotus-gathering song,
Which so affects me that a myriad sorrows invade my breast.²⁵
I pick up the handle of my delicate fan fashioned of fragrant silk,
On which is written half a lyric to the tune "The Lover's Return."

TO THE SAME TUNE:

As for the steaming hot weather of the summer,
I have managed to endure it.
A new coolness has invaded my brocade curtains.
Though lighted by flaring lantern-wicks,
And followed by the glimmer of the moon,
My shadow is all alone, with no one to address.
The migrating geese are flying toward the South;
The geese return, but my lover has not returned.²⁶ Envisioning the girth of his waist, I have made up his winter clothing;
But I don't know where he is dallying, and have no reliable news of him.
I've entrusted his garments to a traveler to deliver to him;
But the distance is great, and the clothes may arrive too late.

TO THE SAME TUNE:

More than once, I have ventured to ask the plum blossoms,
"How emaciated have I recently become?"
They say my face has lost its fragrance,
And my emotions their jadelike quality.
I have withered before the flowering branches.
Reluctantly, I heat the kingfisher-hued quilt,
And light the incense burner night after night,
In the expectation of finding loving comfort,²⁷
But my dreams are broken and my spirits upset.²⁸
All night long, I am unable to sleep, and can find no rest;
My pillow is cold, and on top of that,
my lamp sputters out.
All by myself, there is no one with whom to discuss my plight;
No matter how I try, I can't ever forget the love of my heart.²⁹

The singing continued for the entertainment of the company. But no more of this.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had paid his respects to Prefect Ts'ai Hsiu at the port on the New Canal, he returned home.

No sooner did he dismount at the gate than P'ing-an reported, "Today, His Honor Ho Yung-shou from the yamen sent a retainer to ask you to come there first thing in the morning. Some robbers have been arrested, and the case is scheduled for trial. Also, His Honor Hu Shih-wen, the prefect of Tung-p'ing, has sent you the gift of a hundred copies of the calendar for the coming year, and His Honor, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, has sent you the gift of a freshly slaughtered pig, a jug of mung bean wine, and four packets of silver. Your son-in-law has taken charge of these things but has not ventured to write a thank-you note for them, since he is waiting for a decision from you. The messenger who brought the latter gifts is going to return this evening in order to speak to you. A return note was written for His Honor Hu Shih-wen, however, and the messenger was rewarded with a mace of silver. In addition, your kinsman Ch'iao Hung has sent you a card inviting you for a drink at his place tomorrow."

Tai-an also brought him the reply he had received from Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, saying, "I delivered the tripod to the office of the regional investigating censor, and His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien said that he would come to repay you for it tomorrow. He rewarded me and the two orderlies who carried it with five mace of silver and also sent you a hundred copies of the new calendar."

Hsi-men Ch'ing summoned Ch'en Ching-chi to ask what had been done with the four packets of silver and was told that they had already been delivered to the master suite.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded into the reception hall, and Ch'un-hung promptly reported his return to Ch'un-mei and company, saying, "Father has arrived home. Are you going to continue your drinking here?"

"You crazy little jailbird of a southerner!" responded Ch'un-mei. "So Father has come home. Let him do as he pleases. What's it got to do with us? Since the ladies of the household are not at home, there's no reason for him to come here."

The group of them, consequently, continued drinking and joking with each other, without venturing to make a move.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived in the master suite, Sister-in-law Wu and the three nuns all got out of the way and went to sit down in another room. Yü-hsiao came forward to relieve him of his outer garments and, after he had taken a seat, set up a table in order to feed him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then summoned Lai-hsing and told him to order table settings, saying, "On the thirtieth, Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien is going to host a party here to see off Grand Coordinator Hou Meng. On the first, we will need to sacrifice a pig and a sheep here at home in order to fulfill the vow I made after encountering the storm on my way back from the capital. And on the third, I have invited the two eunuch directors Liu and Hsüeh, along with Chou Hsiu and the others from the Regional Military Command, to attend a party in celebration of my official promotion."

When he had finished issuing these instructions, Yü-hsiao, who was standing beside him, asked, "Father, when I have set up the table for you, what kind of wine should I pour for you to drink?"

"You can serve whatever dishes you have at hand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "There is that mung bean wine that Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung sent me just now. Why don't you bring it here and open it so I can see what it tastes like."

Who should appear at this juncture but Lai-an, who had come back from escorting the ladies to Ying Po-chüeh's place.

Yü-hsiao promptly brought in the wine, broke open the clay stopper, poured some of it into a goblet, and handed it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to taste. After swallowing a mouthful, he found that it was pure green in color and possessed a:

Robust and lingering flavor.³⁰

"Pour some more of it for me to drink," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

In no time at all, a repast was set out for him, and Hsi-men Ch'ing proceeded to consume it there in the master suite.

To resume our story, Lai-an, together with an orderly, took two lanterns with them and set out that evening to escort Yüeh-niang and the other ladies back home. Yüeh-niang was wearing a fur coat of white ermine over a lavender silk jacket and a kingfisher-blue skirt. Li Chiao-erh and the others wore sable coats over white satin jackets and lilac-colored brocaded skirts. It happens that when Yüeh-niang saw that Chin-lien was wearing Li P'ing-erh's fur coat, she had given Chin-lien's old coat to Sun Hsüeh-o to wear.

Upon arriving in the master suite, they all bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing. Sun Hsüeh-o, alone, kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing and, after getting to her feet, also kowtowed to Yüeh-niang. They then went into the adjacent room and paid their respects to Sister-in-law Wu and the three nuns.

Yüeh-niang then went back and sat down to chat with Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "When Ying the Second's wife saw that all of us had come for the occasion, she was as happy as can be. Their next-door neighbor Mrs. Ma was there, together with Ying the Elder's wife, his cousin Tu the Third's wife, and ten or so other female guests. They had engaged two singing girls for our entertainment. The baby whose birth was being celebrated has a flat head and a chubby face. The mother of the child, his concubine Ch'un-hua, looks somewhat darker and thinner than she did before. She wore a long face, like a donkey's, indicating that she is not very happy. The tension between his wife and concubine has disturbed the household, and there are not enough people to take care of it. When we were on the point of leaving, Ying the Second kowtowed to us and expressed his gratitude again and again, asking us to convey his thanks to you for your lavish gifts."

"Ch'un-hua, that preternatural slave!" scoffed Hsi-men Ch'ing. "So she actually got dressed up and came out to meet the company, did she?"

"She's got a nose and eyes like everyone else," responded Yüeh-niang. "She's not a ghost. Why shouldn't she come out to meet people?"

"As for that slave," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "she's just like a handful of black beans, fit only to feed to a pig."

"I've had enough of that bad-mouthing of yours," said Yüeh-niang. "You act as though only concubines of yours are presentable enough to be seen in public."

Wang Ching, who was standing to one side, said, "When Master Ying the Second saw that the ladies from our household had arrived, he did not initially venture to come out and meet them but hid himself in an adjacent room and spied on them through an aperture in the window. I happened to catch him in the act and taunted him, saying, 'How shameless can you get? What are you spying at, for no good reason?' At which he chased me out, threatening me with his fist."

This induced Hsi-men Ch'ing to:

Laugh until the slits of his eyes disappeared, saying, "That lousy beggar! The next time he shows up, I'll really powder his face white for him."³¹

"I'll be looking out for it," laughed Wang Ching.

Yüeh-niang reprimanded him, saying, "This page boy is talking nonsense. Since when did he ever spy on us? This servant is just indulging his penchant for being:

Bad-mouthed and evil-tongued, for no good reason. Throughout the day, none of us saw so much as his shadow. It was only when we were about to leave that he came out and kowtowed to us."

After having stood around for a while, Wang Ching finally took himself off. Yüeh-niang then went over to the adjacent room in order to pay her respects to Sister-in-law Wu and the three nuns, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, along with Yü-hsiao and the other maids and servants' wives, proceeded to kowtow to her.

Yüeh-niang then asked, "How is it that I don't see Second Sister Shen?"

The company remained silent until Yü-hsiao spoke up, saying, "Second Sister Shen has gone home."

"Why is it," asked Yüeh-niang, "that she failed to wait for my return, but went home before I arrived?"

Seeing that concealment was no longer possible, Sister-in-law Wu told her about the episode in which Ch'un-mei had so abused her that she felt compelled to leave.

Yüeh-niang was annoyed at this and said, "What did it matter that she refused to sing? That maidservant has been indulged to the point that:

All the rules of propriety are turned upside down.

Why did she feel justified in abusing her, for no good reason? No wonder that in this household of ours:

When the master is not a proper master,

The slaves ignore the rules of conduct.

What kind of sense does that make?"

Turning to Chin-lien, she went on to say, "You really ought to exercise some control over her. You've indulged her to the point that she's lost all sense of decorum."

Chin-lien, who was standing by her side, laughed at this and said, "Whoever saw such a blind millstone-turning donkey?

If the wind does not blow,

The tree will not tremble.³²

Since you frequent:

The doors of a thousand households,

The gates of ten thousand families,

the only reason you are privileged to be there is to sing. For someone to ask you to sing is no breach of etiquette. Who entitled her to start:

Assuming attitudes and putting on airs?

Not to have taken her to task would only have enhanced the stink of her pretensions."

"You certainly can talk a good line," said Yüeh-niang. "But, according to your logic, she should be allowed to abuse both the good and the bad at will, and drive them out of the household, since you choose not to exercise any control over her."

"No doubt you would have me give her a few strokes of the cane on behalf of that blind whore," retorted Chin-lien.

When Yüeh-niang heard these words, her face turned bright red with anger, and she said, "If you continue to indulge her this way, in the future she'll end up alienating every one of our neighbors and relatives."

Thereupon, she got up and went to join Hsi-men Ch'ing in the other room.

"What's going on?" Hsi-men Ch'ing asked.

"You know perfectly well who it's about," replied Yüeh-niang, "since you insist on retaining such an unmannerly young lady in your household."

And she went on, thus and so, to tell Hsi-men Ch'ing all about how Ch'un-mei had abused Second Sister Shen and driven her out of the house.

Hsi-men Ch'ing merely laughed at this, saying, "Whoever told her not to sing for her? It doesn't matter though. Tomorrow, I'll just send a page boy to give her two taels of silver. That ought to placate her."

"Second Sister Shen's box is still here," said Yü-hsiao. "She didn't take it with her."

When Yüeh-niang saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing only laughed at the matter, she said, "So, you're not even going to call her on the carpet and give her a talking to, are you? It's just like you to moon around with your mouth open that way. I don't know what you find so funny about it."

When Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh saw how angry Yüeh-niang had become, they took themselves off to their own quarters, but Hsi-men Ch'ing merely continued to drink his wine.

After some time, when Yüeh-niang had gone into the inner room to change her clothes and take down her hair, she asked Yü-hsiao, "Where did these four packets of silver on top of the trunk come from?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded, saying, "They are the two hundred taels of silver that Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung gave me to conduct some business for him. He wants me to employ them in approaching Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien day after tomorrow, in the hope of securing a promotion for him."

"Your son-in-law brought them in a while ago," explained Yü-hsiao, "and I put them on top of the trunk but forgot to tell you about them."

"Since they belong to someone else," said Yüeh-niang, "they should have been put away in the cabinet immediately."

Yü-hsiao, accordingly, proceeded to put them safely away in the cabinet. But no more of this.

Meanwhile, Chin-lien remained sitting in the other room, in the expectation that Hsi-men Ch'ing would rejoin her so they could go back to the front compound together. That evening, she intended to take the fertility potion that Nun Hsüeh had provided her with, and engage in intercourse with Hsi-men Ch'ing, since it was a jen-tzu day, which would be conducive to the conception of a male child.

When she saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing showed no sign of moving, she lifted aside the portiere and called to him, saying, "Aren't you going out to the front compound? I can't wait for you any longer, so I'll go back before you."

"My child," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can go a step ahead of me. I'll come as soon as I've finished this wine."

Chin-lien then went straight back to the front compound.

"I really don't want you to go there," said Yüeh-niang. "I've got something to say to you on the subject. The two of you seem to be as close as though you were:

Both wearing the same pair of pants.³³

She must think she's entitled to:

Lord it over the world,³⁴

the way she insisted on barging into my room and calling for you, the shameless good-for-nothing. As though you were his only wife, and the rest of us were not wives of his."

She then went on to rebuke Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "You lousy thick-skinned good-for-nothing! No wonder people find fault with you. You ought to:

Treat everyone with the same regard.³⁵

We are all your wives, after all. You ought not to favor any one of us over the others. Yet you have allowed her to monopolize you there in the front compound. Ever since you returned from the Eastern Capital, not even your shadow has chosen to spend the night with anyone in the rear compound. How can any of us help being annoyed with you? It's always wise to:

Add a stick of fuel to the cold stove,

As well as a stick of fuel to the hot;

but you've allowed her to completely monopolize you. As far as I'm concerned, I can make allowances for you; but it's doubtful if the others are ready to let you off the hook. Though they may not give voice to their feelings, no matter how well disposed they may seem to be, they will harbor resentment in their hearts. Today, while we were at Sister-in-law Ying the Second's place, Sister Meng the Third was unable to eat anything at all. I don't know whether she has caught a chill of some kind, or what, but she is suffering from depression and nausea. When we were about to come home, Sister-in-law Ying the Second offered her two cups of wine, but they only caused her to vomit. You really ought to go pay a visit to her quarters and see how she is."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he remarked, "Can she really be so unhappy at heart?"

He then ordered that the utensils be cleared away and said, "I won't drink any more wine."

Thereupon, he went to Meng Yü-lou's quarters, where he found that she had already shed her outer garments and taken off her head ornaments and was lying with her clothes on sprawled over the side of the k'ang, in the process of vomiting, while Lan-hsiang was lighting the charcoal brazier on the floor.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that she was groaning incessantly, he said, "My child, how are you feeling inside? Tell me all about it, and, tomorrow, I'll send for someone to examine you."

The woman said not a word in response but merely continued to vomit; at which, Hsi-men Ch'ing helped her into an upright position and sat down beside her.

Upon seeing that she was massaging her breast with both hands, he said, "My own darling, what's going on in your heart? Tell me about it."

"I'm as depressed as can be," said the woman. "Why do you bother to ask? You might as well go on about your business."

"I didn't know anything about it," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The First Lady told me about it just now, which was the first I knew of it."

"No wonder you didn't know about it," the woman said. "You hardly treat me as a wife of yours, after all. Why don't you go make love to the one you care about?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, putting an arm around her powdered neck, gave her a kiss, saying, "You crazy oily mouth! You're just making fun of me."

He then called to Lan-hsiang, saying, "Quickly, boil up some extra strong tea for your mistress to drink."

"I've already prepared tea for her," responded Lan-hsiang, and she proceeded to bring it in.

Hsi-men Ch'ing personally held a cup of it up to her mouth for her to drink, but she responded, "Let me drink it myself. There's no need for you to put yourself out that way:

Reheating your cakes and selling them hot.

There's no one competing for your services here.

The sun must have risen in the West today, it's such a rare event for you to visit these quarters of mine. The First Lady must have put you up to it, for no good reason, and you've forced yourself to comply, no matter how bilious it makes you feel."

"You don't know," protested Hsi-men Ch'ing, "how busy I've been the last few days. What with:

Seven of this and eight of that,

I haven't had a moment of free time."

"No wonder you haven't had a moment of free time," the woman responded. "It's obvious that the one you care about has got such a hold on you that such outmoded goods as the rest of us have all been:

Relegated to the realm of the superfluous, merely waiting to be called up. Perhaps ten years from now you may recollect something about us."

Upon becoming aware that Hsi-men Ch'ing had started to nuzzle her fragrant cheek, she protested, "You're simply reeking of stale wine. Keep your distance from me. For someone who hasn't been able to keep down so much as a taste of:

Saffron soup or flavored water, all day long, you can hardly expect me to be in the mood to fool around with you."

"If you haven't had anything to eat," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why don't you get your maidservant to bring us something to eat. I haven't had anything to eat either."

"Needless to say," the woman responded, "while I'm here in such pain that I can hardly stand it, you propose that we have something to eat. If you want something to eat, you can go eat it somewhere else."

"Since you don't want to eat," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I won't venture to eat anything either. The two of us might as well get ready to go to bed together. Early tomorrow morning, I'll send a page boy to ask Dr. Jen to come and examine you."

"You can forget about summoning any Dr. Jen, or Dr. Li," the woman said. "If I send for Dame Liu and take whatever medicine she prescribes, I'll be all right."

"If you lie down," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and let me massage your chest for you, I'm sure you'll feel better. You may not know it, but I'm rather good at diagnosing ailments by feel and can:

Dispel an illness with a touch of the hand."³⁶

"I'd just be wasting my breath on you!" exclaimed the woman. "Since when could you diagnose anything?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing suddenly remembered something and explained, "Yesterday, School Official Liu gave me a gift of ten wax-encased bovine bezoar heart-clearing pills from Kuang-tung. If you take one of them, and wash it down with some medicinal wine, you should feel better."

He then said to Lan-hsiang, "Go ask the First Lady for some of them. They're in a porcelain jar in the master suite. And bring a flagon of wine as well."

"There's no need to bring any wine," said Meng Yü-lou. "I have wine here in my quarters."

Before long, Lan-hsiang came back from the master suite with two of the pills. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw to the heating of the wine, broke off the wax coating, revealing the gold leaf on the pills inside, and looked on as Meng Yü-lou swallowed them.

He then said to Lan-hsiang, "Pour out a goblet of wine for me, and I'll take some medicine of my own."

Meng Yü-lou gave him a look, saying, "Don't be so delirious! If you want to use that medicine of yours, go to someone else's quarters to take it. What do you think you're doing here, acting up that way? No doubt, on observing that I'm not dead yet, you're bent on helping me onto the road to that destination. Despite the fact that I'm in enough pain to drive me out of my mind, you want to pester me that way. It's just like you to see fit to do so, but who has the patience to carry on with you that way?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, saying, "Enough! Enough! My child, I won't take any medicine then. But let the two of us go to bed together."

The woman, on the one hand, finished taking her medicine and then took off her clothes and got into bed in order to sleep with Hsi-men Ch'ing. Hsi-men Ch'ing, for his part, once underneath the quilt, proceeded to massage her creamy breasts with his hand and fondle her fragrant nipples.

Putting an arm around her powdered neck, he said, "My darling, are you feeling any better inside since taking the medicine?"

"The pain has stopped," said the woman, "but my stomach is still somewhat unsettled."

"That doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If you give it a little while to digest, it should get better."

He then went on to say, "While you were not at home today, I weighed out fifty taels of silver and gave them to Lai-hsing. Day after tomorrow, Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien is hosting a banquet here. On the first, we will need to burn paper money in order to fulfill the vow I made after encountering the storm on my way back from the capital. And on the third, we must dedicate a couple of days to entertaining people. We have received an abundance of good wishes and presents, and it would not do were we to fail to reciprocate."

"Whether you invite people or not," the woman said, "is not up to me. Day after tomorrow, on the thirtieth, I'll reckon up the accounts and have a page boy present them to you. You can then turn them over to Sister Six to take care of, if you like. It's high time for her to take a turn being responsible for them. As she herself said just the other day, 'What's the big deal? If I had to:

Carve the eyes of a Buddhist idol, that would be difficult. Just leave it to me.'"

"Do you actually take that little whore seriously?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She may assume that she can handle it, but when she gets right down to it, she's likely to become flustered. It would be better if you waited until after these events are over, before turning the accounts over to her."

"Brother," responded Meng Yü-lou, "whoever taught you to be so disingenuous? And you claim not to be favoring her. This proposal of yours merely shows where your heart really lies. Waiting until these coming affairs are finished with before turning things over to her would be the death of me. I'd hardly have time to comb my hair first thing in the morning before the page boys would begin:

Coming and going, one after the other,³⁷ requiring me to weigh out silver and make change for them, wearing me out completely in the process. And no matter how much trouble I took, who would even bother to commend me for it?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her, saying, "As the saying goes:

If you manage a household for three years, even the dog will resent you."

As he spoke, he lifted up one of her legs and hung it over his arm, cuddling her against his breast, while he grasped the calf of her fresh, white leg, which was enhanced with an embroidered shoe of scarlet damask.

"My child," he said, "your daddy doesn't love anything else about you as much as your white legs. There isn't another woman in the entire world with such a soft, lovable pair of legs."

"What a glib-tongued good-for-nothing you are!" exclaimed the woman. "Who can take seriously that cottony mouth of yours? You claim that there isn't another woman in the entire world with legs like mine, do you? I don't doubt that there are thousands, if not ten thousands, of them. Rather than complaining that my flesh is coarse, you resort to:

Misstating wrong as right."

"My darling," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if I have said anything untrue, may I die for it."

"You crazy good-for-nothing!" responded the woman. "Why swear oaths over such a trivial matter?"

As Hsi-men Ch'ing talked with her, he proceeded to fasten the silver clasp on his organ and insert it into her vagina.

"Just as I thought!" remarked the woman. "Your every move is directed toward this unseemly end."

She then went on to say, "Hold on a minute. I don't know if that lousy little piece of mine took care of things, or not."

So saying, she reached under the mattress with one hand and groped out a handkerchief with which to wipe herself.

In the process of doing so, she felt the silver clasp and said, "Whenever did you fasten on this thing of yours, without anyone being aware of it? Take it off immediately."

Hsi-men Ch'ing not only refused to comply but, embracing her leg, proceeded to alternately submerge and expose the knob of his glans, as he gave himself over to a series of shallow retractions and deep thrusts. It was not long before her vaginal secretions began to flow,³⁸ and his movements back and forth produced a sound like that of a dog slurping up slops.

Feeling Indisposed Meng Yü-lou Harbors Jealous Sentiments

The woman, for her part, wiped herself with the handkerchief, though her secretions flowed again after every wipe, while in her mouth she gave vent to incessant mutterings in a trembling voice, saying, "Daddy, don't try to penetrate any further. These last few days, the lumbar region of my lower back has been aching, and I've been producing a white discharge below."

"Tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll ask Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to prescribe a dose of a warming medication for you. You should feel better after taking it."

We will say no more for the moment about how the two of them indulged in amorous sport together, but return to the story of Wu Yüeh-niang, who continued to chat with Sister-in-law Wu and the three nuns in the master suite that evening.

The subject of how Ch'un-mei had abused Second Sister Shen came up, and Yüeh-niang was told how she had been reduced to tears, how Ch'un-mei had refused to let her wait for a sedan chair, and how she had been forced to ask Sister-in-law Wu to summon Hua-t'ung from the house across the street in order to escort her back to Han Tao-kuo's place.

"The fact is," reported Sister-in-law Wu, "that the language Ch'un-mei came out with was coarse. No matter what I said to deter her, she insisted on continuing to revile her in the most abusive language. Under the circumstances, how could she help being upset? I had not previously known that Ch'un-mei was capable of resorting to such uninhibited abuse. As I said at the time, she must have been drinking."

"The five of them had been drinking wine together in the front compound," reported Hsiao-yü.

"What an unreasonable good-for-nothing!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "She has clearly indulged that maidservant of hers until she is:

Oblivious to distinctions of status,

Assuming privileges above her station.
And yet she objects if anyone criticizes her for it. In the days to come:
Regardless of the outcome for good or ill, she'll end up driving everyone out of our household. What will anyone want to do with the likes of us in that case? That female singer frequents:

The doors of a thousand households,
The gates of ten thousand families.

The stories she has to tell about us will hardly redound to our credit. People will say that the legitimate wife in that household of Hsi-men Ch'ing's presides over a chaotic world, in which no one knows who is a master, and who is a slave. They won't assume that it's our servants who have been indulged till they lack all sense of decorum, but that it is we ourselves who are hopelessly at sea. What sort of sense does that make?"

"Let it go," suggested Sister-in-law Wu. "If my brother-in-law has nothing to say about it, what's the point of stirring up any further trouble?"

Of the events of that night there is no more to tell, as they all proceeded to return to their quarters.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early in the morning and went to the yamen.

P'an Chin-lien, on seeing that Yüeh-niang had prevented Hsi-men Ch'ing from spending the night with her, and that she had been unable to have intercourse with him on a jen-tzu day, was extremely unhappy about it. Early the next day, she had Lai-an go summon a sedan chair for her and sent Old Mrs. P'an home in it.

When Wu Yüeh-niang got up the next morning, the three nuns expressed a wish to go home, and Yüeh-niang presented each of them with a box of delicacies and five mace of silver. In addition, she promised Nun Hsüeh that she would commission her to preside over a service at her nunnery during the first month of the coming year and gave her a tael of silver in advance, asking her to purchase incense, candles, and paper money for the occasion. She also said that during the twelfth month she would send her sesame oil, white flour, polished rice, and vegetarian fare with which to feed the nuns and make offerings to Buddha.

She then served tea to them in the master suite, together with Sister-in-law Wu, and Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, whom she had previously invited.

When they were all seated, she asked Meng Yü-lou, "After you took those wax-encased pills, did your heartburn get any better?"

"This morning," replied Meng Yü-lou, "it was only after I spit up a few mouthfuls of sour-tasting fluid that I felt better."

Yüeh-niang then called for Hsiao-yü, saying that she would send her to the front compound to invite Old Mrs. P'an and the Fifth Lady to come share some pastries with them.

"Hsiao-yü is back in the kitchen, seeing to the steaming of the pastries," reported Yü-hsiao. "I'll go and invite them."

Thereupon, she went straight to Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound, where she inquired, "Why do I not see Old Mrs. P'an? The two of you are invited back to the rear compound for tea."

"I sent her home early this morning," replied Chin-lien.

"Why didn't you say anything," asked Yü-hsiao, "rather than sending her off that way without anyone being aware of it?"

"She has overstayed her welcome," said Chin-lien. "Why should she have remained any longer? She has already been here for some days, leaving that adopted niece of hers at home, without anyone to look after her. It was my idea to send her home."

"I brought a chunk of cured pork and some eggplant julienne in a sweet sauce to give her," said Yü-hsiao, "not knowing that she had already left. Fifth Lady, you can keep them for her."

So saying, she handed them over to Ch'iu-chü, who put them away in a drawer.

Yü-hsiao then went on to say to Chin-lien, "Yesterday evening, after you came back to your quarters, my mistress spoke to Father, accusing you, thus and so, of trying to:

Lord it over the world,
and saying that you and he were as close as though you were:

Both wearing the same pair of pants;
and that the way in which you monopolized Father by keeping him in the front compound, and not letting him spend any time in the rear compound, was utterly shameless. Afterwards, she sent Father to the Third Lady's quarters to spend the night. On top of that, she accused you to Sister-in-law Wu and the three nuns, of indulging Ch'un-mei to the point where she was unmannerly enough to vilely abuse Second Sister Shen. Father said that tomorrow he would send a tael of silver to Second Sister Shen to compensate her for her embarrassment."

Word for word, she recounted the entire episode to Chin-lien, and, when Chin-lien heard it, she took it to heart.

Yü-hsiao then went back to report to Yüeh-niang, saying, "Old Mrs. P'an got up early this morning and went home, but the Fifth Lady will be here shortly."

Yüeh-niang then said to Sister-in-law Wu, "You see, yesterday I directed a few words of criticism to her, and today, in a fit of temper, without saying a word to me, she has responded by sending her mother packing. My guess would be that this sister of mine is surely harboring the intention of stirring up some kind of waves over it."

At the time, Yüeh-niang thought that she was speaking in the privacy of her room, not realizing that Chin-lien had silently made her way up to the portiere leading into the parlor and had been eavesdropping there for some time.

All of a sudden, she opened her mouth and spoke, saying, "First Lady, are you saying that I sent my mother packing, and that I have been monopolizing our husband?"

"That's right," replied Yüeh-niang. "I have said that. Now, what are you going to do about it? The fact is that ever since our husband returned from the Eastern Capital, you've been monopolizing him all day long up there in the front compound, so that here in the rear compound we haven't been given so much as a glimpse of his shadow. As though you were his only wife, and the rest of us were not wives of his. When anything he does comes up for discussion, you claim that nobody else knows about it, but that you do. When Li Kuei-chieh went home yesterday, for example, Sister-in-law Wu asked, 'Why has Li Kuei-chieh left for home after staying here for only one day? Why is my brother-in-law upset with her?' To which I responded, 'Who knows what he's upset with her about?' You then stuck your neck out and insisted on saying, 'Nobody else knows about it. I'm the only one who does.' Since you attach yourself to him all day long, how could you help being better informed than the rest of us?"

"If he didn't come to my quarters of his own volition," said Chin-lien, "are you suggesting that I keep him tied up there all day long with a length of hog-bristle rope? As though I were as wanton as all that."

"If you're not as wanton as all that," said Yüeh-niang, "how is it that yesterday, when he was sitting quietly in my room, you had the nerve to lift aside the portiere and barge into the room, telling him to accompany you to your place in the front compound, just as though you had the right to:

Lord it over the world?

How can you justify that? Our husband is the sort of man who:

Stands erect between Heaven and Earth,

Bearing hardship and enduring travail.³⁹

What crime has he committed that entitles you to tie him up with a length of hog-bristle rope? You don't know your place, you lousy baggage, but at least I keep quiet about it; while you don't seem to know that:

In pressing people you should not press them too far.⁴⁰

You surreptitiously asked our husband for Li P'ing-erh's fur coat to wear but kept it to yourself, without even coming back to the rear compound and mentioning it to me. If everyone were to treat me that way, I might as well be raising ducks in this position of mine. After all:

Even in an old-folks' home,

There is someone in charge.

But you are so close to that maidservant of yours that it is like:

A cat and a mouse sleeping together.⁴¹

You've indulged her to the point where she has lost all sense of decorum and continues to abuse people:

Regardless of the outcome for good or ill;

while you insist on shooting your mouth off:

Refusing to acknowledge any responsibility.⁴²

"So she is a maidservant of mine," said Chin-lien. "What of it? You can beat her if you like. I've got one shadow too many around here as it is. I did ask him for that fur coat; but it wasn't because I wanted the fur coat that he unlocked the door and took a number of articles of clothing to give to someone else. Why are you not criticizing her? So you would accuse me of indulging a maidservant and being wanton, would you? But, since you have gone to such lengths to please our husband, which of us is the more wanton?"

These few words struck Yüeh-niang where it hurt, and her two cheeks turned purple, as she retorted, "So I am the one who is wanton, am I? But, no matter how you put it, I was originally a virgin when I was formally married to him and was not just some woman that he had picked up. It is the shameless man-hunter who is wanton. I am the genuine article, and not the wanton one."

Sister-in-law Wu attempted to intervene, saying, "Sister-in law, what's going on with you? There's no need for you to bandy words that way."

But no matter how hard she tried to dissuade her, the words continued to pour out of Yüeh-niang's mouth, as she said, "You've already done away with one of us, and I guess I'm next."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" exclaimed Meng Yü-lou. "First Lady, how is it that you're getting so carried away with your annoyance today? You're implicating the rest of us in what you say:

Hitting a number of us with one swipe of the stick.

And whoever saw the likes of you, Sister Six? You really ought to show a little deference to the First Lady, rather than bandying words with her that way."

"As the saying goes," said Sister-in-law Wu:

"No good blows are struck when people fight;

No good words are spoken when people quarrel.⁴³

When you sisters engage in these altercations, we relatives who stay with you are embarrassed. Sister-in-law, if you don't agree to desist, I will leave. If my presence means so little to you, I'll call for my sedan chair and go home."

At this, Li Chiao-erh took hold of Sister-in-law Wu in order to prevent her from leaving.

When P'an Chin-lien heard the words with which Yüeh-niang berated her, she sat down on the floor and started to roll around, giving herself a series of slaps on the face, and knocking off the fret on her head, which fell to one side.

Commencing to weep out loud, she cried, "I'm as good as dead. What good is this life of mine? Our husband may have legally:

Named articles and cited clauses,

in marrying you; but if, as you claim, I was just some woman he picked up, it would have been an easy enough matter to settle at the time. If you had waited until your husband came home and persuaded him to give me a writ of divorce, I would have had to leave, and that would have been the end of it.

In pressing people you should not press them too far."

"Just look at this trashy creature," exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "Before anyone else can even get a word out:

Her mouth is like the Huai River in spate.

And she rolls around on the floor, trying to shift the blame onto someone else. No doubt you'll wait until our husband comes home, good wife that you are, and get him to give me a hard time. You've got just such a knack for knavery, but who's afraid of you?"

In Defense of Her Shortcomings Chin-lien Throws a Tantrum

"Since you claim to be the genuine article," retorted Chin-lien, "who would dare give you a hard time?"

Yüeh-niang became even more enraged at this and said, "If you would have it that I'm not the genuine article, are you suggesting that I've been harboring a lover in this room of mine?"

"If you haven't been harboring a lover," Chin-lien retorted, "who has been harboring a lover? You'd better produce him for me."

When Meng Yü-lou saw that the altercation between them was going from bad to worse, she endeavored to pull Chin-lien to her feet, saying, "You'd better get back to the front compound."

She then continued, "Things have gotten out of hand. The two of you had better both curtail your tongues. When you wrangle with each other this way, engaging in such mutual vituperation, you make yourselves a laughingstock in the eyes of these three nuns here."

Turning to Chin-lien, she went on to say, "You get up, and I'll escort you back to the front compound."

Chin-lien, however, refused to get up until Meng Yü-lou and Yü-hsiao joined forces in dragging her to her feet and escorting her to the front compound.

Sister-in-law Wu then admonished Yüeh-niang, saying, "Sister-in-law, while you're feeling poorly in your present condition, you ought not to let yourself get so upset over things like this that are clearly of no importance. When you and your sister wives are getting along with each other:

Happily and cheerfully,⁴⁴

those of us who are staying over with you are able to share in your pleasure. But when you get into altercations like this and ignore our admonishments, what are we to do?"

The three nuns, seeing that things were getting out of hand, told their young disciples to finish what they were eating, wrapped up their boxes, and took their leave of Yüeh-niang, placing their palms together and saluting the company in the Buddhist fashion.

"I hope," said Yüeh-niang, "that you three reverends will not laugh at us."

"Bodhisattva," responded Nun Hsüeh, "needless to say:

Who is there without smoke in his stove?⁴⁵

The fire of ignorance that resides in one's heart,⁴⁶

Has only to be touched in order to give off smoke.

It would be better if everyone were a little more accommodating. As the Buddhist Dharma expresses it:

You must strive to maintain a cool heart,

like a solitary boat;

Sweep clear the spirit tower of your mind,

and control yourself.

If you allow the ropes to slacken and the knots to grow loose;

Even a myriad guardian deities could not reduce you to order.⁴⁷

If you can only:

Keep the monkey of your mind and the horse of your will under control,⁴⁸

it is possible to become a Buddha or a patriarch. In taking leave of you, Bodhisattva, I would like to thank you for all the trouble I have put you to. It is time for me to return home."

So saying, she put her palms together and saluted her twice in the Buddhist fashion.

Yüeh-niang hurriedly bowed in return, saying, "I fear you have fared none too well. I have been rather remiss in entertaining you. On another day, I will send someone to deliver the supplies for the religious observances I have commissioned."

She then turned to Hsi-men Ta-chieh and said, "Would you and the Second Lady escort our three preceptors to the gate, and look out for the dog?"

Thereupon, the three nuns were sent on their way.

Yüeh-niang then sat down to keep Sister-in-law Wu and the rest company, saying, "This has gotten me so angry that my two arms have gone soft on me, and my hands have turned ice-cold. All I've had to drink this morning is a mouthful of plain tea, but it's still troubling my stomach."

"Sister-in-law," said Sister-in-law Wu, "I tried to dissuade you from letting yourself get so worked up, but you rejected my advice. For someone in the final month of her pregnancy, what's the point of getting so upset over a trivial matter?"

"Sister-in-law," responded Yüeh-niang, "fortunately you have been staying here and have seen for yourself what's been going on. Since when have I picked a quarrel with her? This is a case of:

The curfew violator arresting the watchman.⁴⁹

I have been all too willing to accommodate her, but she has refused to accommodate me. There is only one husband for all of us, but she has attempted to completely monopolize him for herself, while:

Colluding in chicanery,⁵⁰ with that maidservant of hers. As for her doings up front there:

There's nothing she won't do.

Things no one else would do,

She can bring herself to do.

Her conduct as a wife is utterly shameless. Though:

Her lampstand casts no light upon herself, she's always opening her mouth to accuse others of wantonness. It seems that whatever rival may be in her way, she will pick quarrels with all day long, accusing her to me of being at fault, thousands of times, if not more, while acting as though she herself is:

An immaculate nun.

She is a double-dealing:

Crooked-hearted false-bellied,⁵¹

person, with a:

Human face but a bestial heart,⁵² who refuses to accept responsibility for what she says and does. The oaths that she takes are truly frightful. I'm going to keep my eyes peeled where she's concerned. Who knows what sort of a bad end she'll come to in the future? Fortunately, all of you here saw what she did just now with your own eyes. I had prepared to serve tea and was waiting with the best of intentions for her mother to come share it with us, when she sent her packing, without anybody being aware of it, and then, with quarrelsome intent, snuck in here to eavesdrop on me. What did she need to eavesdrop for? Does she think I'm afraid of her, or what? No doubt she'll just wait until she sees that husband of ours and then engage in:

Telling tales and embroidering on the facts, in order to persuade him to divorce me."

"We were all in your room together," said Hsiao-yü, "standing around the brazier. 'Who knows when the Fifth Lady came into the parlor and sat down to eavesdrop on us? None of us even heard the sound of her footsteps.'"

"She's always up to mischief of some kind," said Sun Hsüeh-o. "She wears shoes with felt soles, in order to make sure that the sound of her footsteps will not be heard. I remember, when she first entered the household, how frequently she picked quarrels with me, and bad-mouthed me to others behind my back, inciting Father to beat me those two times. And you even criticized me at the time, Mother, for being too disputatious."

"She's a past master at burying people alive," said Yüeh-niang, "and today she's doing her best to bury me alive. Didn't you see, just now, how she threw a tantrum:

Banging her head on the floor and rolling around?

Her one hope is that when Father comes back and hears about it, he'll debase me beneath her."

Li Chiao-erh laughed at this, saying, "First Lady, needless to say, that would be to turn the world upside down."

"You don't understand," said Yüeh-niang. "She is an avatar of the nine-tailed fox fairy,⁵³ who has already done innocent people to death. Why should she balk at doing the same to me? Do I have the physical stamina to withstand her? You have been a member of this household for all these years, but despite the fact that you were once a denizen of the licensed quarter, you have never conducted yourself like the hardened offender that she is. Just look at the way she insisted on barging into my room yesterday and calling for our husband, saying, 'Aren't you going out to the front compound? I can't wait for you any longer, so I'll go back before you.' She acted just as though our husband belonged to her alone, and that she had the right to monopolize him. I wouldn't be so upset were it not for the fact that ever since he returned from the Eastern Capital she wouldn't let him spend even a single night in the rear compound. And even when it was someone's birthday, she didn't want to let him visit her quarters. She wants to put all ten fingers into her own mouth, that's all."

"Sister-in-law," admonished Sister-in-law Wu, "try to be more patient. Since you are so frequently indisposed or in pain, this matter is not so important for you. Let him do as he pleases. It would be better for all of us if you would refrain from:

Feeling resentment and harboring hostility."

She continued admonishing her for a while, and Yü-hsiao set out some food for her, but Yüeh-niang refused to eat, saying, "I've had a headache for some time, and my stomach is feeling queasy."

She then said to Yü-hsiao, "Put out a pillow on the k'ang over there, and let me lie down for a bit."

Addressing herself to Li Chiao-erh, she went on to say, "The rest of you can keep Sister-in-law Wu company in having something to eat."

That day, Big Sister Yü also expressed a desire to go home, and Yüeh-niang directed that a gift box be filled with delicacies for her, and that she be given five mace of silver, and sent on her way.

To resume our story, Hsi-men Ch'ing had gone to the yamen that morning to preside over the trial of a criminal case, and it was not until noon that he returned home. His arrival coincided with that of the retainer from Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, who had come to solicit a reply for the gifts he had sent.

"Tell your master that I appreciate his lavish gifts," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but there is no need for him to trouble himself about it. I would like you to carry the gifts back to him until after I have succeeded in doing what he asks of me tomorrow, after which you can deliver them again."

"As long as my master has not directed me to do so," said the retainer, "I can hardly presume to take them back. If they are left here at Your Honor's place until then, it will do just as well."

"In that case," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "express my thanks to him, and tell him that I understand the situation."

He then provided him with a reply and proposed to reward the retainer with a tael of silver.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing, subsequently, made his way back to the master suite, he found Yüeh-niang lying on the k'ang, and though he called to her for what seemed like half a day, she did not respond. When he asked the maidservants what was going on, they did not dare to tell him. He then went to Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound, where he found the woman, with her hairdo in disarray, lying down and hugging a pillow. When he asked her what was the matter, she also refused to reply.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed up the silver he had promised to the retainer from Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung's place and sent him on his way, after which he went to Meng Yü-lou's quarters and asked her what had happened.

Seeing that concealment was no longer possible, Meng Yü-lou told him all about the angry altercation between Yüeh-niang and Chin-lien that had occurred earlier that morning.

This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he went straight back to the master suite, pulled Yüeh-niang up from her reclining position with one hand, and said to her, "At a time like this, while you're feeling poorly in your present condition, why should you pay any attention to that little whore? What's the idea of quarreling with her for no good reason?"

"Whose words have you been listening to?" demanded Yüeh-niang. "Do you believe that it was I who picked a quarrel with her, or that I am the one who is disputatious and sought her out to pick a fight with? It was she who chose to pick a fight with me. You can ask the others if you don't believe me. This morning, with the best of intentions, I had prepared tea, and invited her mother to come share it with us; only to have her send her mother packing in a fit of temper and come barging in here, sticking her neck out in order to quarrel with me:

Rolling around and banging her head on the floor, knocking the fret on her head to one side, and screaming like the crowd at an emperor's coronation ceremony. She did everything short of striking me in the face. If the others present had not intervened to restrain her, we might well have ended up:

Beating each other into an undifferentiated lump.⁵⁴

She is so accustomed to taking advantage of other people for no good reason, that she expects to be able to force me to submit to her. She constantly says, 'Since you claim that your husband legally:

Named articles and cited clauses, in marrying you, while I am just some woman he picked up, you might as well just get rid of me, so I won't be in your way any longer.' For every sentence I get out, she comes back with ten. There's no way of stopping her.

Her mouth is like the Huai River in spate.

I hardly have the physical stamina to bandy words with her. In no time at all, that:

Rascally double-crossing creature,⁵⁵ made me so angry that my body became flaccid and feverish. As for the fetus I am carrying, whether it be a child, or a plum, or even a crown prince, it will never survive. At present, it's been so affected that it's:

Neither dead nor alive.⁵⁶

My abdomen feels distended, and the downward pressure in my stomach is painful. My head aches, and my two arms have turned numb. I sat down on the commode for quite a while just now, but the fetus did not come out. If it had, it would have been a good thing, as I might have avoided dying with a spectral fetus in me. Tonight, I'll take a length of rope and hang myself, so you can carry on with her as you like. That way, in the future, I'll avoid the fate of Li P'ing-erh, who was done to death by her. I'm well aware that if you don't lose a wife every three years, you consider it a great misfortune."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, the more he listened the more perturbed he became.

Cuddling Yüeh-niang against his breast, he said to her, "My good sister! You've got to make allowances for that little whore. She doesn't even know the rudiments about keeping to her place. Allowing yourself to become so incensed about her isn't worth the risk. I'll go out to the front compound and give the lousy little whore a piece of my mind."

"You wouldn't dare give her a hard time," retorted Yüeh-niang, "or she'll tie you up with a length of hog-bristle rope."

"You can tell her from me," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that if she provokes me, I'll give her a good kicking."

He then went on to ask Yüeh-niang, "How are you feeling inside right now? Have you had anything to eat, or not?"

"Who's had anything to eat?" replied Yüeh-niang. "Early this morning, I had just prepared tea and was waiting for her mother to come share it with us, when she barged in here and started a fight with me. Right now, my abdomen feels distended, I'm suffering from downward pressure in my stomach, my head aches, and my two arms are numb. If you don't believe me, just feel my hands. I haven't even been able to flex them for what seems like half a day."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, all he could do was stamp his feet in consternation, saying, "What are we to do? I'd better send a page boy immediately to summon Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i and have him examine you and prescribe the necessary medication. But it's late, and he won't be able to get inside the city gate before it's closed for the night."

"What's the point of summoning the likes of Dr. Jen for no good reason?" said Yüeh-niang. "Let matters take their course. If the fetus is fated to live, so be it. If it is not fated to live, let it die, which will satisfy her wishes. What good is a wife after all? She's no more than:

A layer of plaster on a wall:⁵⁷

If you peel off one layer, there will be another beneath it.

Once I am dead, you can raise her to the status of your legitimate wife. She's certainly intelligent enough to manage the household."

"You must be more forbearing," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "That little whore is as expendable as a piece of stinking shit.⁵⁸ What can she do to you? Right now, if we don't invite Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to examine you, your anger will continue to envelop the fetus, without being able to escape, either above or below. What then?"

"In that case," said Yüeh-niang, "I'll call in Dame Liu, have her examine me, and take whatever medication she prescribes. Or else, I'll get her to probe my head with two acupuncture needles, and see if that will take care of things."

"That's ridiculous," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What does that old whore Dame Liu know about obstetrics? I'll send a servant right away to go on horseback and invite Dr. Jen to come examine you."

"You may insist on inviting him," said Yüeh-niang. "But, even if you get him to come, I won't allow him to examine me."

Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to disregard this statement and went out to the front compound, where he summoned Ch'in-t'ung and told him, "Take a horse and proceed immediately to the home of His Honor Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i outside the city gate; and wait for him, if necessary, so that you can accompany him on the way back."

Ch'in-t'ung assented to this and, mounting a horse, took off on his errand like a cloud scudding before the wind.

Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to her room in order to look after Yüeh-niang and directed the maidservants to quickly heat some congee and serve it to her, but, though he urged her to eat the congee, she refused to eat it.

He waited there until the afternoon, when Ch'in-t'ung finally came back empty-handed and said, "His Honor Dr. Jen is currently on duty in the prefectural yamen and has not come home yet. His household is informed that we have called for him, so there is no need for us to send anyone after him tomorrow. His Honor Dr. Jen will come on his own in the morning."

Yüeh-niang, on observing that Ch'iao Hung had sent someone again and again to remind Hsi-men Ch'ing of his invitation, said to him, "Since the doctor is coming tomorrow, you might as well go ahead over to our kinsman Ch'iao Hung's place. It's late in the day already, and if you refuse to go, you can't help annoying our kinsman."

"If I go," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who will look after you?"

Yüeh-niang laughed at this, saying, "Just look at the state you're in! If you go, I'll be all right. In a little while, I'll pull myself together and sit down to a meal with Sister-in-law Wu. What are you so concerned about?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Yü-hsiao, "Quickly, go and invite Sister-in-law Wu to come and sit down with your mistress."

He then went on to ask, "Where is Big Sister Yü? You can get her to sing something for your mistress."

"Big Sister Yü has gone home," responded Yü-hsiao. "She ran out of patience some time ago."

"Who told her to go home?" demanded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It would have been better for her to stick around for another day or two."

So saying, he chased after Yü-hsiao and gave her a couple of kicks.

"When she saw the way you have managed to:

Turn the whole household upside down," pronounced Yüeh-niang, "she wanted to go. What's that got to do with her?"

"The one who actually abused Second Sister Shen," complained Yü-hsiao, "is not the one you've chosen to kick."

Hsi-men Ch'ing pretended not to hear this and proceeded to get dressed and set out to attend the drinking party he had been invited to at Ch'iao Hung's place.

Before the first watch had begun, he returned home and went into the master suite, where he found Yüeh-niang, together with Sister-in-law Wu, Meng Yü-lou, and Li Chiao-erh, the four of them, sitting together. When Sister-in-law Wu saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come in, she promptly took herself elsewhere in the rear compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Yüeh-niang, "Are you feeling any better by now?"

"Sister-in-law Wu," said Yüeh-niang, "joined me for a couple of mouthfuls of congee, and my abdomen is not feeling as distended as it was before. But I still have a lingering headache, and the lumbar region of my lower back is still aching."

"It doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Tomorrow, Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i will come to examine you, and if you take a couple of doses of the medication he prescribes, it should dissipate your pent-up anger and tranquilize the fetus in your womb. Then you'll be all right."

"I told you in no uncertain terms not to send for him," said Yüeh-niang, "but you went ahead and sent for him anyway. How can you be so:

Bare-faced and red-eyed,

as to invite a male physician to examine me? Just wait and see whether I'll come out to be examined tomorrow, or not."

She then went on to ask, "What did our kinsman Ch'iao Hung invite you over for anyway?"

"He indicated," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that ever since I came back from the Eastern Capital, he has wanted to have a chance to sit down with me; and today he went out of his way to prepare a variety of delicacies and engaged two singing girls as well. He didn't ask me over to discuss anything in particular. Later on, he also invited Censor Chu from next door to come over and help keep me company. But I was so concerned about you that I was uneasy at heart, so, after downing a few goblets of wine, I came home early."

"What a glib-tongued good-for-nothing you are!" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "I've had enough of your:

Clever words and deceptive phrases.

You would have it that you were concerned for me, would you? Even if I were:

A manifestation of a living Buddha,⁵⁹

I would hardly occupy a place in your heart. I can foresee that once I am dead, I will mean no more to you than a shard of broken crockery."

She then went on to ask, "Did our kinsman Ch'iao Hung really have nothing more to say to you?"

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing acknowledge the truth, saying, "At present, our kinsman Ch'iao Hung wishes to take advantage of the new regulations to purchase a position as an honorary official, for which he is prepared to pay thirty taels of silver. The money is already sealed up, and he wants me to speak to Prefect Hu Shih-wen about it. I said to him, 'That's not a problem. Yesterday, Prefect Hu Shih-wen sent me a hundred copies of the calendar for the coming year, and I have not yet sent him a return gift. When I send the gift, I'll send a card with it, requesting an order of appointment as an honorary official, and then turn it over to you.' He objected to this, saying that payment in silver was the standard procedure, and that if I consented to intervene on his behalf, it would spare him the need to spend additional money high and low, and thus save him ten taels of silver or more."

"Since he has requested you to do so," said Yüeh-niang, "you might as well intervene on his behalf. Have you already accepted his silver?"

"He is going to send the silver over tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He wanted to buy an additional gift for me, but I told him to forget about it. Tomorrow, I'll prepare the carcass of a pig, and a jug of wine, and send them to Prefect Hu Shih-wen. That ought to take care of it."

Once this conversation was concluded, Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to spend the night in the master suite.

The next day was the date on which Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien had arranged to host a party to see off Grand Coordinator Hou Meng at Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence. The provision of appropriate wines and comestibles for the banquet had already been completed in the rear reception hall. The prefectural yamen had issued summonses for thirty musicians from the two Music Offices, together with two directors and four file leaders, to report for duty at Hsi-men Ch'ing's house early that morning. Hsi-men Ch'ing told them to stand by in an anteroom on the eastern side of the courtyard inside the ceremonial gate leading to the front reception hall. The troupe of Hai-yen actors were directed to use an anteroom on the western side of the courtyard as their green room.

Who should appear at this juncture but Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, who had gotten up early that morning and come on horseback. Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly invited him into the reception hall and sat down with him, exchanging remarks on the events that had occurred since they last met.

"Yesterday," said Dr. Jen, "when your esteemed servant came for me, I was on duty at the prefectural yamen. It was only when I arrived home last evening that I was able to read your respected summons. Today, I have made haste to come, without waiting for my carriage. May I presume to ask who it is that is not well?"

"It is my humble principal wife who is unexpectedly feeling somewhat indisposed," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I hope that you will be able to diagnose the problem."

In a little while, after tea had been served and they were in the process of drinking it, Dr. Jen said, "The other day, I heard about your promotion from Han Ming-ch'uan. Permit me to proffer my congratulations."

"With my meager talent, I merely occupy the position," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What is there to congratulate me for?"

When they had done with their tea, and Ch'in-t'ung had cleared away the cups with their raised saucers, Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed him, "Go back to the rear compound and tell the First Lady that His Honor Dr. Jen is here, and that she should prepare to receive him in the parlor."

Ch'in-t'ung assented and headed back to the rear compound, where he found Sister-in-law Wu, Li Chiao-erh, and Meng Yü-lou in the room with Yüeh-niang.

"Dr. Jen is about to come in," reported Ch'in-t'ung, "and Father has instructed me to tell you to prepare to receive him in the parlor."

Yüeh-niang sat where she was, without making a move, and said, "I told him not to summon the doctor, but he has insisted on asking this male figure to open wide his fervid eyes, and proceed to:

Holding hands and squeezing wrists, with me, for no good reason. Who knows what else he will do. If he had invited Dame Liu instead, and I had taken a dose or two of her medicine, I would have been fine. But by insisting on:

Ringling bells and beating drums, to expose me in this way, he's merely giving someone else's husband an opportunity to feast his eyes on me."

"First Lady," said Meng Yü-lou, "the doctor he engaged is here already. If you don't go out and see him, what do you propose to do? You can hardly just send him away."

Sister-in-law Wu also admonished her from the side, saying, "Sister-in-law, if you let him take your pulse, he may be able to ascertain the cause of your indisposition, whence it arose, and which conduits may have been affected by your anger. And if you take the medication he prescribes, it may serve to rectify the flow of your vital energy and blood, and tranquilize the fetus in your womb. If you won't let him examine you, and your husband allows you to call in Dame Liu instead, what does she know of pathology or the principles of pulse taking? And who knows what such a delay might portend?"

Only then did Yüeh-niang consent to begin combing her hair and putting on her headgear. Yü-hsiao brought over her mirror, Meng Yü-lou jumped onto the k'ang and proceeded to use a small brush to smooth the hair behind her temples, Li Chiao-erh helped attach her hair ornaments, and Sun Hsüeh-o stood by to fetch her garments. Yüeh-niang's head was adorned with six gold-headed pins and a toque. Without formally making up her face, she:

Scantly applied rouge and powder, and Lightly painted her moth eyebrows.

From her ears were suspended two gold clove-shaped ear pendants; in front of her coiffure she wore a gold tiara representing the toad in the moon; her body was clad in a white satin jacket that opened down the middle, over a willow-yellow wide-cut drawnwork skirt that served to set off her wave-tripping silk stockings, and the upturned points of her pair of golden lotuses; while beside her skirt there hung a cachet of purple brocade, a yellow brass key, and a pair of embroidered sashes. Truly:

The immortal of Mount Lo-fu has appeared in the mundane world;⁶⁰

The beauty of the moon palace has emerged from her painted hall.

Chapter 76

MENG YÜ-LOU ASSUAGES YÜEH-NIANG'S WRATH; HSI-MEN CH'ING REPUDIATES LICENTATE WEN

Before deciding upon appropriate action,
one must think thrice;
So as to avoid being the author of one's own dissatisfactions.
For humans residing in this world the wind and waves are dangerous;
Wind and waves arise throughout the twenty-four hours of the day.¹

THE STORY GOES that when Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Yüeh-niang had not come out for what seemed like half a day, he went into her bedroom himself and urged her to do so. Upon seeing that she was in the process of getting dressed, he went back out and invited Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come in and take a seat in the parlor of the master suite. Once there, Dr. Jen observed that the upper end of the room was concealed by a gold-flecked hanging screen, beside which there were arrayed wide benches provided with cushions, while the floor was covered with carpets, and there was a brazier in place.

Before long, Yüeh-niang emerged from her bedroom. Behold:

She is petite in stature,
With a round visage, and
A clear off-white complexion.
Her figure is neither plump nor thin,
Her stature is neither short nor tall.
Her eyebrows are like crescent moons;
Her phoenix eyes are slender and long.
Her graceful fingers reveal the jade of Consort Chen of the Wei;²
Her ruby lips display the cloves of the Han dynasty Secretariat.³

When she approached him and bowed in greeting, Dr. Jen was thrown into such consternation that he stepped deferentially aside and bent low in response to her salutation. Yüeh-niang then sat down facing him, while Ch'in-t'ung placed a table with a brocade cushion in front of her, and she:

Stretched out her jade wrist, Revealed her slender fingers, and directed Dr. Jen to take her pulse. After an appropriate time, Yüeh-niang withdrew and returned to her room, from which she sent a page boy out with a serving of tea.

When he had finished his tea, Dr. Jen said, "Your venerable lady's symptoms reveal that her vital energy and blood circulation are weak, and the pulse at her wrist is floating and rough. Though she possesses fetal energy, its constructive and defensive elements are imbalanced, which is conducive to anger, and has stirred up the fire in her liver. At present, her head and eyes are unclear, and her abdominal duct is somewhat obstructed, resulting in a state of depression. In her four limbs, there is a deficiency of blood and an excess of energy."

Yüeh-niang sent Ch'in-t'ung out to report, "Right now, Mother is suffering from headache and heart distention. Her arms feel numb, the downward pressure in her abdomen is painful, the lumbar region of her lower back is aching, and:

She cannot taste what she eats and drinks."⁴

"I am already aware of these symptoms," said Dr. Jen, "and have clearly described them."

"I will not conceal from you, Hou-ch'i," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that my wife is currently in the last month of her pregnancy, but because she has gotten so upset, her vital energy has difficulty circulating, being trapped below her diaphragm. I beseech you, venerable sir, to take care in determining whether to increase or decrease the dosage of the medications you prescribe. To do so would be a manifestation of your magnanimity."

"There is no need for you to instruct me," responded Dr. Jen. "I will, of course, do my best. Once I get home, I will prepare medications for her that should protect her fetus, repair her vital energy, settle her stomach, improve her resilience, and alleviate her pain. Once your venerable lady has taken them, she would do well to avoid occasions for anger, and reduce her consumption of rich foods."

"I beseech you, venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "to do whatever you can to tranquilize her fetus."

"Of course," responded Dr. Jen, "I will endeavor as best I can to tranquilize her fetus, repair her vital energy, and nourish the constructive and defensive elements in her constitution. There is no need for you to enjoin me any further. I will give it my most careful consideration."

"My Third Lady," Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, "is suffering from a chill in the stomach. I hope that you will be able to come up with some womb-warming pills to alleviate her condition."

"Your pupil will respectfully comply with your command," said Dr. Jen. "I will seal them up for you immediately."

So saying, he got up and went out to the front reception hall, where he noticed that there were a considerable number of musicians from the Music Office waiting in the courtyard.

"Venerable sir," he asked, "what sort of event are you putting on in your residence today?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing responded by explaining, "His Honor Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, together with the officials of the Two Provincial Offices, have invited the grand coordinator of Shantung, Hou Meng, to a banquet to be held here today."

Upon hearing this, Dr. Jen was astonished at heart and felt more respect than ever for Hsi-men Ch'ing. He bowed and scraped before mounting his horse outside the front gate, showing greater deference than ever before, and double his previous regard. When Hsi-men Ch'ing came back from seeing him off, he immediately sealed up a tael of silver and two handkerchiefs and sent Ch'in-t'ung off with them in a gift box, to go on horseback in order to pick up the medicines.

Meanwhile, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and the rest were all in Yüeh-niang's room, engaged in preparing boxes of candied fruit, and polishing the silver utensils.

"First Lady," they asked, "how is it that, though you hadn't originally wanted to go out and be seen, no sooner did the doctor examine you than he was able to tell, thus and so, exactly what you were suffering from?"

"What sort of a wife does he take me for?" said Yüeh-niang. "Let me die if I must, for all he cares. Who knows what that whore is up to? She constantly tries to exert control over me, while claiming that I treat her as though I were her mother-in-law. The only difference between us is one of relative age, and I happen to be eight months older than she is. She maintains that since our husband loves her, it is only appropriate that he should treat us as equals. If she had not made sure of his backing, how would she have dared engage me in such:

A vituperative altercation?

If the rest of you had not urged me so strongly to go out and see the doctor, I wouldn't have gone out for ten years. Let me die if I must. As the saying goes:

If one cock dies, another will crow in its stead.⁵

Is not the crowing of the new cock great to hear?

Once I'm dead, he can raise her to my position, and thus eliminate all this quarreling and wrangling.

When you weed out the turnips, there is room for other things."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" exclaimed Meng Yü-lou. "First Lady, how can you say such things? I am prepared to swear an oath on her behalf. This Sister Six, and I don't say this judgmentally, is indeed prone to act as though she:

Didn't know any better, and is given to throwing her weight around, engaging in backbiting, and acting officiously. She's just a baggage, for whom, all too often:

The words are mouthed but the heart isn't in it.

First Lady, to allow yourself to get so worked up over her is a mistake."

"Do you really think that she is more thoughtless than you?" responded Yüeh-niang. "On the contrary, she knows exactly what she's doing. How is it that she is so prone to surreptitiously eavesdropping on people, and then using their words to reflect satirically on them?"

"First Lady," said Meng Yü-lou:

"The head of a household is a receptacle for catching dirty water.

If you lack the capacity to take it, what are you to do? As the saying goes:

A single gentleman can accommodate ten petty persons.

If you raise your hand,

She will venture to get by,

but if you refuse to make allowances for her,

She'll be unable to get by."

"The fact is," said Yüeh-niang, "that, as long as our husband stands up for her this way, his legitimate wife will be relegated to the rear.”

“Who are you fooling?” said Meng Yü-lou. “Right now, while you are in the unhealthy condition that you are, would Father have the gall to visit her quarters?”

“Why wouldn’t he?” said Yüeh-niang. “Didn’t she suggest that she could keep him tied up there with a length of hog-bristle rope? A man’s heart is just like a horse without a bridle. Whomever he chooses to favor, he will favor. And anyone who presumes to try and restrain him, she will accuse of being wanton.”

“That’s enough, First Lady,” objected Meng Yü-lou. “You’ve already had your say. Try to restrain your anger somewhat. Let me go get her to come and kowtow to you, and offer an apology for her misconduct. If we avail ourselves of the presence of Sister-in-law Wu, maybe the two of you can be induced to make it up somehow. If not, Father will be left in a very awkward position:

Damned if he does, and damned if he doesn’t, so that his every move will be problematical. If he wants to go to her quarters, he’ll be afraid of your anger; and if he fails to do so, she won’t venture to come out. Today, a banquet is being held in the front compound, and we are here, busy as can be, preparing boxes of candied fruit. If she is allowed to skulk by herself in her own quarters, the rest of us will find it hard to forgive her. Sister-in-law Wu, is what I say right, or isn’t it?”

“Sister-in-law,” responded Sister-in-law Wu, “what the Third Lady says is right. If the two of you continue to be at odds, and persist in refusing to see each other, it will make things hard for my brother-in-law, who will find it awkward to approach either of you.”

Yüeh-niang did not say so much as a word in response to this, and Meng Yü-lou started to leave, and go toward the front compound.

“Meng the Third,” objected Yüeh-niang, “don’t you go after her. Let her come, or not, as she pleases.”

“She won’t dare not to come,” said Meng Yü-lou. “If she won’t come, I’ll simply tie her up with a length of hog-bristle rope and drag her here.”

With that, she made her way straight to Chin-lien’s quarters, where she found her, with disheveled hair and a sallow complexion, sitting on the k’ang.

“Sister Six,” said Meng Yü-lou, “why are you playing the fool? Do up your hair. Today, a banquet is being held up front, and we are as busy as can be preparing for it in the rear compound. You ought to come back and join us. What’s the point of merely venting your spleen this way? Just now, thus and so, I’ve been arguing with the First Lady, urging her to relent, for quite a while. You ought to come back to the rear compound, keep your bad temper to yourself, while displaying your good temper, and see if you can’t bring yourself to kowtow to her, and offer her an apology for your misconduct. Both you and I are in a position in which:

When confronted with low eaves,

How can we not lower our heads?⁶

As the saying goes:

Honeyed words and plausible speeches

can make the twelfth month warm;

Cruel words that are hurtful to others can turn the sixth month cold.

The two of you have already had your exchange of words. How long are you going to persist in venting your spleen?

Men are as fond of expressing their anger,

As Buddhas are of receiving burnt incense.

If you will only go and offer her an apology for your misconduct, this problem, great as it is, can be brought to an end. If you refuse, however, you will put Father in an awkward position with regard to both of you, and if he wants to come to your place, she is certain to be annoyed.”

“Ai-ya! Ai-ya!” exclaimed Chin-lien. “There’s no comparison between us. As she has declared, she is the genuine article, the legitimate wife, while you and I are merely women he has picked up after cohabiting with us amid the dewdrops.⁷ What sort of standing do we possess? We’re not to be compared to the toes on her feet.”

“Let her say what she likes,” responded Meng Yü-lou. “As I said to her yesterday, ‘You’re:

Hitting three or four of us with one swipe of the stick.

When I married your husband, I was not just someone he picked up along the way but was duly married, with the help of the standard:

Three matchmakers and six witnesses,⁸ before consenting to enter your household.

For every branch you chop down,

A hundred trees are threatened.

When the hare dies, the fox is sad;

Creatures grieve for their fellows.

Even if Sister Six has exasperated you, there are others of us who have not.

Though one may possess the authority, one should not use it completely;

Though one may have something to say, one should not say it completely.⁹

In all things, it is best to:

Look up to those above and regard those below, in order to provide against future developments. How can you ignore the fact that:
The locust and the grasshopper,
Are maligned in the same breath,
here in the presence of the three nuns and Big Sister Yü?

Every person has a face;
Every tree has its bark,¹⁰
but our faces are being drained of blood, and our intercourse will come to an end.'

"Now, if you refuse to go see her, what do you propose to do? There is no avoiding the fact that, day after day, the two of you will be in close proximity to each other:
As inseparable as the lip and the cheek.
You ought to fix your hair right away, so the two of us can go back to the rear compound together."

When P'an Chin-lien heard what she had to say, she could only ponder it for what seemed like half a day;
Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel, before picking up the dressing mirror in front of her mirror stand, brushing her hair, putting on her fret, getting into appropriate clothes, and accompanying Meng Yü-lou back to the master suite in the rear compound.

Meng Yü-lou lifted aside the portiere and went inside before her, saying, "First Lady, I went there as I said I would do and have managed to drag her back with me. She dared not refuse to come."

Then, turning to Chin-lien, she said, "My child, why haven't you come over and kowtowed to your mother?"

Standing to one side, she continued, "Kinswoman, my child is young, and is still so:
Unconscious of right and wrong,
that she has offended you. If you will only:
Lift high your gracious hand, make allowances for her, and forgive her this once; should she ever be rude to you again in the future, you may punish her as you see fit. I will not have a word to say about it."

Then P'an Chin-lien:
Just as if inserting a taper in its holder,
proceeded to kowtow four times to Yüeh-niang.

After which, she jumped up and hit Meng Yü-lou a blow, saying, "You're delirious, you insensate whore! You're playing the role of my mother again, are you?"

Everyone laughed at this, and even Yüeh-niang herself couldn't help laughing.

Meng Yü-lou carried on, saying, "You lousy slave! On seeing your mistress show you a favorable countenance, you ruffle up your feathers and strike your own mother."

"It is such a relief to see you sisters making it up with each other so light-heartedly," said Sister-in-law Wu. "Even though this sister-in-law of mine may sometimes be guilty of saying:
A word or half a word,¹¹ that grates on your ears, if you will only agree to:
Support and respect each other,¹² and be sparing in your responses, all will be well. As the saying goes:
Although the peony blossom may be lovely,
It requires verdant leaves to set it off."¹³

"If she had not said what she did," responded Yüeh-niang, "who would have chosen to criticize her?"

"You are Heaven, while we are the Earth," said Chin-lien. "If you see fit to grant us your accommodation, we will venerate it as though it were engraved in our minds."

At this, Meng Yü-lou gave her a smack on the shoulder, saying, "My child:
You've only endured a slap with a flour sack."¹⁴

She then continued, "Don't you say anything more. We've been working away here all day long. It's high time for you to lend us a hand."

Chin-lien, thereupon, proceeded to:
Wash her hands and trim her nails, before getting onto the k'ang and joining Meng Yü-lou in preparing boxes of candied fruit. But no more of this.

Sun Hsüeh-o was engaged in directing the group of servants' wives in preparing dishes at the stove in the kitchen. The hired chefs were also working in the large kitchen in the front compound, frying and roasting, steaming and boiling, as they roasted brocade-wrapped mutton and carved flowered pork.

When Ch'in-t'ung returned with the medicines he had been sent to fetch, Hsi-men Ch'ing read the labels and had the pills sent to Meng Yü-lou's quarters, and the ingredients for a decoction turned over to Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh-niang then said to Meng Yü-lou, "So you've sent for a prescription too, have you?"

"It's for that problem I had the other day," said Meng Yü-lou. "I was feeling considerable pain in my lower regions, and I asked Father to tell Dr. Jen about it, and get him to prescribe a couple of doses of pills for me."

"It was because you hadn't been able to eat anything that day that you caught a chill," said Yüeh-niang. "It's only right that you should take a chill in the abdomen seriously."

But let us put aside the events in the rear compound for the moment.

To resume our story, in the front reception hall Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien was the first to arrive, in order to look over the arrangements for the banquet. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him into the summerhouse, where they sat down together.

Sung Ch'iao-nien thanked him profoundly for his gift of the incense-burning tripod, saying, "Your pupil really ought to repay you for it."

"The fact is," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "that, from the beginning, I would have liked to present it to Your Excellency but feared that you might not accept it. How can you speak of repayment?"

"In that case," said Sung Ch'iao-nien:

"What can I do to be worthy of such largess?"

So saying, he made a bow in order to express his gratitude.

When they had finished their tea, he started to interrogate Hsi-men Ch'ing about his assessment of the condition of the people and public morality in the district, and Hsi-men Ch'ing responded to his questions with perfunctory affirmatives and negatives.

He then went on to ask his opinion of the local officials, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Your humble subordinate is only aware that, as for Prefect Hu Shih-wen of Tung-p'ing prefecture:

His reputation among the people is long established;¹⁵ and the magistrate of Ch'ing-ho district, Li Ta-t'ien, is:

Conscientious in performing his official duties.

As for the rest:

I am not familiar with all the relevant details;¹⁶ and would not presume to speak irresponsibly."

Sung Ch'iao-nien went on to ask, "Commandant Chou Hsiu is an associate of yours. How would you assess his character?"

"Although Commandant Chou is:

Both experienced and reliable,"¹⁷ replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He is not a match for Military Director-in-Chief Ching of Chi-chou, who passed the military examinations in his youth and is:

Both talented and courageous.

Your Excellency ought to take him into consideration."

"You must be referring to Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung," said Sung Ch'iao-nien. "How do you happen to be familiar with him?"

"He and I have a nodding acquaintance with each other," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "The other day he presented me with a copy of his curriculum vitae and asked me to show it to you, in the hope that you might be induced to:

Look favorably upon it."

"I have also heard long since that he is an excellent military officer," said Sung Ch'iao-nien. "Is there anyone else whom you would recommend?"

"There is one Wu K'ai," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "who is the elder brother of your humble subordinate's wife. He currently holds the position of battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard and has recently been deputed to repair the local Charity Granary. According to precedent, he is eligible to be promoted to the rank of a commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard. If Your Excellency should see fit to put in a good word on his behalf, your humble subordinate would feel much indebted to your kindness."

"Since he is a relative of yours," said Sung Ch'iao-nien, "in the future, when I submit my report, I will not only recommend him for promotion, but also guarantee that he will continue to hold his current substantive position."

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly bowed to him as an expression of his gratitude and presented him with the curriculum vitae of Ching Chung and Wu K'ai.

After Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien had finished perusing them, he turned them over to his clerical docket officer, saying, "When the time comes for me to draft my report, show them to me again."

The docket officer, accordingly, took charge of them, and Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged for one of his attendants to surreptitiously present him with three taels of silver, in return for which the docket officer assured him that the charge would be engraved upon his heart. But no more of this.

As they were speaking, they heard the sound of drum music from the front reception hall, and an attendant came in to announce that the officials from the Two Provincial Offices had arrived. This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he immediately went out to the reception hall to receive them and exchange formal greetings, while Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien took his time as he slowly made his way out the postern gate from the garden.

When the crowd of officials had finished with the customary exchange of greetings and observed that in the center of the room there stood a large portable table, on which were displayed candied effigies of the Five Ancients, ingot-shaped cakes, square-shaped confectionery, a high-stacked pyramid of fruits, the flesh of the five sacrificial animals, and an array of other comestibles fit for a major banquet, all of which were neatly arranged and surrounded by a cluster of lavishly furnished table settings:

Their hearts were filled with great joy, and they all thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "We have put you to a lot of trouble. Allow us to supplement our prior contributions to the expenses."

"It is true that our contributions have been inadequate," said Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, "but, if you will do so for my sake, Ssueh-ch'uan, let us spare these gentlemen the need to make any further contributions."

"Whoever heard of such a thing," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

They all then proceeded to sit down in order of precedence, while the attendants served them with tea.

The group of officials then explained, "As for the venerable gentleman Hou Meng, all of us have sent subordinates to remind him of the invitation, but he is still at the yamen of the Regional Military Command and has not set out yet."

The file leaders and musicians lined up to either side inside the second gate, as closely as though they were:

Locked tight in an iron bucket, with their drums, flutes, pipes, and metallophones, in expectation of his arrival. They remained on the lookout for him until the early afternoon, when a messenger on horseback arrived and reported that His Honor Hou Meng was on his way. The musicians to either side began to play their instruments, and the crowd of officials all went outside the main gate to receive him, while Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien stood in waiting inside the second gate.

Before long, after a squad of soldiers bearing blue flags had preceded him to clear the way, Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, wearing a gown emblazoned with a scarlet peacock, sable earmuffs, and a gold-buckled girdle, and riding in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers, arrived at the gate and descended from his sedan chair. The crowd of officials welcomed him inside, and Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, who had changed into a round-collared scarlet robe, emblazoned with a motif of golden clouds and a white hsieh-chih, a mythical one-horned goat that was said to gore wrongdoers, and a girdle with a plaque of rhinoceros horn, ushered him deferentially into the great reception hall. Only after the two of them had exchanged the customary greetings, and the various officials had individually paid their respects, did the time come for him to be presented to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"This is our host, Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing," said Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien. "He is currently serving as judicial commissioner in the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and is also a protégé of the venerable Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching."

Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, thereupon, directed one of his clerical attendants to present Hsi-men Ch'ing with a red accordion-bound calling card, which read, "Your devoted friend Hou Meng pays his respects."

Hsi-men Ch'ing respectfully received it with both hands and turned it over to a servant for safekeeping.

When they had finished paying their mutual respects, they all loosened their clothing and assumed their seats. The various officials were seated to either side, while Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien occupied the position of host. After tea had been served, the musicians struck up their music beneath the steps, and Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien took up a cup and proffered wine to Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, stuck flower ornaments in his cap, and presented him with a bolt of fabric. Immediately afterwards, the guest of honor's table setting was carried downstairs, the comestibles displayed thereon were packed in boxes, and personnel were dispatched to deliver them to his official residence. After this, they resumed their seats, a repast with soup and rice was duly presented, and the chef came out to carve the entrée of flowered pork, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

By this time, the musicians from the Music Offices had put on a number of ensemble dance pieces in which the performers were all clad in officially supplied brand new embroidered costumes, and a medley of vaudeville acts had been performed, all of which were superbly presented. Only after that did the troupe of Hai-yen actors come forward, kowtow to the company, and present the program of pieces they were prepared to perform. His Honor Hou Meng told them to perform something from the ch'uan-ch'i drama P'ei Chin-kung huan-tai chi.¹⁸ When they had finished performing one scene, they withdrew, and the chef proceeded to carve the entrée of brocade-wrapped mutton. Truly:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,
Wind and string instruments, song, and dance, Classical melodies saturate the ears, and Gold and sable finery fill the banquet chamber.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The auspicious aura filling the ornate hall is neither fog, nor is it mist;
The singing diverts the moving clouds, and the tables are laden with wine.
Not only are the beauties, like red moths,
dangling their jade pendants;
But the black locks at their temples are studded with golden cicadas.

Grand Coordinator Hou Meng remained in his place only until the sun began to sink in the West. After:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed, and
Two dramatic episodes had been performed, he got up to go and directed his attendants to take five taels of silver and distribute it among the cooks, waiters, musicians, and servants. He then put on his outdoor clothes and took his leave, while the assembled officials escorted him to the front gate and looked on as he got into his sedan chair and departed. When they came back inside, Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien and the other officials also thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing, took their leave, and departed.

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had seen them off and come back inside, he dismissed the musicians and, seeing that it was still rather early, directed that the tables should be left in place, and that the caterers should set what remained of the various dishes and delicacies in order. He then sent page boys to go and invite Wu K'ai, Licentiate Wen, Ying Po-chüeh, his managers, Fu Ming and Kan Jun, Pen Ti-ch'uan, and Ch'en Ching-chi to come join him and enjoy a dramatic performance. He also had two table settings of wine and savories provided for the troupe of Hai-yen actors to eat while he waited for the guests to arrive, after which, he told them to be ready to perform the winter scene entitled Han Hsi-tsai yeh-yen (Han Hsi-tsai's nocturnal banquet), from the ch'uan-ch'i drama Ssu-chieh chi (The four seasons).¹⁹ In addition, he had pots of plum blossoms brought out and displayed on the tables to either side, so they could enjoy the plum blossoms while consuming their wine.

It so happens that, on that day, Pen the Fourth and Lai-hsing had been in charge of the kitchen, Ch'en Ching-chi had been in charge of the wine, and the managers Fu Ming and Kan Jun had been in charge of the utensils for the banquet. When they learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing had invited them to join him, they all came and sat down in his presence. Before long, Licentiate Wen came from across the street, made a bow, and sat down, after which Wu K'ai, Wu the Second, and Ying Po-chüeh also arrived.

Ying Po-chüeh greeted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow, saying, "I fear I provided but scant entertainment for my sisters-in-law the other day, and I am grateful for your lavish gifts."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed and upbraided him, saying, "Why you lousy god-damned dog! You got a real eyeful spying on your mothers through an aperture in the window, didn't you?"

"You shouldn't believe the nonsense people talk," protested Ying Po-chüeh. "Whoever heard of such a thing. It can't be anyone else, now I think about it."

Pointing at Wang Ching, he then accused him, saying, "So it was you, you lousy dog-bone! You actually came home and told him such a tale, did you? When I get the chance, I'll take a bite out of your flesh, you little dog-bone!"

After this exchange of words was over, and they had consumed their tea, Wu K'ai expressed a wish to go back to the rear compound, and Hsi-men Ch'ing agreed to accompany him.

As they went along, Hsi-men Ch'ing explained to his brother-in-law, thus and so, "I spoke to Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien about that matter of yours, and he looked over your curriculum vitae and then entrusted it to a clerk, to whom I also gave three taels of silver. He accepted it along with the curriculum vitae of His Honor Ching Chung and promised that when the time came for him to draft his report, he would give it his special attention."

Upon hearing this, Wu K'ai was utterly delighted and bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "I am much beholden to you, Brother-in-law, for your efforts on my behalf."

"I just told him that you were my wife's elder brother," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and he replied, saying, 'Since he is a relative of yours, I will be sure to take care of it for your sake.'"

Thereupon, they went into the master suite together in order to see Yüeh-niang.

After Yüeh-niang had greeted her elder brother with a bow, Wu K'ai turned to his wife and said, "Hadh't you better go home? There's no one there to look after the house. Why are you so reluctant to leave?"

"My sister-in-law wanted me to stay," said Sister-in-law Wu. "She has invited me to remain through the third day of the coming month, and return home on the fourth."

"Since it is my sister who is keeping you," said Wu K'ai, "you might just as well come home on the fourth, then,"

When they had finished speaking, Yüeh-niang suggested that he stay for a visit, but he chose not to sit down and went back to the front compound, where the wine had already been provided, and he could have a drink.

At this juncture, Wu K'ai, together with Wu the Second, Ying Po-chüeh, and Licentiate Wen, took their places as guests, while Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down in the host's position, and managers Fu Ming, Kan Jun, Pen Ti-ch'uan, and Ch'en Ching-chi took their places to either side, making a total of five tables in all; while below, the troupe of actors began to play their gongs and drums and then proceeded to perform the scene from the Ssu-chieh chi entitled Han Hsi-tsai yeh-yen yu-t'ing chia-yü (Han Hsi-tsai's nocturnal banquet exposes the tryst in the relay station).

Just as the merrymaking was at its height, Tai-an suddenly came in and said, "Your kinsman Ch'iao Hung's household has sent Ch'iao T'ung here, and he is waiting down below to have a word with Father."

Hsi-men Ch'ing immediately got up from his place and went to the postern gate on the east to see Ch'iao T'ung, who had been sent by his kinsman Ch'iao Hung.

"Father says to apologize to you for the scant entertainment he provided the other day," said Ch'iao T'ung. "He has sent me today to deliver the customary fee of thirty taels of silver for the purchase of a position as an honorary official, which he has sealed up here, together with an additional sum of five taels, to be distributed to the staff of the personnel office."

"I will turn it over to Prefect Hu Shih-wen tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and he will supply the order of appointment in return. 'What need is there to spend any silver on the staff of the personnel office? You can take it back with you.'"

He then directed Tai-an to tell the kitchen to take care of providing wine and something to eat for Ch'iao T'ung in the studio in the summerhouse, and then send him on his way.

To make a long story short, that day, by the time the actors had performed two scenes from the play about the tryst in the relay station, it was already the first watch, and the party for Hsi-men Ch'ing and his guests in the front compound broke up.

Once the utensils had been cleared away, Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to Yüeh-niang's room, where she was sitting on the k'ang with Sister-in-law Wu. When Sister-in-law Wu saw Hsi-men Ch'ing come in, she promptly got up and moved into an adjacent room.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to Yüeh-niang, "Today, I spoke, thus and so, on behalf of your elder brother, to Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, and he promised not only to see that he is promoted one class in rank, but also that he will continue to hold his current substantive position, so he will become the assistant commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard. I told your elder brother about it just now, and he is as pleased as can be. After the censor's report is submitted at the end of the year, the imperial rescript confirming his appointment will come down."

"Needless to say," responded Yüeh-niang, "as a poor officer of the guard, he can hardly come up with the two or three hundred taels of silver he will need to expend."

"Who is asking him for even so much as a hundred cash?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I simply said to Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien that he was my wife's elder brother, and he personally promised that he would not fail to take care of it as a favor to me."

"You can do as you like in dealing with him," said Yüeh-niang. "I won't interfere with you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked Yü-hsiao, "Have you decocted that medicine for your mistress? Bring it here so I can see that your mistress takes it."

"You can go about your business," said Yüeh-niang. "Don't worry about it. I'll take it when I'm ready to go to bed."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was about to go outside, but Yüeh-niang called him back, saying, "Just where are you headed? If you are headed for the front compound, you'd better not go there. She came back here and apologized to me for her misconduct a while ago. All that she needs is for you to go and apologize to her."

"I'm not going to her quarters," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"If you're not going to her quarters," responded Yüeh-niang, "whose quarters are you going to? You ought not to have anything to do with that wet nurse in the front compound either. The other day, in front of Sister-in-law Wu, the Fifth Lady belittled me by saying that I allowed you to carry on with her in order to curry favor with you. But you continue to be as shameless as ever."

"Why do you pay any attention to that little whore?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Just do as I say," responded Yüeh-niang. "I don't want you to go to the front compound today. And I don't want you to stay here either. Why don't you go and spend the night in Li Chiao-erh's quarters? You can go wherever you want tomorrow, and I won't interfere with you."

On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing, finding himself:

At a loss for what to do next,

felt compelled to go spend the night in Li Chiao-erh's quarters.

The next day was the first day of the twelfth month. Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen early in the morning and joined Ho Yung-shou in issuing directives; after which, he took his place on the bench, held roll call, and dealt with the accumulated paperwork. The morning was over by the time he returned home.

He then took care of preparing gifts of a newly slaughtered pig and a jug of wine, along with the thirty taels of silver, and sent Tai-an to deliver them to Hu Shih-wen, the prefect of Tung-p'ing prefecture. Prefect Hu Shih-wen accepted the gifts and immediately proceeded to seal up the order of appointment for Ch'iao Hung.

Meanwhile, at home, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Yin-yang Master Hsü to set up an altar in the reception hall and make an offering of a pig and a sheep, wine and fruit, and burn paper money, in order to fulfill the vow he had made after encountering the storm on his way back from the capital. When the ceremony was finished, he sent Yin-yang Master Hsü on his way.

Thereupon, seeing that Tai-an had returned, he examined the reply from Prefect Hu Shih-wen and saw that he had provided the order of appointment, that it was duly stamped with numerous seals, and that it read: "Ch'iao Hung is hereby appointed as an honorary official of this prefecture." He then sent Tai-an to deliver two boxes of the meat from the foregoing sacrificial offering to the household of Ch'iao Hung, and invite him to come over for a drink, so he could show him the order of appointment. He also had boxes of the sacrificial meat delivered to Wu K'ai, Licentiate Wen, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and his managers, Fu Ming, Kan Jun, Han Tao-kuo, Pen Ti-ch'uan, and Ts'ui Pen, one box for each of them. But no more of this.

In addition, he sent invitations for a party on the third day of the month to Commandant Chou Hsiu, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Eunuch Directors Liu and Hsüeh, Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou, Battalion Commander Fan Hsün, Wu K'ai, Ch'iao Hung, and Wang the Third, ten persons in all. He also engaged troupes of vaudeville performers and musicians, as well as four singing girls, for the occasion.

On that day, Meng Yü-lou went to Yüeh-niang's room to hand over the household accounts, which she had finished reckoning, to Hsi-men Ch'ing, in the expectation that he would turn them over to Chin-lien, so that she would no longer be responsible for handling the household expenses.

While there, she enquired of Yüeh-niang, "First Lady, after taking that medicine yesterday, are you feeling any better?"

"No wonder people say that all a wanton woman needs is to have a man fondle her wrist," remarked Yüeh-niang. "Today I'm feeling fine. I no longer have a headache, and my abdomen no longer feels distended."

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this, saying, "First Lady, it would seem that all you needed was that touch."

Sister-in-law Wu also laughed at this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing came in at this juncture to ask Yüeh-niang's opinion on the managing of the accounts, and Yüeh-niang said, "Hand them over to whoever's turn it is, that's all. Why are you asking me about it? Who cares who they are turned over to?"

Only then did Hsi-men Ch'ing weigh out thirty taels of silver and thirty strings of cash and turn them over to Chin-lien to manage.

But no more of this.

After some time, Ch'iao Hung arrived, and Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down with him in the reception hall and explained, thus and so, what had happened, showing him the order of appointment he had obtained from Prefect Hu Shih-wen, which confirmed that he had been appointed as an honorary prefectural official, in return for the customary donation of "thirty piculs of white rice," to be used for the logistic needs of border defense.

He was utterly delighted by this and promptly bowed in thanks to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "I am much beholden to you, Kinsman, for your efforts on my behalf.

Permit me to offer you an obeisance in gratitude."²⁰

He then called in Ch'iao T'ung and told him to take the order of appointment home for him, after which, he turned to Hsi-men Ch'ing and said, "In the future, should you invite me to a formal engagement, I will be entitled to wear the cap and girdle of an official and can thus presume to keep your other guests company."

"On the third, Kinsman" said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I hope that, whatever you do, you will deign to come by early."

When they had finished their tea, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'in-t'ung to set up a table in his studio in the anteroom on the west side of the courtyard and invited Ch'iao Hung to accompany him there, where it was somewhat warmer, and they could also take advantage of a recessed brazier.

Once Hsi-men Ch'ing and Ch'iao Hung were seated there, face to face, Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, "Yesterday, Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, and the officials of the Two Provincial Offices, hosted a banquet here, to which they invited His Honor Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, who turned out to be highly gratified. Tomorrow, he is leaving for the capital, and my colleagues and I will have to go out to the suburbs to see him off before returning home."

The table had just been wiped off, and an assortment of dishes was about to be served, when who should appear but Ying Po-chüeh, who had collected some contributions and had Ying Pao bring them in a box to present to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"These are the congratulatory contributions from the gentlemen concerned," he explained.

Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the box to have a look and saw that the first name was that of the Taoist Abbot Wu Tsung-che, followed by the names of Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Chu Jih-nien, Sun T'ien-hua, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Pai Lai-ch'iang, Li Chih, Huang the Fourth, and Tu the Third, ten contributors in all.

"For my part," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I am also inviting my kinsmen Wu the Second, and Brother-in-law Shen, as well as Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i and Hua Tzu-yu, who live outside the city gate, my three managers, and Licentiate Wen. There will be twenty or more of us altogether, and you are all invited to come here on the fourth."

He then directed an attendant to take the contributions back to the rear compound and sent Ch'in-t'ung to take a horse and go invite Wu K'ai to join them in order to keep Ch'iao Hung company.

He went on to ask, "Is Master Wen Pi-ku at home or not?"

"Master Wen is not at home," responded Lai-an. "Early this morning, he went out to visit a friend."

Before long, Wu K'ai arrived, and they were joined by Ch'en Ching-chi, so there were five of them sitting down together to have a drink. A variety of hot dishes to go with the wine, and bowls of soup, were arrayed upon the table, including, as might be expected, pig's feet and sheep's head; roasted, stewed, boiled, and sautéed chicken, fish, goose, and duck; and other supplementary dishes.

While they were enjoying their drinks, Hsi-men Ch'ing told Wu K'ai about Ch'iao Hung's occasion for congratulation, saying, "Today, he has received his order of appointment as an honorary prefectural official. Someday soon, we should prepare gifts, and inscribe a scroll, in order to express our felicitations over his ascension to the prefectural bureaucracy."

"You embarrass me," protested Ch'iao Hung. "What sort of appointment is this, that I should presume to put you gentlemen to so much trouble?"

At this juncture, there suddenly arrived a messenger from the district yamen, who had been deputed to deliver copies of the new calendar for the coming year, a total of 250 copies in all. Hsi-men Ch'ing sent a note in reply, tipped the messenger, and sent him on his way.

"We haven't yet seen the new calendar," said Ying Po-chüeh.

Hsi-men Ch'ing broke open a package of fifty calendars and divided them up between Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, and Ch'iao Hung. Ying Po-chüeh, on taking a look at one of them, saw that the new year had been designated as the first year of the Ch'ung-ho reign period, and that the first month was to be an intercalary month. But we will say no more about how they enjoyed themselves at the party that day:

Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits.

They continued drinking until the evening, when Ch'iao Hung was the first to get up and go home. Hsi-men Ch'ing kept Wu K'ai company until the first watch before the party broke up.

Hsi-men Ch'ing issued orders to his attendants, saying, "Stand by with my horse early in the morning, and go and invite His Honor Ho Yung-shou to join me here, so we can proceed together to the suburbs to see off His Excellency Hou Meng. Also, designate four orderlies, along with Lai-an and Ch'un Hung, to accompany the sedan chair of the First Lady on her visit to the Hsia household."

When he had finished speaking, he went to the quarters of P'an Chin-lien. Before he entered her room, the woman had:

Removed her headdress,

Carelessly coiled her raven locks,

Left her flowery countenance in disarray,

And neglected to apply rouge and powder.

She was lying with her clothes on, sprawled on the surface of the bed, and had not lit any lamps in the room, so everything was very still. When Hsi-men Ch'ing came into the room, he first called for Ch'un-mei, but there was no response. Upon seeing the woman lying on the bed, he called to her, but she did not make a sound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down on the bed and said, "You crazy oily mouth! Why are you carrying on this way, refusing to answer?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing pulled her up from her reclining position with one hand and said, "What are you so resentful about?"

The woman, putting on a succession of deliberate acts, twisted her face into a grimace and allowed an endless cascade of tears to roll down her fragrant cheeks.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, even though he had been forged out of iron or stone, could not help feeling his heart soften.

Embracing her by the neck with one hand, he enquired of her, saying, "You crazy oily mouth! You're perfectly fine. Why did the two of you get into such an altercation for no good reason?"

The woman refused to reply for what seemed like half a day before saying, "Who began any altercation with her? It was she who came up with an excuse for finding fault with me, accusing me, in front of other people, of being an inveterate husband-monopolizer and man-hunter, whom you had picked up somewhere; whereas she is the genuine article, and your legitimate wife. Who told you to come to my room, and for what purpose? You should stick to her, that's all. That way, I won't be able to monopolize you. She claims that whenever you come home, you insist on coming to pester me in this room of mine. Luckily, I heard her say that with my own ears. Have you really been spending the last few nights in this room of mine? How can anyone be so:

Barefaced and red-eyed,

as to engage in such backbiting? And as for that fur coat, she is critical of me for asking you for it on my own initiative, without mentioning it to her beforehand. Am I a slave or a maidservant of yours, that I should have to go to your room and kowtow to you when I want something? And as for that little piece of mine, who abused that lousy blind whore, she criticizes me for not disciplining her. Why should she insist on making such a fuss about it? If you were a real man, and wanted to do so, you could settle the matter with a single blow of your fist, and thereby dispense with all this:

Idle chatter and superfluous talk.²¹

No doubt I ought to be:

Content to abide by my humble lot.

As the saying goes:

What is cheaply purchased is cheap when sold;

What is easily acquired is easily relinquished.

Since I was taken into your household merely to be your concubine, my status is unpropitious. It has always been true that:

Good people are subject to being gulled;²²

Good horses are subject to being ridden.²³

That's just the way it is. If you take a look at the facts of the situation, who was it who, for fear of offending her, spent the night in someone else's quarters? Who was it who, on her behalf, sent for Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i? Who was it who allowed himself to be persuaded to do everything she asked? Meanwhile, it was I who was left to suffer in my room here:

On the far side of the mountains of Hell, where I might just as well have died, for all anyone else cared. All this simply reveals what kind of a heart she possesses. On top of which, I was forced to hold back my tears, go back to the rear compound, and offer her an apology for my misconduct."

As she spoke, an incessant flow of pearly tears rolled down her peach-flower cheeks, and she fell into Hsi-men Ch'ing's arms:

Sobbing and wailing,

as she wiped the mucus from her nose and tried to dry her tears.

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her on the one hand, and admonished her on the other, saying, "That's enough, my child. I've had too many things on my mind the last few days. The two of you ought to be more circumspect in what you say to each other. You can hardly expect me to say which of you is in the right. Last night I wanted to come see you, but she said I was going to apologize to you and wouldn't let me come, so I spent the night in Li Chiao-erh's place. Although I was sleeping with somebody else, I was only thinking of you."

"That's enough," the woman said. "I can see into that heart of yours. You consistently lavish your:

False affection and phony consideration,²⁴ on me; while, all the time, it is really that legitimate wife of yours whom you love. And right now, she is bearing your child. I'm nothing but a stalk of straw. There's no comparison between us."

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her by the neck and gave her a kiss, saying, "You crazy oily mouth! Don't talk such nonsense."

Who should appear at this juncture but Ch'iu-chü, who brought in a serving of tea.

"That lousy slave!" protested Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She's hardly sanitary. How come you have her serving the tea?"

He then went on to ask, "Why is Ch'un-mei nowhere to be seen?"

"You still want to ask after Ch'un-mei, do you?" the woman replied. "She's so starved she hardly has a breath of life left in her. She's lying prostrate in the other room. Including today, she's gone three or four days without so much as a sip of soup or water. All she wants to do in there is to die. She says that the way the First Lady abused her as a slave in front of other people has made her:

So angry she scarcely cares whether she is dead or alive.

She has done nothing but cry for the last three or four days.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he asked, “Is that true?”

“Do you think I'm trying to fool you?” the woman said. “Why don't you go see for yourself?”

Hsi-men Ch'ing, in a state of consternation, went into the adjacent room, where he found Ch'un-mei lying on the k'ang with:

Her fair countenance in disarray, and

Her cloud-shaped chignon all awry.

“You crazy little oily mouth!” Hsi-men Ch'ing called to her. “Why don't you get up?”

Though he called out to her, she did not make a sound and pretended to be asleep. Hsi-men Ch'ing then embraced her with both arms and lifted her up; but Ch'un-mei, stretching her torso while still in a seeming stupor, like:

A carp flexing its tail, nearly swept Hsi-men Ch'ing off his feet. Fortunately, he had embraced her firmly and was able to prevent himself from falling by leaning against the bedrail.

“Daddy, take your hands off me,” responded Ch'un-mei. “What do you think you're doing coming here to bother with a slave like myself? You'll only soil those two hands of yours.”

“You little oily mouth!” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “So what if the First Lady told you off with a word or two. It's hardly worth your getting so worked up about. I'm told that you haven't had a thing to eat for the last few days.”

“What's it to you whether I eat or not?” retorted Ch'un-mei. “After all, I'm no more than a good-for-nothing slave, whom you might as well let die if she chooses to. Ever since I've been a slave in your household, what business of yours have I ever ruined? I've never given my mistress any reason to rebuke me with so much as a word, or to give me so much as a slap. Merely on behalf of that lousy blind whore, who has been:

Ch'un-mei Manages Coquettishly to Resist Hsi-men Ch'ing

Laid by every man in the street, and Fucked by every guy in the alley,
 why should I deserve to be so reviled by the First Lady? She is critical of my mistress for failing to discipline me. No doubt she would have me dragged down and given five strokes with the bamboo on behalf of that blind whore. In the future, if that wife of Han Tao-kuo's fails to come here, so be it. But if she should come, just see what sort of a talking to I'll give her. It was she who sent that blind whore here, so she is the root of the problem."

"Even if it was she who sent her here," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it was with the best of intentions. Who could have known that she would be the cause of such a quarrel?"

"If she had only been a little more accommodating," said Ch'un-mei. "I rebuked her with the best of intentions, but she was too narrow-minded to take it."

"When I came in, just now," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "why didn't you pour out a cup of tea for me? That slave's hands are unclean. I wouldn't drink any tea that she poured."

Ch'un-mei responded by saying:

"Since Butcher Wang is dead and gone,
 One must eat pork with the bristles.

Right now, while I am in here, so weak I can hardly walk, you would have me pour your tea, would you?"

"You crazy little oily mouth!" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Who told you not to eat anything anyway?"

He then went on to say, "Let's move into the other room. I haven't had anything to eat yet either. I'll have Ch'iu-chü go back to the kitchen in the rear compound and bring us some food. They can pour us some wine, bake some stuffed pastries, and heat some soup flavored with pickled fish for us to eat." Thereupon:

Without permitting any further argument,²⁵

he took hold of Ch'un-mei's hand and dragged her into Chin-lien's room next door, where he ordered Ch'iu-chü to take a box back to the rear compound and bring them some dishes of food to go with their rice.

Before long, she came back with a square box of delicacies, containing a bowl of braised pig's head, a bowl of slow-boiled mutton, a bowl of blanched chicken, and a bowl of sautéed fresh fish, along with a supply of white rice. There were also four bowls of side dishes to go with the wine, consisting of jellyfish, bean sprouts, potted pork, dried shrimp, and the like. Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'un-mei to sprinkle some euryale seeds²⁶ over the potted pork, add some marinated bamboo shoots and leeks, and mix these ingredients into a large bowl of savory wonton soup. A table was set up, the dishes were placed upon it, the bowls were filled with rice, and a box of baked stuffed pastries was provided.

Hsi-men Ch'ing and Chin-lien:

Sat down shoulder to shoulder, while Ch'un-mei placed herself to one side and proceeded to share their repast. The three of them fell to drinking together:

First a cup for you,

Then a cup for me,

until the first watch, before the party broke up and they went to bed.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early. As prearranged, Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou came to join him, and they enjoyed a pick-me-up, before setting out for the suburbs together in order to see off Grand Coordinator Hou Meng.

Back at home, Wu Yüeh-ning first sent a present ahead and then dressed herself up, seated herself in a large sedan chair, and set out, with orderlies shouting to clear the way, and accompanied by Lai-an and Ch'un-hung, for the home of Hsia Yen-ling, in order to attend a party, and pay a visit to his wife. But no more of this.

Tai-an and Wang Ching were left at home to look after the place. Whom should they see that afternoon but Dame Wang, the proprietress of the teahouse in front of the district yamen, who brought with her Ho the Ninth.

When they arrived at the front gate, she asked Tai-an, "Is His Honor at home or not?"

"Dame Wang and the venerable Ho the Ninth, what a surprise!" exclaimed Tai-an. "What wind has blown you this way today?"

"Without a reason for doing so," responded Dame Wang, "we would scarcely have ventured to:

Dawdle at your door or loiter at your gate.

I would not have come today were it not for a problem that has arisen for Ho the Ninth's younger brother, for whose sake I have ventured to seek a favor from His Honor."

"His Honor has gone to see off His Excellency Hou Meng today," explained Tai-an, "and the First Lady is also not at home. If you will wait here a minute, I will go inside and speak to the Fifth Lady about it."

It was not long after he went inside before he came out again and said, "The Fifth Lady invites you to come in."

"How would I dare go in by myself?" said Dame Wang. "You had better escort me. I am afraid of the dog."

Tai-an escorted her into the garden and right up to the door of Chin-lien's quarters, where he lifted aside the portiere for her. When Dame Wang went inside, she found the woman wearing her usual toque on her head, and dressed in clothing of brocaded silk. She was made up so that she looked to be:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade, and was in her room, sitting on the k'ang, with her feet propped on the rim of the brazier, cracking melon seeds in her mouth. Within the room:

The drapes are made of embroidered brocade,

The bed is incised with gold ornamentation,

Rare antiques vie with each other in beauty,

Vanity cases gleam brightly in the sunlight.

Upon entering the room, Dame Wang felt obliged to make an obeisance to her, which threw the woman into such consternation that she returned the salutation, saying, "My venerable friend, there is no need for that."

When Dame Wang had performed her obeisance, she sat down on the edge of the k'ang, and the woman asked, "How is it that it has been such a long time since I saw you last?"

"I have thought about you, my lady," responded Dame Wang, "but I have not presumed to intrude upon you."

She then went on to ask, "Have you borne a son, or not?"

"It would have been great if I had," the woman said. "I have had two miscarriages, but neither of them survived."

She then went on to ask, "Has your son gotten married?"

"I haven't started looking for a wife for him yet," said Dame Wang. "He was working for a merchant from the Huai River region but has been home now for more than a year. He has, somehow or other, accumulated enough capital for a small business and has bought a donkey, which he uses to grind flour, the sale of which gives him enough to get by on. I'll find a wife for him sooner or later."

She then went on to ask, "Is His Honor not at home?"

"Father has gone outside the city gate today," the woman said, "in order to join his fellow officials in seeing someone off. The First Lady is also not at home. What did you want to talk to him about?"

"The venerable Ho the Ninth has a matter that he asked me to come and speak to His Honor about," said Dame Wang. "His younger brother, Ho the Tenth, has been implicated in a case of thievery and is currently under arrest in the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission, where his case is due to be tried by the commissioner. He is accused of acting as a fence for stolen goods, but he has nothing to do with the matter. He hopes that His Honor will let him off the hook when the matter comes before the bench. If the thieves try to implicate him again, and His Honor rejects the accusation, that will take care of it. If Ho the Tenth is set free, he will purchase gifts and see that His Honor is handsomely rewarded. I have his explanatory note here."

When the woman had read the explanatory note, she said, "Leave it with me. When Father comes home, I'll show it to him."

"The venerable Ho the Ninth is waiting out front," said Dame Wang. "Tomorrow, I'll have him come to seek an answer."

The woman told Ch'iu-ch'ü to bring some tea, and before long she brought in a cup of tea and gave it to Dame Wang to drink.

As Dame Wang sat there, she said, "My lady, you're certainly enjoying an ample degree of prosperity."

"What's so ample about it?" the woman responded. "It would be all right if it weren't for all the resentment; but the squabbling goes on all day around here, without ever coming to an end."

"My lady," objected Dame Wang, "you have only to:

Open your mouth when the food is served,²⁷ and

Rinse your hands when the water arrives.

Since you:

Are studded with gold and decked with silver,

and have:

Slaves and maidservants at your beck and call,

what reason do you have to be resentful?"

"As the sayings aptly put it," the woman said, "if there are:

Three nests where there's only room for two,

and they contain:

Both legitimate wives and lowly concubines,²⁸

A pair of serving spoons in the same crock,

Will either bump or rub against each other.

How can there fail to be some friction?"

"My good lady," said Dame Wang, "no one else is as smart as you are. So long as His Honor continues to enjoy such prosperous times, where your personal consumption is concerned, you need only:

Deal with matters as they occur."

She then went on to say, "Tomorrow, I'll have him come to seek an answer."

Thereupon, she said farewell and got up to go.

"My venerable friend," said the woman, "why don't you stay a little longer before you go?"

"That would be an imposition on Ho the Ninth, who is waiting for me," said Dame Wang. "I won't stay any longer but will come and see you another day."

The woman did not endeavor to detain her any further, but let her go.

When she got to the gate, she also reminded Tai-an why she had come, and he reassured her, saying, "You can go on home, venerable dame. When Father comes home, I'll speak to him about it."

"Brother Tai-an," said Ho the Ninth, "I'll come early tomorrow morning to seek an answer."

Thereupon, he went off together with Dame Wang.

That evening, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, Tai-an told him about the matter.

Upon going to Chin-lien's quarters, he read the explanatory note and turned it over to an attendant, saying, "Remind me about this when I get to the yamen tomorrow."

He then instructed Ch'en Ching-chi to take care of sending out the invitations for the following day, the third of the month; and also, without informing Ch'un-mei, sent Ch'in-t'ung to deliver a tael of silver and a box of delicacies to the home of Han Tao-kuo, and explain that they were intended to mollify Second Sister Shen's resentment.

Wang Liu-erh received them with an ingratiating smile and said, "She would not dare to harbor resentment. Tell your master and mistress that she is sorry to have offended the young lady, Ch'un-mei."

But no more of this.

That evening, when Yüeh-niang arrived home, she was wearing a fur coat of white ermine, over a brocaded jacket, and a skirt of blue brocade; and riding in a large sedan chair, accompanied by four orderlies bearing lanterns. Upon arriving home, she first greeted Sister-in-law Wu and the others and then went to salute Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was in the master suite drinking wine.

"When Hsia Yen-ling's wife saw that I had come," she reported, "she was as pleased as could be and expressed her thanks for our lavish gifts. There were many female guests, both relatives and neighbors, there today. It so happens that she has received a letter from Hsia Yen-ling, along with a letter for you, which she will have delivered to you tomorrow. They are scheduled to depart on the sixth or seventh of the month and have already hired carts in which to transport the entire household to the capital. She repeatedly requested that we allow Pen the Fourth to escort them to the capital, from which he would return immediately. Pen the Fourth's daughter, Chang-chieh, kowtowed to me today. She has grown up, and developed quite an attractive figure. It was no wonder that she kept stealing glances at me as she stood to my side to serve the tea. I did not recognize her. It was only when Hsia Yen-ling's wife, who has renamed her as Jui-yün, said to her, 'Come over and kowtow to the wife of Hsi-men Ch'ing,' that she put down the tea tray and proceeded to kowtow to me four times. I presented her with two floral ornaments of gold. By this time Hsia Yen-ling's wife has developed a real fondness for her and has raised her status above that of a mere concubine, treating her as though she were her own daughter."

"That child is certainly lucky," Hsi-men Ch'ing remarked sardonically. "She could scarcely have expected to be treated so indulgently at anyone else's hands. Who else would not only have refrained from cursing her as a slave, and peppering her with abuse, but also have been willing to elevate her status?"

Yüeh-niang gave him a look and said, "Why you filthy-mouthed good-for-nothing! No doubt you refer to the fact that I have been known to castigate your favorite concubine."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this and then went on to ask, "If she borrows Pen the Fourth to escort the family to the capital, who will take charge of my silk goods store?"

"You might as well close the shop for a few days," said Yüeh-niang.

"Closing the shop for a few days would be bad for business," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "As we approach the New Year's festival, silk goods and sewing supplies are selling fast. How can we afford to close the shop? I'll have to decide about it another day."

When they had finished their conversation, Yüeh-niang went into her boudoir, where she doffed her outer clothes and removed her headgear. She then entered the parlor next door and sat down to visit with Sister-in-law Wu and the others, while the members of the household, high and low, all came in to pay their respects and kowtow to her. That evening, Hsi-men Ch'ing spent the night in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters in the rear compound.

Early the next morning, he went off to the yamen. Who should appear at this juncture but Ho the Ninth, who came to ask Tai-an about the answer to his request and presented him with a tael of silver.

Tai-an explained the situation to him, thus and so, saying, "Yesterday, when Father came home, I told him about your request; and today he has gone to the yamen, where he will exonerate your brother and set him free. You can go to the gate of the yamen and wait for him there."

Upon hearing this, Ho the Ninth was as pleased as could be and set off immediately for the yamen.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived at the yamen, he took his place on the bench, ordered the thieves in the case to be haled before him, and had each of them put in the ankle-squeezers and given twenty strokes of the bamboo, so severely that:

Fresh blood flowed down their legs.

After dismissing the accusation against Ho the Tenth and setting him free, he proceeded to arrest a monk from the Hung-hua Temple to take his place, on the trumped up charge that he had sheltered the thieves in his temple overnight. Can there actually be such cases of injustice in this world? Truly:

Mr. Chang drinks wine, but Mr. Li gets drunk;

The mulberry branch is cut with a knife,

but the willow bark is scarred.²⁹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The destiny of the Sung dynasty was coming to an end;

The holders of judicial appointments were so dishonest.

Since the scrutiny of the cosmos can not to be evaded;

It will ultimately dispel the turbid and exalt the pure.

For the party that day, Hsi-men Ch'ing engaged the services of four singing girls, Wu Yin-erh, Cheng Ai-yüeh, Hung the Fourth, and Ch'i Hsiang-erh. They arrived before noon, with their costume bags in hand, and trooped into the master suite, where they kowtowed to Yüeh-niang, Sister-in-law Wu, and the others. Yüeh-niang saw that they were provided with a serving of tea, after which, they began to play their instruments and sing for the entertainment of Sister-in-law Wu, Yüeh-niang, and the others. Whom should they see at this juncture but Hsi-men Ch'ing, who suddenly came into the room after returning from the yamen. The four singing girls all put down their instruments, came forward with ingratiating smiles, and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.

After he had sat down, Yüeh-niang asked, "Why is it that you have only now returned from the yamen?"

"I had to preside over quite a few cases today," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then turned to Chin-lien and said, "With regard to that matter of the younger brother of Ho the Ninth that Dame Wang came to intercede for yesterday; I have already exonerated him and set him free today. Those two thieves continued to implicate him, but I had them each given twenty strokes with the bamboo and subjected to the squeezers, and then arrested a monk from a temple outside the city walls to take his place. Tomorrow, I'll fill out the documents in the case, and have them sent to Tung-p'ing prefecture.

"I also had to deal with a case of illicit fornication between a mother-in-law and her son-in-law. The son-in-law is still young, not more than thirty-odd years of age, and is named Sung Te. He married into his wife's family in order to care for her parents and will not return to his own. Subsequently, his mother-in-law died, and his father-in-law remarried a Ms. Chou, who so exhausted him that he died less than a year later. This Ms. Chou is still young and, finding it difficult to maintain her chastity, resorted to constantly carrying on with her son-in-law so outrageously that the members of the household became aware of it, and she found herself in an untenable position.

"One day, while Sung Te was escorting his mother-in-law into the country to pay a visit to her natal family, Ms. Chou said to him, 'Although you and I are not guilty of any transgression:

We have an unearned reputé for doing so."³⁰

Since we are passing through these deserted hills, why don't the two of us take advantage of the opportunity to:

Consummate a conjugal relationship?"³¹

Sung Te thereupon proceeded to fornicate with her. After returning from this visit to her natal family, the two of them continued to commit fornication with each other on a regular basis. Later on, after she had punished one of her maidservants, the maid told her neighbors what was going on, and they lodged an accusation against them. Today, after obtaining their depositions, I have had them remanded to Tung-p'ing prefecture. Once they get there, since they are guilty of the crime of fornication between a son-in-law and mother-in-law, thus falling within the fifth degree of mourning relationships,³² the penalty for both parties is strangulation."

"If it were up to me," said P'an Chin-lien, "I would not think it excessive to have that tale-bearing maidservant beaten to a pulp and sentenced to death.

If you don the black livery of a servant,

You must cling to even the blackest post.

With a single sentence, she brought ruin upon her employers."

"I did submit that slave to some severe treatment with the squeezers," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Merely on account of a temporary peccadillo on their part, that slave will be responsible for the death of the two of them."

Yüeh-ning responded to this by saying:

"If superiors act improperly, their subordinates will fail to respect them."³³

If the bitch does not wag her tail,

Dogs will not attempt to mount her."³⁴

Generally speaking, it is the depravity of the woman that is at fault. If they are chaste, who would dare to molest them?"

The four singing girls all laughed at this, saying, "What Mother says is right enough. Even we singing girls inside the quarter must avoid taking on the friends of our patrons. How much the more should this be true for women on the outside."

After this conversational exchange was completed, a meal was provided for Hsi-men Ch'ing to eat.

Suddenly, they heard the sound of drums and music coming from the reception hall in the front compound, indicating that Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung had arrived. Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly donned his official cap and girdle and went out to welcome him into the reception hall. After exchanging the conventional amenities, he thanked his visitor for his lavish gifts, and they sat down in the positions of guest and host.

After tea had been served, Hsi-men Ch'ing told him, thus and so, "Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien received your explanatory note and immediately agreed to your request. You are to be congratulated, and your promotion should occur in the near future."

Upon hearing this, Ching Chung turned around, got up from his seat, and bowed to express his thanks, saying, "I have put you to a lot of trouble venerable sir. Your efforts on my behalf will be:

Imprinted in my heart, never to be forgotten."

Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, "I also put in a word or two on behalf of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien is sure to take appropriate action."

As they were talking, it was suddenly announced that Eunuch Director Liu and Eunuch Director Hsüeh had arrived, and they were conducted inside to the accompaniment of drums and music. Hsi-men Ch'ing descended the steps to welcome them into the reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities. The two eunuchs were both dressed in python robes of blue silk with a raised pattern, wore jeweled chatelaines, and proceeded to take their places at the center of the seating arrangement.

After this, Commandant Chou Hsiu arrived and sat down to join in the conversation.

Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung addressed Commandant Chou Hsiu, saying, "Ssu-ch'üan is really magnanimous. The other day, when Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien hosted a farewell banquet for His Excellency Hou Meng at his place here, he took advantage of the occasion to sing your praises to Censor Sung, and he promised to keep you in mind. A lofty promotion for you is imminent."

Commandant Chou also bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing and expressed no end of gratitude.

Later on, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou, Wang the Third, Battalion Commander Fan Hsün, Wu K'ai, and Ch'iao Hung all arrived, one after the other.

On coming in the gate, Ch'iao Hung wore his newly acquired official cap and girdle and was accompanied by four attendants in black livery. After greeting the assembled company, he proceeded to bow four times to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was sitting in an oversize chair.

The assembled guests asked about the occasion for celebration, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "In return for the customary donation, my kinsman has just received the gracious distinction of appointment as an honorary prefectural official."

“Since he is a relative of Ssu-ch’üan’s,” said Commandant Chou Hsiu, “the rest of us should all tender our congratulations.”

“I appreciate the good will of you venerable gentlemen,” said Ch’iao Hung, “but I can hardly presume to put you to any trouble.”

When this exchange was completed, they all took their seats in order of precedence, while a round of tea was served, after which, they prepared to take their places at the banquet table.

Before the brocade screens, tortoiseshell mats are spread;
In the painted chamber, valuable antiques vie in splendor.
Beneath the steps, the tones of pipes and voices resound;
Upon the table, platters of exotic fruits are displayed.

In a while, when the wine was served and everyone had been assigned a seat, the servants of the various households came forward to take charge of the outer garments of their masters, and the guests sat down in their places.

Wang the Third repeatedly expressed his diffidence over taking a seat among them, but Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “It’s just an informal get-together here in my humble abode. It is appropriate for you to keep the other gentlemen company on this occasion.”

Wang the Third felt that he had no alternative but to hang his head and sit down to one side.

Before long, after soup and rice had been served, the chef came out to carve the entrée of roast goose and offer a selection of side dishes. Meanwhile, below the steps, the musicians from the Music Offices presented a number of ensemble dance pieces, followed by tumbling performances, vaudeville acts, and a comic farce, after which the four singing girls sedately appeared and proceeded to pay their respects to the company.

Every one of them is made up to present a flowery countenance;
Each one sports an immortal’s raiment, pearls, and trinkets.
With silver psalteries and jade mandolas,
they sing voluptuously;
In their hugging turquoise and clinging red, they laugh incessantly.

Truly:

Amid dancers’ skirts and singers’ clappers
one is forever seeking novelty;
But when all one’s yellow gold is spent nothing but one’s body remains.
A word of advice to wealthy young men:
“Don’t spend it all too fast;
The practice of economy is like good medicine, for it can cure poverty.”³⁵

We will say no more about how, that day, Eunuch Director Liu occupied the seat of honor and distributed extravagant amounts of silver. They continued drinking wine and enjoying themselves until the first watch before the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch’ing provided gratuities for the musicians and sent them on their way, while the four singing girls went back to the master suite to play and sing for Yüeh-niang and her female companions. Yüeh-niang invited Wu Yin-erh to stay overnight and sent the other three singing girls home. On their way out, they ran into Hsi-men Ch’ing, who was still in the reception hall, and paid their respects to him.

Hsi-men Ch’ing said to Cheng Ai-yüeh, “Tomorrow, bring Li Kuei-chieh with you, so the two of you can sing for us.”

Cheng Ai-yüeh realized that because Wang the Third had been there that day, Li Kuei-chieh had not been invited to sing, and laughed, saying, “Father, it’s rather late in the game:

The wall of the Warden’s Office³⁶ having collapsed:
the miscreant has escaped.”³⁷

She then went on to ask, “Who have you invited to your party tomorrow?”

“They’re all relatives and friends,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“If that beggar Ying the Second is here,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh, “I won’t come. I have no wish to set eyes on that ugly monstrosity of an adversary.”

“He won’t be here tomorrow,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing.

“As long as he isn’t here, it will be all right,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh. “But if that crazy chunk of knife-bait is here, I won’t come.”

Having spoken, she kowtowed to him and went nonchalantly off without more ado.

After Hsi-men Ch’ing had seen to the clearing away of the utensils, he went to Li P’ing-erh’s quarters and went to bed with Ju-i. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

Early the next day, Hsi-men Ch’ing went to the yamen and had the culprits in the two criminal cases he had dealt with the day before remanded to Tung-p'ing prefecture to stand trial. He then went home to host his party.

Those who were invited included Abbot Wu Tsung-che, Brother-in-law Wu the Second, Hua Tzu-yu, Brother-in-law Shen, Brother-in-law Han Ming-ch'uan, Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i, Licentiate Wen, Ying Po-chüeh and the other members of the brotherhood of ten, Li Chih, Huang the Fourth, Tu the Third, and Hsi-men Ch'ing's three business managers. Twelve tables were set up for the guests, while the three powdered-faces, Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Ai-yüeh, served the wine, and the three boy actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng, played and sang for their entertainment.

Just as the wine was being poured, P'ing-an suddenly came in and reported, "Uncle Yün the Second has just succeeded to his elder brother's official position and has come to pay his respects to Father and deliver some gifts."

Upon hearing this news, Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly said, "Invite him to come in."

When Yün Li-shou appeared, he was formally attired in a round-collared robe of black satin with a mandarin square, and a girdle with a plaque of gold around his waist. He was followed by his attendants, bearing the gifts. The first thing he did was to give Hsi-men Ch'ing a card to read, on which was written:

Your protégé Yün Li-shou, who has just succeeded to the post of vice commander of the Left Guard in Ch'ing-ho district of Shantung province, presents his compliments with a hundred salutations, while deferentially proffering the local products, ten sable skins, one saltwater fish, one packet of dried shrimp, four preserved geese, ten preserved ducks, and two sets of oil-paper drapes, as a meager expression of his respect.

Hsi-men Ch'ing ordered his attendants to accept the gifts and hastened to express his thanks.

"I only arrived home yesterday," said Yün Li-shou, "and today, I have come especially to pay my respects to Your Honor."

Thereupon, he proceeded to perform:

Four brace makes eight kowtows,

saying:

"My obligation to you could not be greater.

As for these paltry local products:

They are no more than tokens of my esteem."

After this, he proceeded to exchange the customary amenities and pay his respects to the rest of the company. When Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that he now held office as an official, he treated him differently from before, seating him at the same table with Brother-in-law Wu the Second, promptly seeing to it that he was provided with a wine goblet, chopsticks, and servings of soup and rice, and that his attendants were also provided with platters of assorted snacks as well as meat and wine. He then went on to ask him about the funeral arrangements for his elder brother, and his inheritance of his official post.

Yün Li-shou then explained in detail how the minister of war, Yü Shen, had been so affected by the fact that his elder brother had died of illness at his post on the frontier that he had mandated not only that his right to succeed to his elder brother's hereditary post should be honored, but that he also be appointed to the position of vice commander of the local guard.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was pleased at this, saying, "Congratulations! Congratulations! On a day to come, I will be sure to come and offer my felicitations."

That day, each member of the company toasted him with a cup of wine, and the three singing girls kept refilling his goblet, so that it was not long before Yün Li-shou was drunk. Ying Po-chüeh too, at his place at the table, appeared just like a puppet on its strings, constantly jumping up and sitting down, while teasing Li Kuei-chieh and Cheng Ai-yüeh so that their mutual badinage seemed as though it would never come to an end.

One of them ridiculed him, saying, "Your affectation is about as incongruous as a left-hand Gate God masquerading with a white face,³⁸ you profligate good-for-nothing."

While the other one taunted him as an ugly monstrosity of an adversary, as unsightly as:

Chu Pa-chieh, sitting in a homeless shelter.³⁹

To which Ying Po-chüeh retorted in kind, saying, "As for you two sl/imy kn/aves,⁴⁰ your grimy features are utterly repulsive."⁴¹

We will say no more about the fun and laughter at the party that day as they enjoyed themselves:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade, until

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter.

It was the second watch that night before the party broke up, the three singing girls went their way, and Hsi-men Ch'ing returned to the master suite to spend the night.

The next day, he got up late, ate some congee in the master suite, got dressed, and prepared to go pay a visit to Yün Li-shou.

Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who came in and said, "Pen the Fourth is in the front compound and would like to discuss something with you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that it must be about escorting Hsia Yen-ling's dependents to the capital and went out to meet him in the reception hall.

Pen the Fourth pulled a letter from Commander Hsia Yen-ling out of his sleeve and presented it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "His Honor Hsia Yen-ling would like to have me escort his dependents to the capital, after which, I could return without delay. I have come to ask Your Honor whether I should go or not."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had glanced at the language in the letter and saw that it merely expressed regret over their separation, thanked him for looking after his dependents, early and late, and asked if he could avail himself of Pen the Fourth's services to escort them to the capital, he said, "Since he has asked you to do so, there is no reason for you not to go."

He then went on to ask, "When do they plan to start out?"

"This morning," responded Pen the Fourth, "a servant from His Honor's household summoned me, and I was told that they had made definite plans to get into their vehicles and start out on the sixth, which means that I should be able to return by mid-month."

When he had finished speaking, he turned over the keys to the shop on Lion Street to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"While you are gone," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I'll have Brother-in-law Wu the Second take your place in the shop for a couple of days."

Only then did Pen the Fourth bid him farewell, walk out the gate, and go home to pack his luggage.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then donned his formal attire, went out the gate, and set out to call on Commander Yün Li-shou, with a retinue of servants following his horse.

That day it was time for Sister-in-law Wu to return home, and a sedan chair had been engaged to wait for her outside the gate, but this was one of those occasions when:

Something was bound to happen.

Yüeh-niang had filled two gift boxes with a variety of delicacies and was in the master suite preparing to see off Sister-in-law Wu. When she escorted her out the gate to get into her sedan chair, whom should they see but the page boy Hua-t'ung, who was lurking in the saddle room beside the gate, crying his head off. P'ing-an was doing his best to restrain him, but the harder he pulled at the youngster, the louder he cried, and the disturbance was overheard by Yüeh-niang and the others.

After seeing Sister-in-law Wu into her sedan chair and sending her off, Yüeh-niang turned to P'ing-an and demanded, "You lousy jailbird! Why are you pulling at him that way for no good reason? It's only causing him to cry more dementedly than ever."

"Licentiate Wen from across the street has called for him," said P'ing-an, "but he simply refuses to go and is reviling me instead."

"Tell him he must resign himself to going," said Yüeh-niang.

Then, turning to Hua-t'ung, she said, "My child, when Master Wen summons you over there, you simply ought to go. What are you crying about?"

Hua-t'ung continued to protest to P'ing-an, saying, "It's none of your business. I won't go, that's all. What are you tugging me about for?"

"Why won't you go?" asked Yüeh-niang, but the page boy refused to answer.

"This little jailbird," declared Chin-lien, "is nothing but a stiff-necked, sycophantic rascal. When Mother asks you a question, how can you refuse to answer?"

P'ing-an stepped forward at this point and gave him a slap on the face, but the page boy only cried the louder.

"You crazy jailbird!" interjected Yüeh-niang. "Why did you slap him for no good reason? Give him a chance to explain himself. Why do you refuse to go?"

Just as they were interrogating him, who should appear but Tai-an, who came in the gate on horseback.

"Has Father come home?" Yüeh-niang asked him.

"Uncle Yün Li-shou has kept him there for a drink," replied Tai-an. "He sent me home with his formal clothes and wants me to take his felt cap back to him."

When he saw the way that Hua-t'ung was crying, he asked him, "Little gentleman, how can you carry on so frantically, as though your tears would suffice to tear down a wall or fill in a pit?"

"Licentiate Wen from across the street has called for him," explained P'ing-an, "but he refuses to go and has chosen to cry and rail at me instead."

"Brother," said Tai-an, "if Master Wen is calling for you, you'd better be on your guard. His name puns with the words 'warm buttocks,' and he can hardly last a day without enjoying a pair of warm buttocks. But since you've put up with his attentions so far, why are you trying to avoid him today?"

"You crazy jailbird!" protested Yüeh-niang. "What do you mean by all this about warm buttocks?"

"You'd better ask him, Mother," responded Tai-an.

As for P'an Chin-lien:

Before she even got wind of anything,

She was ready for the rain.

Calling Hua-t'ung over to her, she said to him, "Little slave, tell us the truth about it. What does he want with you? If you refuse to tell us, I'll have Mother give you a beating."

She pressed the page boy so hard that he became agitated and said, "All he ever wants from me is to insert that thing of his into my asshole. It's gotten so swollen that it hurts. When I ask him to pull it out as quickly as possible, he refuses to retract it and insists on moving it back and forth. I finally pulled it out myself and ran over here to escape him, but he insists on calling me back."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she shouted at him, "You crazy little louse of a slave! You'd better get out of here. And as for you, Sister Six, your insistence on interrogating him has solicited this unspeakably obscene talk. Not knowing what was coming, and assuming that it would be in acceptable language, I bent my ear to listen to it. This gentleman is really a good-for-nothing, unfit for decent company. When we lend him the services of a page boy, he has the gall to commit such offenses behind our backs."

"First Lady," said Chin-lien, "not only do persons fit for decent company commit such deeds; even beggars in their homeless shelters are known to do such things."

"That southerner has a wife," remarked Meng Yü-lou. "How can he conduct himself so shamelessly?"

"The whole time he's been here," said Chin-lien, "we haven't caught so much as a glimpse of his wife. How can that be?"

"How can that be?" responded Tai-an. "You ladies are unlikely to see her at best. Whenever he goes out, he locks the door behind him. In the last half year, the only time I've seen her is the one time she took a sedan chair to go pay a visit to her mother; and on that occasion, she came back before evening. She practically never ventures outside the gate. At night, she goes out to the gate to empty the commode, that's all."

"That wife of his must be a hopeless wretch," said Chin-lien. "Having married a man like that, I doubt if she ever sees the light of day. I venture to say that, confined to her room that way, it must feel as though she's serving a sentence in the penitentiary."

After discussing it for a while, Yüeh-niang and the rest of them went back to the rear compound.

Upon arriving home around sunset, Hsi-men Ch'ing went into the master suite and sat down.

Hua-t'ung Is Reduced to Tears in Escaping Licentiate Wen

"Did manager Yün Li-shou keep you for a visit?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"When he saw that I had come to call on him," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "he was so pleased that:

There was nothing he was not prepared to do.⁴²

He set up a table, opened a jug of wine, and invited me to sit down and join him for a drink. At present, since Commander Ching Chung of the local guard has been promoted, he is in line to succeed him as the seal-holding officer. Tomorrow, I am planning to prepare congratulatory gifts for him and Kinsman Ch'iao Hung, and our colleagues have agreed to present them with commemorative scrolls. I'll have to prevail upon Licentiate Wen to draft two appropriate inscriptions and purchase scrolls right away, so he can inscribe them for us."

"How can you bring yourself to employ any such Licentiate Wen or Licentiate Wu?" exclaimed Yüeh-niang. "If you make use of that kind of shameless good-for-nothing, and the word gets out, it will have the effect of showing us in the ugliest possible light."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, it gave him quite a start, and he asked, "What do you mean?"

"There's no need for you to ask me," said Yüeh-niang. "Ask your page boy."

"Which page boy is that?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You know perfectly well who it is," said Chin-lien. "It's Hua-t'ung, that lousy little slave. When we went out to see off Sister-in-law Wu, he was crying by the gate and complained, thus and so, about how that southerner, Wen Pi-ku, was abusing him."

On hearing this, Hsi-men Ch'ing remained somewhat incredulous and said, "Call that little slave here so I can interrogate him."

He then sent Tai-an to the front compound to summon Hua-t'ung, who came back to the master suite and knelt down before him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing threatened to subject him to the squeezers and said, "You lousy slave! Tell me the truth. What does he do when he calls for you?"

"He calls for me," said Hua-t'ung, "in order to get me drunk, so he can get down to his dirty business with me. Today, he hurt me so badly that I got away and refused to go back, but he kept sending P'ing-an after me, and P'ing-an was hitting me when Mother came out and saw what was going on. He constantly questions me about the intimate details of what goes on in the private quarters of the ladies of the household, but I refuse to say anything. And yesterday, while Father was hosting a party here, he even tried to induce me to snitch a few silver utensils and give them to him. On another occasion, he went to visit Master Ni P'eng and showed him the text of a letter he had drafted for Father; and Master Ni also showed it to His Honor Hsia Yen-ling."

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not heard these words nothing might have happened, but having heard them, he exclaimed:

"In painting a tiger, you can paint the skin,

but you can't paint the bones;

In knowing people, you can know their faces,

but you can't know their hearts.⁴³

I took him to be a decent human being. Who could have known that he was nothing but:

The skeleton of a dog wrapped in human skin.⁴⁴

What further use do I have for the likes of him?"

He then ordered Hua-t'ung to get up and go, saying, "You don't need to go over there anymore."

Hua-t'ung, accordingly, kowtowed to him and went out to the front compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing turned to Yüeh-niang and said, "It's no wonder that, the other day, our kinsman Chai Ch'ien chided me, saying:

If critical matters are not kept secret harm will result.

I couldn't think who could have done it at the time, but now it turns out that he was the person guilty of leaking my information to an outsider. How could I have known? What point is there in continuing to keep such a worthless dog-bone of a creature around for no good reason?"

"Who do you think you're telling about it?" said Yüeh-niang. "We don't have any child who requires schooling, so what need is there to maintain someone in the household merely to handle our social correspondence? After all, how much do we have in the way of social correspondence to justify maintaining such a person, only to have him carry on so egregiously, while peddling our secrets to others?"

"Needless to say," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "tomorrow I'll simply send him packing, that's all."

He then summoned P'ing-an and told him, "Tell the gentleman across the street that your master needs the space he is living in for the storage of merchandise, and that he will have to look for accommodations elsewhere. And if he should come over to see me, stop him at the gate and tell him that I am not at home."

P'ing-an nodded in assent and went back to his post.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said to Yüeh-niang, "Today, Pen the Fourth came to say goodbye. He is going to leave on the sixth, in order to escort Hsia Yenling's dependents on their way to the Eastern Capital. It occurs to me that, since there won't be anyone in charge of the silk goods store, I might as well ask Brother-in-law Wu the Second to take charge of the store for a few days. One way or the other, he and Lai-chao can take turns, three days at a time, spending the night at the shop, and they can eat together. What do you think?"

"I won't express an opinion," said Yüeh-niang. "It's up to you. You can call on him if you like. I won't interfere, but people may say that I've intervened in favor of my brother."

Hsi-men Ch'ing paid no attention to this but immediately dispatched Ch'it'ung, telling him, "Go and invite Brother-in-law Wu the Second to come here."

It was not long before Brother-in-law Wu the Second showed up. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down with him to share a drink in the front reception hall and turned the keys to the shop over to him. The next day, he and Lai-chao proceeded to Lion Street together to open the shop. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Licentiate Wen saw that Hua-t'ung refused all night long to come back and sleep with him, he became apprehensive about the situation.

The next day, P'ing-an came over and said to him, "My master sends his regards to you, but sooner or later he is going to need the space you are occupying to store merchandise and would like you to find accommodations elsewhere."

When Licentiate Wen heard this, he:
Turned pale with consternation,
and realized that Hua-t'ung must have let the cat out of the bag.
Putting on his formal attire, he expressed a desire to speak to Hsi-men Ch'ing, but P'ing-an said, "Father is at the yamen and hasn't come home yet."
When the time he normally came home arrived, Licentiate Wen, garbed in formal attire, came across the street to wait for him and handed a long letter that he had prepared to Ch'in-t'ung, but Ch'in-t'ung refused to accept it, saying, "Father has just returned from the yamen and is tired out. He has gone back to the rear compound to rest, and I would not presume to disturb him."
Only then did Licentiate Wen fully realize that he was being deliberately kept at a distance, and he went to Licentiate Ni P'eng's place to consult about it, after which, he moved his dependents back to his original dwelling place. Truly:

Even if one could draw off all the water
of the West River,
It would hardly suffice to wash away
this day's shame.

No one lacks a beginning, but few come to a good end;⁴⁵ Friendship as insipid as water is most likely to last.⁴⁶
From of old, humans do not have a thousand good days;
Just as flowers do not remain red after being plucked.⁴⁷

HSI-MEN CH'ING SLOGS THROUGH THE SNOW TO VISIT CHENG AI-YÜEH; PEN THE FOURTH'S WIFE SITS BY THE WINDOW WAITING FOR A TRYST

Flying oars in their commotion disturb the early plum blossoms;
Which defy the frigid weather as they undulate back and forth.
The wind savors their fragile charm,
wafting their fragrance;
The moon enjoys their subtle allure,
enhancing their beauty.
At the Liang court they were portentous omens for Emperor Hsiao;¹
In the Ch'i palace they were matchmakers for Consort P'an Yü-nu.² Unaware of the gut-wrenching heartache caused by separation;
They only augment one's grief as they hover above the water.³

THE STORY GOES that when Licentiate Wen realized that Hsi-men Ch'ing would not grant him an interview, he felt ashamed at his own guilt and proceeded forthwith to move his dependents back to his old dwelling place. Hsi-men Ch'ing subsequently arranged to have the studio that he had occupied cleaned up and made into a guest room. But no more of this.

One day, Provincial Graduate Shang Hsiao-t'ang came to take his leave before setting out for the capital in order to compete in the chin-shih examinations and asked Hsi-men Ch'ing if he could borrow a leather trunk and a felt jacket for the trip. Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down with him while they shared a serving of tea and also presented him with a farewell gift.

He then went on to say, "My kinsman Ch'iao Hung has recently received an appointment as an honorary official, and my associate Yün Li-shou has succeeded to a hereditary post while continuing to hold his current substantive position, and I would like to present them with a pair of commemorative scrolls in celebration of these events. I wonder, venerable sir, if you have any acquaintances whom you might prevail upon to lend a hand for this purpose. Your pupil would see to it that they were appropriately compensated for their efforts."

Shang Hsiao-t'ang laughed, saying, "Venerable sir, what need is there for any compensation? Your pupil's former schoolmate Nieh Liang-hu, who is a degree candidate in the local Military School, is currently living in my humble abode, where he is acting as tutor to my son. He has a knack for literary composition in a variety of modes. Your pupil will speak to him about your request. All you have to do, venerable sir, is to send your esteemed servant to my place with the scrolls."

Hsi-men Ch'ing hastened to express his gratitude, and after drinking his tea, Shang Hsiao-t'ang took his leave. Hsi-men Ch'ing forthwith sealed up two handkerchiefs and five mace of silver and sent Ch'in-t'ung to deliver them, along with the scrolls, the felt jacket, and the leather trunk, to Shang Hsiao-t'ang's place, where they were duly accepted.

In less than two days, the scrolls were inscribed, and when they were delivered, Hsi-men Ch'ing hung them up on the wall of the reception hall. Behold, they were:

Brocade scrolls of green velvet,
With characters of blazing gold,
which had been dashed off:

Without altering a single stroke.
Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted by them.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ying Po-chüeh, who came in and asked, "When are you planning to hold the celebrations in honor of Ch'iao Hung and Yün Li-shou; have the inscriptions on the scrolls been completed or not; and why is it that the venerable Licentiate Wen has been nowhere to be seen the last few days?"

"Why refer to the venerable Licentiate Wen?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He is nothing but a canine excuse for a human being."

He then proceeded, thus and so, to tell Ying Po-chüeh what had happened.

"Brother," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "I have always said of that person that:

His words overstate the facts,

and:

He is as superficial as can be.

It's a good thing you had the foresight to get rid of him, or he might well have corrupted the other page boys in the household."

He then went on to ask, "As for the commemorative scrolls for the two gentlemen, who did you get to inscribe them?"

"Yesterday, Shang Hsiao-t'ang came to call on me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and mentioned that his friend Nieh Liang-hu was good at literary composition. So I urged him to get Nieh Liang-hu to inscribe them, and the completed scrolls are already here. Let me show them to you."

Thereupon, he led Ying Po-chüeh into the reception hall to take a look at them, and he expressed no end of admiration, saying, "Brother, you have fulfilled our social obligations. You ought to send them off to their recipients as soon as possible, so they can make the necessary preparations."

"Tomorrow is an auspicious day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I've already prepared the congratulatory gifts of mutton and wine, red banners, and boxes of candied fruit and will have them delivered as early as possible."

As they were speaking, a servant suddenly reported, "His Honor Hsia Yen-ling's son has come to bid you farewell. Early tomorrow morning, the eighth, he is planning to set out for the capital. When I told him that you were not at home, he said that you ought to let His Honor Ho Yung-shou know, so that he can send someone over to look after the place first thing tomorrow morning."

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the accordion-bound six-leaved card and saw that the message on it read, "The junior member of your colleague's family, Hsia Ch'eng-en, presents his compliments in order to thank you for your assistance and bid you farewell."

He then remarked, "The departures of Shang Hsiao-t'ang and the dependents of the Hsia household will require the presentation of two lengths of fragrant silk fabric as parting gifts."

Turning to Ch'in-t'ung, he instructed him, "Go quickly to buy these gifts, and then get my son-in-law to seal them up and write cards to deliver with them."

Just as he was settling down in his studio together with Ying Po-chüeh, whom he had invited to share a meal with him, P'ing-an suddenly appeared, in a state of obvious agitation, and presented three calling cards, reporting, "Administration Commissioner Wang, Assistant Commissioner Lei, and Secretary An have come to pay their respects."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, upon looking at the cards and seeing that they were from Wang Po-yen, Lei Ch'i-yüan, and An Ch'en, hurriedly proceeded to don his formal garb and buckle his girdle.

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "I can see that you are busy. As soon as I have finished eating, I'd better go."

"I'll get together with you again tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, as he straightened his clothes and went out to greet his visitors.

The three officials politely deferred to each other as they came in. They wore mandarin squares, one of which was emblazoned with a silver pheasant, one of them with an egret in the clouds, and one of them with a hsieh-chih, the mythical one-horned goat that was said to gore wrongdoers, and they were attended by a host of subordinate officials. Upon entering the large reception hall, they exchanged the customary amenities and referred gratefully to the trouble they had put him to in the past.

In a little while, after they had consumed a serving of tea and were sitting together in conversation, An Ch'en said, "Lei Ch'i-yüan, Wang Po-yen, and I have come to impose upon you once again. Chao T'ing, the prefect of Hang-chou in Chekiang, has recently been promoted to the post of minister of the Court of Judicial Review, and the three of us would like to borrow the use of your distinguished premises in order to invite him to a party in his honor. We have already sent him an invitation to attend the party on the ninth. Including you as our host, five tables will be required, and your pupil will take care of providing actors for the occasion, but I don't know whether you will consent to this or not."

"In response to your command, venerable sir," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "your pupil cannot but:

Sweep the doorway in respectful anticipation."⁴

Secretary An Ch'en ordered one of his clerks to hand over a joint contribution of three taels of silver, and Hsi-men Ch'ing had one of his attendants put it away.

As he was escorting them to the gate, Lei Ch'i-yüan said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "The other day, in response to a letter from Ch'ien Lung-yeh stating that Sun Wen-hsiang was one of your employees, your pupil saw to it that both he and his father were released. Have they come to tell you about it or not?"

"Yes they have," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and I am much obliged to you for your efforts on my behalf.

Permit me to offer you an obeisance in return."

"You and I are good friends," responded Lei Ch'i-yüan. "There is no need to concern yourself further about it."

When they had finished speaking and bowing in farewell to each other, his guests got into their sedan chairs and departed.

It so happens that, from the time that P'an Chin-lien took over responsibility for the household expenses, she had supplied herself with a new set of scales. Every day, when the page boys came home with the groceries they had bought, she insisted that they bring in their purchases for her to evaluate before she would pay out the money to reimburse them. She had Ch'un-mei pay out the money and take charge of the scales. The page boys were frequently cursed by Ch'un-mei till they looked as though:

Their heads had been sprayed with dog's blood, and they felt as though they were:

Braving the danger of extinction.⁵

On the slightest pretext, she would tell them off and threaten to have Hsi-men Ch'ing beat them.

For this reason, the page boys all harbored resentment against her and said to each other, "It was much better when the Third Lady was handling the money. As for the Fifth Lady, whatever we do, she:

Rarely says a word without threatening a beating.”⁶

To resume our story, that day Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the yamen early, and when the session was over, he said to Ho Yung-shou, “Hsia Yen-ling's dependents have left by now. Have you delegated someone to go look after the place, and see that the doors are locked or not?”

“Yes I have,” responded Ho Yung-shou. “Yesterday, they sent someone over to speak to me about it, and your pupil has already sent a servant to take care of it.”

“Today,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “I would like to accompany my colleague over there to take a look at the place.”

Thereupon, the two of them left the yamen and rode their horses, side by side, to Hsia Yen-ling's former residence. His dependents had already vacated the premises, and Ho Yung-shou's servant was standing by at the gate. The two officials dismounted and went inside to the reception hall, after which, Hsi-men Ch'ing led Ho Yung-shou on a tour of inspection, both front and rear. When they came back to the ornamental pavilion in the front garden, they saw that it was surrounded by a stretch of vacant ground, without anything in the way of grass or vegetation growing on it.

“When my colleague moves in,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “you ought to make a pleasure ground out of this area. You can plant it with ornamental flowers, and make some repairs to this pavilion.”

“I will do that for sure,” said Ho Yung-shou. “This coming spring, I plan to refurbish the place, procure bricks and tiles, lumber and stone, with which to construct three summerhouses, and invite my colleague over to:

Alleviate his ennui and dispel his melancholy.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to ask, “How many dependents from your household will come to reside here?”

“There are only a few members of your pupil's own household,” said Ho Yung-shou, “but there will also be several families of servants and other attendants, something over ten persons in all.”

“In that case,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “you will hardly fill the place. The front and rear compounds of this residence contain more than fifty rooms.”

After they had finished inspecting the place, Ho Yung-shou told his servants to clean it up, sweep it out, and take care of locking the doors.

He then went on to say, “In a few days, I will write to my venerable uncle in the Eastern Capital, and arrange to have my dependents transported here by the year's end.”

That day, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had said farewell and returned home, Ho Yung-shou took another look around and then went back to his quarters in the yamen. It was not until the next day that he collected his luggage and moved into his new residence. But no more of this.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had no sooner arrived home and dismounted from his horse than he found that Ho the Ninth had purchased a bolt of fabric, a selection of four delicacies, a chicken and a goose, and a jar of wine and brought them to thank him for his intervention on behalf of his younger brother. In addition, Eunuch Director Liu had sent a servant to deliver a box of delicacies, a selection of large and small pure-red candles decorated with yellow tracery, twenty tablecloths, eighty sticks of government-grade incense, a box of aloeswood incense, a jar of wine he had brewed himself according to a palace recipe, and a freshly slaughtered pig.

As Hsi-men Ch'ing came in the gate, Eunuch Director Liu's servant kowtowed to him and said, “My master wishes to convey his compliments, along with these paltry gifts, for Your Honor to give away to someone if you like.”

“I provided your venerable master with but scant entertainment the other day,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “yet still he sends me these lavish presents.”

He then ordered an attendant to take charge of the gifts and invited the messenger to wait a minute. Before long, Hua-t'ung came in with a cup of tea for him, while Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed up five mace of silver as a gratuity and sent him off with a written reply.

When Ho the Ninth was invited to come in, he found Hsi-men Ch'ing standing in the reception hall, having removed his official cap and exchanged it for a “loyal and tranquil hat” of white felt. Upon seeing Ho the Ninth, he took him by the hand and led him into the reception hall.

Ho the Ninth hastened to bend his back and kowtow to him, saying, “In the past, thanks to the way in which Your Honor's:

Celestial grace permitted him to be reborn,
my younger brother's:

Gratitude for your kindness is not shallow.”

He begged Hsi-men Ch'ing to accept his obeisance, but Hsi-men Ch'ing would not allow him to kowtow and dragged him to his feet, saying, “Old Ninth, you and I are long-standing friends. There is no need for that sort of thing.”

“Your Honor,” responded Ho the Ninth:

“The present cannot be compared to the past.”⁷

Insignificant as I am, I could hardly presume to sit down in your presence.”

He insisted on standing to one side while Hsi-men Ch'ing kept him company for a serving of tea.

“Old Ninth,” Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, “what need was there for you to go to the trouble of presenting these gifts to me? I absolutely refuse to accept them. If anyone should try to take advantage of you, just come tell me about it, and I will see to it that your indignation is assuaged. If the district yamen should assign some onerous task to you, I can intervene on your behalf by sending a card to His Honor Li Ta-t'ien.”

“I am cognizant of Your Honor's consideration,” said Ho the Ninth, “but I am old now, and have already arranged for my son, Ho Ch'in, to take over my duties.”

"That's all right then," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "You should be able to enjoy your greater leisure."

He then went on to say, "Since you refuse to take them back, I will agree to accept your gifts of food and drink, but you must consent to take that bolt of fabric home with you. I won't retain you any longer."

Ho the Ninth then proceeded to bid him farewell with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.

Hsi-men Ch'ing remained sitting in the reception hall, where he supervised the packing of the congratulatory gifts: the boxes of candied fruit, red banners, mutton and wine, inscribed scrolls, and so forth, including the individual contributions of his colleagues. When this was completed, he dispatched Tai-an to deliver the first consignment to the home of Ch'iao Hung and then sent Wang Ching to take the other consignment to the home of Yün Li-shou.

Upon Tai-an's return, he reported that he had been given a gratuity of five mace of silver by the Ch'iao household. When Wang Ching arrived at the home of Yün Li-shou, he was served food and wine and rewarded with a length of pure-black muslin and a pair of loafers. He returned with an accordion-bound thank-you note that read, "Your protégé presents his compliments, and will extend an invitation on another day." Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted by this and went back to Yüeh-niang's room in the rear compound to have something to eat.

While there, he said to Yüeh-niang, "Since the departure of Pen the Fourth, Brother-in-law Wu the Second has been handling the business at the store on Lion Street. Since I have some free time today, I propose to go there and see how things are going."

"You might as well go ahead," said Yüeh-niang. "If any food and wine is required, send a page boy back here for it."

"I understand," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Having issued orders that his horse be prepared, he donned his felt "loyal and tranquil cap," his sable earmuffs, a green woolen tunic emblazoned with a mandarin square, and a pair of white-soled black boots and set out for Lion Street, accompanied by Ch'in-t'ung and Tai-an.

When he arrived at the store he found that Brother-in-law Wu the Second and Lai-chao had hung out the flowery braided basket that served as a shop sign and were busily engaged in selling the stock of piece goods, sewing supplies, and silk floss. The store was so crowded with customers that they could hardly handle them all. Hsi-men Ch'ing dismounted, took a look at the situation, and then went back to a heated inner room and sat down.

Brother-in-law Wu the Second came in, bowed to him, and said, "We are currently making a profit of twenty taels of silver a day."

Hsi-men Ch'ing instructed Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," saying, "Make sure that Brother-in-law Wu the Second is supplied with tea and food every day, as usual. Don't be remiss about it."

"I personally prepare wine and food for him every day," said Lai-chao's wife.

Hsi-men Ch'ing observed that the sky was overcast. Behold:

Amid dense masses of dark clouds,
Gusts of cold wind beleaguer one.

It looked as though it were going to snow. Hsi-men Ch'ing suddenly thought that he would like to visit Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment in the licensed quarter.

Thereupon, he ordered Ch'in-t'ung, "Ride my horse back to the house and bring me my fur coat. And tell the First Lady that if she has a serving of wine and food available, to send it in a box for Brother-in-law Wu the Second to consume."

Ch'in-t'ung assented, set off on his errand, and returned before long with Hsi-men Ch'ing's full-length sable coat, followed by an orderly bearing a box of wine and food, which contained four saucers of marinated chicken appetizers and sautéed pigeon, four saucers of seafood to go with the wine, a plate of leek stalks, and a pewter flagon of wine.

Hsi-men Ch'ing remained in the room with Brother-in-law Wu the Second and drank three cups of wine, after which he said to him, "Since you are going to remain here overnight, you can enjoy these things at your leisure. I am going to go home."

Thereupon, he put on his eye shades, mounted his horse, and, with Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung attending him, headed straight for Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment in the licensed quarter. As he passed the corner of East Street, lo and behold:

Fluttering and swirling from on high,
A skyful of auspicious snow came flying down.

Truly:

Large snowflakes, the size of a fist,
danced in the void;
The pedestrians on the road could do nothing but complain.⁸

Behold:

Silently, a severe cold envelops the ground;
The snowfall creating a truly awesome scene.
Just like tattered floss or shredded cotton,⁹
Each flake seems as large as a flower basket.
In the woods, bamboo huts and thatched sheds,
Are faced with the risk of imminent collapse.

Members of rich houses and powerful families, Claim that snow purges pestilence, and say there is not enough.
 Huddled beside red braziers with their animal-shaped briquettes;¹⁰ Accoutered in their sable cloaks and their embroidered gowns;
 While fingering plum blossoms in their hands,¹¹
 They proclaim it to be an auspicious portent for the nation;¹² Without caring for the destitution it inflicts upon the poor.
 There are even men, living in lofty seclusion,
 Who produce a plethora of poems in its praise.¹³

Hsi-men Ch'ing made his way along the street:
 Trampling the scattered fragments of alabaster and jade;
 His sable coat infested with powdery butterflies;
 His horses hoofs disturbing the silvery blossoms;

until he entered the licensed quarter and dismounted at the gate of Cheng Ai-yüeh's establishment.

Upon seeing him, a maidservant flew inside and announced, "His Honor has arrived."

Auntie Cheng came outside to receive him, conducted him into the reception hall, and greeted him, saying, "We are most grateful for the lavish gifts you bestowed upon us the other day. Not only did Ai-chieh impose upon your hospitality, but the First Lady and the Third Lady also rewarded her with a gift of costume jewelry and a handkerchief."

"I fear she received but scant entertainment that day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, as he proceeded to take a seat.

He then instructed Tai-an, saying, "Bring my horse inside. They have a courtyard in which it can be accommodated."

"Would Your Honor please come back into the parlor and take a seat there?" said Auntie Cheng. "Ai-yüeh has just gotten up and is still combing her hair. She thought that Your Honor was going to pay her a visit yesterday and waited for you all day long. As a result, she is somewhat out of sorts today and got up later than usual."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, consequently, went back to the parlor of her living quarters in the rear of the establishment, where he saw that:

 The green gauze window was half open,¹⁴ and
 The felt curtains were suspended low, while in the middle of the floor there stood a brazier of yellow brass, filled with burning charcoal.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sat down in the place of honor, and Cheng Ai-hsiang came out first to greet him, and offer him a serving of tea. Only after that did Cheng Ai-yüeh appear. She wore a "bag of silk" chignon in the Hang-chou style, held in place by a plum-blossom-shaped ornament, and studded with combs and hairpins of incised gold, under a sealskin toque. She was made up so that her cloudy locks resembled swirling mist, enhanced with fragrant powder and incised blossoms. Her torso was clad in a white satin jacket and green brocade vest, beneath which she wore a six-pleated beige skirt, under which there peeked out the high pointed tips of her tiny golden lotuses:

Resembling crescent moons,
 Shaped like moth eyebrows.

Truly:

The immortal of Mount Lo-fu has appeared in the mundane world;¹⁵
 The Goddess of Witches' Mountain has come into the human realm.¹⁶

The painted face came out with an ingratiating smile, bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, and said, "Father, I didn't get home until late the other day. Not only did the party in the front compound break up late, but when we returned to the rear compound, the First Lady refused to let us go until we had had something to eat. It was the third watch by the time I got home."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed, and said, "Little oily mouth! You and Li Kueichieh, between you, really managed to land a few resounding hits on Beggar Ying."

"Who was it," responded Cheng Ai-yüeh, "who allowed that ugly monstrosity to join the party, only to attack us with his shitty mouth? On that day, Pockmarked Chu also got drunk and speciously offered to escort us home, but I said to him, 'Isn't Father going to send us home with a lantern escort?'"

When Fatty Chiang falls into the sewer,
 The muck may splash on you."

"That day," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I heard Hung the Fourth say that Pockmarked Chu has once again conspired with Wang the Third to patronize Jung Chiao-erh on Main Street.”

“He only spent one night at Jung Chiao-erh’s place,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh. “He burnt moxa on her that once¹⁷ but never went back. At present, he’s still patronizing Ch’in Yü-chih.”

After they had talked for a while, she said, “Father, I fear you may be cold. Why don’t you come into my room and sit there.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing then proceeded to move into her room, where he took off his sable cloak and sat down by the painted face next to the brazier. In the room:

A fragrant aroma assailed the senses.¹⁸

What should he see but a maidservant who came in to set up a table, on which she placed four saucers of assorted delicacies, and three dishes of ginger sauce; shortly after which, she came in with three bowls of steamed pork dumplings flavored with celery cabbage and chives, and inch-long boiled dumplings. The two sisters kept Hsi-men Ch’ing company as they each consumed one of the bowls.

Cheng Ai-yüeh even offered to give half the contents of her bowl to Hsi-men Ch’ing, but he said, “I’ve had enough. Just now, in that silk goods store of mine, I was sharing a bite to eat with my brother-in-law Wu the Second when it occurred to me that I would like to come pay you a visit. Unexpectedly, it started to snow, and I sent a page boy home to fetch my fur coat and then proceeded to come over here.”

“The other day,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh, “didn’t you agree to come see me yesterday? I waited for you all day, but you never showed up. How could I have known that you would show up today?”

“Yesterday,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “a couple of gentlemen came to see me, and I was too busy to come.”

“I’d like to ask you, Father,” said Cheng Ai-yüeh, “if you happen to have a sable skin you could give to me, so I can make a muffler out of it to wear?”

“That’s no problem,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “The other day, one of my managers came back from Liao-tung and presented me with ten fine sable skins. None of the ladies of my household have mufflers for themselves, so when I have them made up, I’ll have one made for you as well.”

“Father,” said Cheng Ai-hsiang, “you only care for my sister, without bothering to give me one too.”

“I’ll provide one for each of you sisters,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing.

Thereupon, Cheng Ai-hsiang and Cheng Ai-yüeh hastily got to their feet and bowed to him in gratitude.

“If you see Li Kuei-chieh or Wu Yin-erh,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “don’t tell them about it.”

“I understand,” responded Cheng Ai-yüeh.

“The other day,” she went on to say, “when Li Kuei-chieh saw that Wu Yin-erh had been invited to stay overnight, she asked me how long she had been there, and I did not deceive her but said, ‘Yesterday, when His Honor Chou Hsiu was here, the four of us were all present and sang for their entertainment all day. Father said that because Wang the Third was present, he had not invited you. But since today’s party was for his relatives and friends and the members of his brotherhood of ten, he had invited you to come and sing for them.’ She had nothing further to say about it.”

“Your response to her was quite correct,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Previously, I had also ceased to engage the services of Li Ming, but he repeatedly asked Ying the Second to intervene on his behalf; and later, on the occasion of the Third Lady’s birthday, Li Kuei-chieh herself bought presents and came to apologize to me for her misconduct. The ladies of my household spoke up on her behalf, but I did not pay any attention. The other day, I arranged to invite Wu Yin-erh to stay overnight just to show her where things stood.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing Tramples the Snow to Visit Cheng Ai-yüeh

"I didn't know about the Third Lady's birthday," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "so I failed to help celebrate it."

"Tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "His Honor Yün Li-shou is giving a party, and I told him, the other day, that you and Wu Yin-erh might be willing to sing for us on that occasion."

"If that is Father's wish, I will do so," responded Cheng Ai-yüeh.

Before long, a maidservant came in and took away the dinner table; after which, the painted face fetched a catalpa-wood box, from which she dumped out a set of thirty-two ivory dominoes and proceeded to play a game of dominoes with Hsi-men Ch'ing upon a felt strip laid over the k'ang, while Cheng Ai-hsiang sat beside them and looked on.

Meanwhile, within the courtyard, the snow continued to come fluttering and swirling down:

Like wind-blown pear blossoms.

Behold:

Dimly it obscures the ornate well curbs;

At every other moment,

One must brush away the bee's whiskers.

Jade dragon's-scales appear to pervade the firmament;

White crane's-feathers seem to settle gently to earth.
It reminds one of crabs moving across the sand;
It is like shattered alabaster piled on the pavement.

Truly:

Though everyone calls it an omen of a good harvest,
As an omen of a good harvest, what are its effects?
There are indigent people in the city of Ch'ang-an,
Who think it is propitious, but only in moderation.¹⁹

The three of them continued playing dominoes for some time, without anyone being established as the winner. In a little while, wine was served, and they proceeded to drink it. On the tabletop:

Platters are piled with exotic fruits;
Only the rarest delicacies are arrayed.
Tea is brewed from dragon tablets;
Wine is poured of amber coloration.²⁰
Lyrics are sung to the tune "Golden Threads,"
As, with a smile, they part their ruby lips.

Cheng Ai-hsiang and Cheng Ai-yüeh proffered wine to their guest as they stood to either side. Then, with:

The bridges on their psalteries ranged like wild geese,
As they gently strummed the silken strings,

the two sisters entertained him with the song suite that begins with the tune "Green Jacket":

I think of that captivating beauty, with her striking personality;
I think of that captivating beauty, who was so indulgent with me.
I recall how we walked together hand in hand,²¹
laughing as we went;
Saluting the breeze and apostrophizing the moon,²²
in lines of poetry.
She was warm and soft; I was handsome and clever;
Both in the springtime of our youth.
Who could have anticipated that these fish who swim as a pair should be separated?
The vase has fallen, the hairpin is broken,²³
And at this time, the fish are submerged, the geese are distant.²⁴

TO THE TUNE "CURSING ONE'S LOVER":

Once that captivating beauty was gone,
I have had no further news of her.
In thinking of her, my feelings are like lacquer,
my sentiments like glue.
I constantly remember how we enjoyed each other on the same pillow.
I think of her flowery loveliness, and her willowy sinuosity;
A face that could topple kingdoms and cities.²⁵

TO THE TUNE "BEATING THE FESTIVAL DRUM":

She exhibits a thousand graceful charms;²⁶
Romantic and quick-witted;
Her demeanor is alluring.
Her every move marvelous.
Strumming the psaltery, plucking the mandola,
Singing and dancing, or playing on the flute,
Even an expert painter would find her hard to depict.

TO THE TUNE "MOVED BY IMPERIAL FAVOR":

Ah! It is more than enough to make me both bored and depressed.²⁷
It racks my brains and disrupts my rest,²⁸
Leaving me too languid to review
Tu Fu's poetry,
Construe Han Yü's compositions,
Or study Liu Tsung-yüan's prose.²⁹
In this state, my sorrowful heart is only more agitated;

As time goes on, my countenance is ever more emaciated.
Unable to share our pleasures,
or to become mates,
All we are fated to do is to suffer in torment.

TO THE TUNE "WEN-CHOU SONG":

As prematurely gray as P'an Yüeh,
As sorely emaciated as Shen Yüeh,³⁰
I regret that, though we met, we did not follow through.
My heart is distressed, my feelings are lacerated.

Roaring flames consume the Zoroastrian Temple;³¹
Turbulent waves have engulfed the Blue Bridge.³²
How will I ever escape my lovesickness?

TO THE TUNE "TEA-PICKING SONG":

How will I ever escape my lovesickness?
The sorrow of separation is as difficult to overcome as a battle formation.
Even someone forged out of iron or stone would find his spirit disturbed.
His sorrow would rise, layer upon layer, like the hills of the Southern Mountain;
His despair would swell, wave upon wave, like the waters of the Eastern Ocean.

TO THE TUNE "TRANSITION":

Who could have anticipated this day?
From of old, students are destined to be unfortunate.
My feelings are lacerated.
My foolish heart merely evokes the laughter of others.³³
To whom can I complain?

TO THE TUNE "CROWS CRY AT NIGHT":

I remember the times when I enjoyed cuddling
the red and hugging the turquoise, Tripping the grass and comparing botanical specimens.³⁴
Upon meeting each other and gazing at the scenery, we enjoyed it together.
In the springtime, twittering swallows sought out their nests;
In summertime, the fragrance of lotus blossoms filled the ponds;
In the autumn, chrysanthemum blossoms
pervaded the empty suburbs;
And in the winter, the auspicious snow fluttered everywhere.³⁵
I recall those painted chambers, replete with song and dance, and rare repasts;
But now, I am at loose ends, sleeping upon a lonely pillow in a wayside inn.
I am beset by spectral visitations,
That are not susceptible to remedy;
Which causes my feelings to be agitated and my thoughts disturbed.³⁶

The pain of heartache is difficult to dispel.³⁷

TO THE TUNE "HIGHER EVER HIGHER":

I am too depressed to sleep.
I think of that captivating beauty,
Who is conversant with the laws of music
and its various modes.
Everything about her is superb;
Her countenance outshines the moon,
Her face puts the flowers to shame.
Her words are captivating, and her mind is sharp.
She is like an immortal maiden come down to earth.
Her golden lotuses traipse gently³⁸ with high phoenix toes;
Her ruby lips and her white teeth smile enigmatically.

TO THE TUNE "THE QUAILS":

Just look at the daintiness of her demeanor;³⁹

Enhanced by an outfit of plain white silk.
Her cosmetics are evenly applied;
Her moth eyebrows lightly painted.⁴⁰
The myriad ways in which she displays her seductiveness,
Are hard to depict, hard to depict.
The finest Yang-kao vintage is decanted;
Incense burns in the duck-shaped censer;
Candles in silver sconces burn brightly.
Now that we may finally become a loving husband and wife;
Surely, our hearts will be one till the end of our lives.⁴¹

CODA:

There is a pathway to the azure clouds that ensures one's arrival.⁴²
If it is not one's fate to succeed, it will be difficult to do so.
I admonish you, never fail to recall the date of this happy event.⁴³

When they had finished singing the song suite, the two sisters brought out a dicebox and proceeded to amuse themselves by playing “Competing for the Red” with Hsi-men Ch’ing. As they:

Passed their wine cups back and forth,
Their faces took on the glint of spring.

Hsi-men Ch’ing noticed that beside the bed in Cheng Ai-yüeh’s room there was a brocaded screen, on which there hung a scroll entitled “Picture of a Moon-loving Beauty,” on which there was inscribed a poem that read:

There is a lovely woman,⁴⁴ who stands out above the crowd.
A gentle breeze obliquely flutters her pomegranate skirt.
Blossoms open in Golden Valley in the third month of spring;
The moon moves the flower shadows in the depth of the night.
Her jade or snowlike spirit reminds one of Ts’ai Yen;⁴⁵
Her alabaster features surpass those of Cho Wen-chün.⁴⁶
One’s youthful dreams are inevitably attracted to her;
Hoping she will not be as indifferent
as a white cloud.⁴⁷

The signature at the end of the poem read, “Drunkenly inscribed by The Master of the Three Springs.”

When Hsi-men Ch’ing saw this, he asked, “Isn’t The Master of the Three Springs the courtesy name of Wang the Third?”

This threw Cheng Ai-yüeh into such consternation that she hastened to cover up by saying, “This is something that he wrote some time ago. At present, he no longer uses the courtesy name Three Springs but is using the name Hsiao-hsüan, or Little Studio, instead. He says that ever since you told him your courtesy name was Four Springs, he felt he could no longer use the name Three Springs without offending you. That’s why he has changed to using the name Little Studio.”

So saying, she stepped forward, picked up a brush, and crossed out the character for “Three.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing was utterly delighted by this and said, “I didn’t know he had changed his courtesy name.”

“I overheard him explaining it to someone else,” responded the painted face, “or I wouldn’t have known about it either. It seems that his deceased father used the name I-hsüan, or Leisure Studio, so he deferentially switched to using the courtesy name Hsiao-hsüan, or Little Studio, for himself.”

When this exchange was over, Cheng Ai-hsiang went outside, leaving Cheng Ai-yüeh alone to entertain Hsi-men Ch’ing in her room. The two of them continued “Competing for the Red” and drinking wine, while sitting:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh.

Hsi-men Ch’ing then brought up the subject of Lady Lin, about whom he said, “She has a great capacity for wine and is devoted to love-making. That day, when I was being entertained by Wang the Third, I was invited into the interior of the residence to pay my respects to her, and she took the initiative in telling Wang the Third to kowtow to me as his adoptive father, and telling me to accept his obeisance, and undertake the task of teaching him how to become a better person.”

Upon hearing this, the painted face clapped her hands and laughed, saying, “You have me to thank for suggesting this scheme to you in the first place. In the future, I have no doubt, even Wang the Third’s wife will fall into your hands.”

“I’ll start out by burning some moxa on Lady Lin,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “Then, I’ll invite her to come to my place, and bring Wang the Third’s wife with her, for a lantern-viewing party at New Year’s, and see if she’ll consent to come or not.”

“Father,” said the painted face, “you don’t even comprehend yet what a beauty Wang the Third’s wife is. Not even a figure on a decorative lantern is as romantic and bewitching as she is. She is just eighteen years old this year, but she might as well be observing her widowhood since Wang the Third spends so little time at home. If you are willing to make a play for her, there is no reason to doubt that she will end up in your hands.”

As they were talking, they moved closer to each other. Who should appear at this juncture but a maidservant who brought in several saucers of delicacies, including baked nut kernels, dried caltrops, fresh tangerines, betel nuts, snow pears, apples, “abalone shell” sweets, candied orange pieces frosted with crystallized sugar, and so forth. The painted face, with her own hand, fed the delicacies to Hsi-men Ch’ing to go with his wine and also employed her tongue to transfer a phoenix-embossed breath-sweetening lozenge from her mouth to his. At the same time, she used her slender hand to lift aside Hsi-men Ch’ing’s lavender silk tunic and expose his white satin trousers. Hsi-men Ch’ing responded by undoing his belt and exposing his organ for her to manipulate. The painted face saw that the silver clasp was already fastened around its root.

It was aroused and its head sprang up,
Becoming both empurpled and shiny.

Hsi-men Ch’ing told her to suck it off for him, and the painted face actually:

Bent low her powdered neck,
Gently parted her ruby lips,
Half swallowing, half disgorging it,⁴⁸
So it moved alternately in and out.
The sound of her sucking was audible.

When she had toyed with it a while:

His “magic rhinoceros horn” was erect,
His libidinous fantasies were on fire,⁴⁹

and he was ready to engage in intercourse. The painted face then went back to the interior, while Hsi-men Ch’ing also left the room to go to the bathroom, where he noticed that the snow was falling thicker than ever.

When he returned to the room, a maidservant was engaged in:

Suspending the brocaded curtains,
Placing the mandarin duck pillow,
Spreading the mermaid silk covers,
Lighting the oval incense burners, and arranging a thick layer of comforters on the bed. After she had helped him to:

Take off his boots and unfasten his girdle, he got into the ivory bedstead. When the painted face returned after washing her private parts, she closed the double-leaved door and joined him inside the mandarin duck bed curtains. Truly, it is a case of:

The spring beauty arouses the beholder,
complaisantly alluring;
The fragrant corolla attracts the butterfly,
in redolent surrender.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Meetings and partings are undependable
when they occur in dreams;
When one gets up, the sputtering candle turns the window gauze red.
Real infatuation, from of old, produces a communion between spirits;
Who says that the road to the Radian
Terrace is not approachable?⁵⁰

The two of them enjoyed:

The raptures of clouds and rain, until the first watch before getting up, upon which a maidservant brought a lamp into the room, enabling them to straighten their clothes and tidy up their hair. They then:

Resumed decanting vintage wine,

Reordered the sumptuous repast, and shared a few more drinks. Hsi-men Ch’ing then asked Tai-an if he had brought a lantern and an umbrella.

“Ch’in-t’ung went home,” replied Tai-an, “and brought back a lantern and an umbrella.”

Only then did Hsi-men Ch’ing prepare to leave. The procuress and the painted face accompanied him out the gate and looked on as he mounted his horse.

Cheng Ai-yüeh raised her voice, saying, “Father, whenever you want me, let me know in good time.”

“I understand,” replied Hsi-men Ch’ing.

Having mounted his horse, with his umbrella in hand, he rode out the gate of the licensed quarter and slogged through the snow as he made his way home. When he got there, he merely told Yüeh-niang that he had been drinking at the store on Lion Street with Brother-in-law Wu the Second. But no more of this. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, the eighth, knowing that Ho Yung-shou had moved his belongings into the former home of Hsia Yen-ling, Hsi-men Ch'ing sent him four boxes of fancy tea and assorted delicacies, along with five mace of silver in lieu of the customary kerchief, as a housewarming gift.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ying Po-chüeh, who came in unexpectedly. Hsi-men Ch'ing, seeing that the snow had cleared, but that there was a cold wind blowing, invited him into his studio in the front compound to warm himself at the brazier and directed a page boy to set up a table, and fetch some viands, so he could share a serving of congee with him.

He then went on to say, "Yesterday, I took care of sending the appropriate congratulatory presents to my kinsman Ch'iao Hung, and Brother Yün the Second. As for the gifts from the rest of you, I have already provided two mace of silver for each of you, so there is no need to give them anything. All you need to do is wait until they issue their invitations."

Ying Po-chüeh raised his hand in acknowledgment and thanked him.

Hsi-men Ch'ing went on to say, "His Honor Ho Yung-shou has already moved into Hsia Yen-ling's place. Today, I have sent him a present of tea and a housewarming gift. Shouldn't you also send him a gift of tea?"

"Only if he invites me over," said Ying Po-chüeh.

He then went on to ask, "Yesterday, what did His Honor An Ch'en and the other two come to visit you for? And who were those two who came with him?"

"One of them was Lei Ch'i-yüan, the assistant commissioner of the Shantung Military Defense Circuit," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and the other one was Administration Commissioner Wang Po-yen. Both of them are natives of Chekiang province. They plan to host a party here tomorrow in honor of Chao T'ing, the prefect of Hang-chou, who has recently been promoted to a position in the capital as minister of the Court of Judicial Review and has been the presiding officer of their native prefecture. There is no reason I should refuse to honor him with a table setting on their behalf, along with communal seating for the rest of us. They have undertaken to provide actors for the occasion, and I also feel obliged to engage the services of two boy actors to entertain the company. They saw fit to give me a joint contribution of a mere three taels of silver."

"Generally speaking," opined Ying Po-chüeh, "civil officials tend to be closefisted with their money. What is three taels of silver good for, after all. You will be obliged to supplement it, Brother."

"This Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "is the one who presided over the trial of Sun Wen-hsiang, the son of Huang the Fourth's brother-in-law. Yesterday, he chose to remind me that it was he who had undertaken to exonerate him."

"You may say he is not closefisted," said Ying Po-chüeh, "but he reminded you of this as a means of settling accounts with you. He will not feel adequately repaid unless you take on the costs of putting on the party."

In the course of their conversation, Ying Po-chüeh summoned Ying Pao and said to him, "Call in that person to meet His Honor."

"Who might that be?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"There is a young man who resides in my neighborhood," replied Ying Po-chüeh, "who comes from an established family, but whose father and mother are both deceased. From his youth he has worked for Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, for quite a few years by now, and has already taken a wife. But, because he did not get along with the other servants on the estate, he has left that position and is currently out of work, not having the wherewithal to go into business on his own. He is a friend of Ying Pao's and has requested him to help him find employment as a servant somewhere. This morning, Ying Pao said to me, 'Father, you're in a good position to recommend him for a job in His Honor's household. I imagine that His Honor could use some additional help.' To which I replied that I didn't know whether you could use him or not."

He then said to Ying Pao, "What name does he go by? Have him come in."

"His name is Lai-yu," said Ying Pao.

Who should appear at this juncture but Lai-yu, who wore an outfit of blue cloth, a four-piece tile-shaped hat,⁵¹ cotton socks, and sandals and proceeded to prostrate himself on the floor and kowtow, after which he stood up outside the screen.

"If you consider this creature's physique," remarked Ying Po-chüeh, "he is more than strong enough to:

Sustain the light and bear the heavy."

He then went on to ask him, "How old are you?"

"I am nineteen," the young man responded.

"Has your wife borne any sons or daughters?" he continued.

"There are only the two of us," he replied.

"Your Honor," said Ying Pao, "the truth of the matter is that his wife is only eighteen. She is adept at cooking and needlework and can create articles of clothing, both large and small."

Hsi-men Ch'ing saw the way the young man stood deferentially with his head lowered and his feet together, exhibiting an artless nature, and said, "Since Ying the Second has seen fit to recommend you, I will give you the opportunity to render me your faithful service. If you will select an auspicious day for the event and produce a written contract, the two of you can move in."

The young man kowtowed in response, and Hsi-men Ch'ing told Ch'in-t'ung to take him back to the rear compound in order to kowtow to Yüeh-niang and the others, and explain his decision to them. Yüeh-niang decided to let him reside in the quarters that had previously been occupied by Lai-wang.

After Ying Po-chüeh had remained sitting there a while longer, he went home, and Ying Pao helped Lai-yu to draft a contract of indenture and turn it over to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who changed his name to Lai-chüeh. But no more of this.

To resume our story, ever since Pen the Fourth's wife, Yeh the Fifth, had given her daughter Pen Chang-chieh to Hsia Yen-ling as a concubine, she had fallen into the daily habit of:

Buying this and buying that,
and inviting P'ing-an, Lai-an, Hua-t'ung, or Han Hsiao-yü, the son of her next-door neighbor Auntie Han, all of them young servants in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, to come and share drinks together at her place on a dutch treat basis. Pen the Fourth's wife was of an accommodating nature and would promptly come up with whatever they requested in the way of snacks or tea. Even when Pen the Fourth happened to come home from the shop and run into them, he did not object. For this reason, when he was not at home, and she needed something done, none of them was averse to acting on her behalf. Tai-an and P'ing-an were the two who frequented her place most often.

The ninth of the month was the day on which Hsi-men Ch'ing had agreed to put on a party in honor of Prefect Chao T'ing, on behalf of Secretary An Ch'en, Administration Commissioner Wang Po-yen, and Assistant Commissioner Lei Ch'i-yüan. On the morning of that day, Lai-chüeh and his spouse moved in, and his wife went back to the rear compound to kowtow to Yüeh-niang and the rest. Yüeh-niang saw that she was wearing a purple damask jacket, a cape of blue cotton, and a green cotton skirt.

She was petite in stature, with
A face shaped like a melon seed,
Decorated with rouge and powder,
That embellished her ruby lips, and her two bound feet displayed their upturned tips. When asked, she responded that she was adept at all forms of needlework. She was given the new name of Hui-yüan and was assigned, together with Hui-hsiu and Hui-hsiang, to take turns working in the kitchen every third day. But no more of this.

One day, Aunt Yang, who lived outside the city gate, died, and her page boy came to report her demise. Hsi-men Ch'ing's household prepared a portable table, along with meat of the three sacrificial animals, soup, and rice; and also sealed up five taels of silver as a contribution toward the cost of the obsequies. Wu Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien, riding in four sedan chairs, set out for the northern quarter to burn paper money and offer their condolences. Ch'in-t'ung, Ch'i-t'ung, Lai-chüeh, and Lai-an also left home to accompany the sedan chairs.

During their absence, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to the studio in the silk goods store across the street and looked on while a furrier prepared to make a sable muffler for Yüeh-niang. Before he did so, he had him make another muffler out of the same sable skin and gave it to Tai-an to take to Cheng Ai-yüeh in the licensed quarter, as he had promised. In addition, he sealed up ten taels of silver, to present to her as a New Year's gift. The Cheng Establishment treated Tai-an to food and drink and gave him three mace of silver with which to buy melon seeds for himself.

When Tai-an returned to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he said, "Cheng Ai-yüeh presents her compliments and thanks. She said that she had offered you but scant entertainment the other day, and she also rewarded me with three mace of silver."

"Keep it for yourself," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

He then went on to say, "Pen the Fourth is not at home, so what were you doing when I saw you come out of his place a while ago?"

"Pen the Fourth's wife," responded Tai-an, "ever since her daughter was married off, has had no one to run errands for her, so she often calls on us servants to purchase things on her behalf."

"As long as she has no one to run errands for her," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you might as well do your best to help out."

He then whispered to Tai-an, saying, "I'd like you to feel her out, thus and so, saying, 'Father would like to come to your place for a visit. What would you think of that?' Then see how she responds. If she reacts favorably, ask her for a handkerchief to give to me as a token."

"I understand," replied Tai-an, who accepted Hsi-men Ch'ing's directive, nodded in assent, and set out on his mission.

Hsi-men Ch'ing arranged for Ch'en Ching-chi to supervise the furrier's tailoring of the sable in his stead and then prepared to go back to the house.

Who should appear at this juncture but Wang Ching, who came back from Silversmith Ku's shop with the gold tiger-shaped tiara he had ordered, along with four pairs of gold-headed silver pins, and turned them over to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who stashed two pairs of pins in the studio before hiding the other articles in his sleeve and proceeding to Li P'ing-erh's quarters and sitting down. He gave the tiger-shaped tiara and one pair of pins to Ju-i, and the other pair of pins to Ying-Ch'un. The two of them accepted these gifts and immediately:

Just as if inserting a taper in its holder,
kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then ordered Ying-ch'un to bring him something to eat, and she returned with it in no time at all. After he had eaten, he went to his studio and sat down. Who should appear at this juncture but Tai-an, who approached him hesitantly but, on seeing that Wang Ching was present, did not say anything.

Only after Hsi-men Ch'ing had sent Wang Ching back to the rear compound to fetch some tea did Tai-an say, "I communicated your message to her, and she responded with a smile. She agreed, later this evening, to expect a visit from you and told me to bring you this handkerchief."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the packet of red "cotton paper," made from the bark of the paper-mulberry, contained a handkerchief of red satin brocade with a diapered border, and that when smelled it exuded a pungent fragrance, he was absolutely delighted and promptly secreted it in his sleeve. When Wang Ching returned with the tea, he drank it and then went back across the street to watch the furrier at his work.

Suddenly it was reported that Hua Tzu-yu had come to pay him a visit, and Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Ask him to join me over here."

Hua Tzu-yu made his way to the heated chamber in the studio across the street, where he saluted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow and sat down, thanking him for the trouble he had put him to the other day. While they were conversing, Hua-t'ung brought over a serving of tea from across the street.

While he was drinking it, Hua Tzu-yu explained, "There is a merchant outside the city gate who has five hundred bags of Wu-hsi rice on his hands, which he is anxious to dispose of because the river is frozen, and he would like to return home. It occurred to me that you might be interested in buying it, and waiting for the price to go up."

"What would I want with that?" responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "No one wants it while the river is frozen, and when the ice breaks up and the boats can come through, the price will drop even further. And besides, at the present time, I don't have any silver on hand."

He then instructed Tai-an, "See to the setting up of a table, and then go back to the house to order some food."

He also told Hua-t'ung, "Go invite Ying the Second to come and provide company for Hua Tzu-yu."

When they had sat there for a while, Ying Po-ch'ueh showed up, and the three of them arranged themselves around the brazier and fell to enjoying the wine. The table was set with four platters and four saucers of viands, including sautéed chicken and fish, and roasted and stewed dishes to go with the wine. Sun Hsüeh-o had also been ordered to bake two batches of pastries, and to provide four bowls of soup flavored with tripe, lungs, and curds.

Sometime later, who should appear but Abbot Wu's disciple Ying-ch'un, who came to deliver New Year's gifts, and the customary memorials and writs for the occasion. Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him to sit down with them to have some wine and also engaged him to take care of the scripture recitation on the "hundredth day" after Li P'ing-erh's death, and paid him the silver for it in advance. They continued drinking until sunset, at which time Ying-ch'un and Hua Tzu-yu left.

Afterwards, Manager Kan Jun closed the shop and was invited to join them, whereupon he fell to throwing dice and playing at guess-fingers with Ying Po-ch'ueh. As they talked together, before they knew it, it was already past lamp-lighting time, and Wu Yüeh-niang and the other ladies arrived home in their sedan chairs.

When Lai-an came in to report their return, Ying Po-ch'ueh asked, "Where did my sisters-in-law go today?"

"Aunt Yang from the northern quarter of the city has died," explained Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Today, they are holding the 'third day' scripture recitation in her honor. We have prepared a portable table, and appropriate sacrificial offerings for the occasion, and have also sent a contribution toward the cost of the obsequies. They went to offer their condolences."

"The venerable lady must have reached an advanced age," opined Ying Po-ch'ueh.

"She was probably seventy-four or seventy-five," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "She didn't have any children of either sex and depended on her nephew who resides outside the city gate for support. It is also some years now since I undertook to provide a coffin for her."

"She was a lucky old lady," remarked Ying Po-ch'ueh. "To have a coffin at hand prepares one for the day when your:

Yellow gold is stored in the coffer.⁵²

That was really a good deed on your part, Brother."

When this conversational exchange was finished, and:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed,

Ying Po-ch'ueh and Kan Jun said farewell and departed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then said, "It's the eleventh, so it's the turn of my son-in-law to spend the night here."

"In the shop over there," said Tai-an, "Uncle Fu the Second has also gone home, so I will be spending the night in the shop by myself."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then got up and went across the street, where he told his young servant Wang Hsien, "Be careful with the braziers and candles."

"I understand," responded Wang Hsien.

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked on while he locked the gate and then, observing that there was no one around, proceeded to step nimbly into Pen the Fourth's quarters, where, whom should he see but Pen the Fourth's wife, who had been standing there all by herself for some time.

When she heard the sound made by the locking of the gate and saw Hsi-men Ch'ing approaching her in the dark, she promptly opened the outer door for him and then closed it, saying, "Father, come inside the sliding paper door and sit down."

It so happens that the inner room was divided by a papered latticework partition, behind which there was a small k'ang with a smoldering brazier, a table with a lighted lamp, and two bedrails. The room had been newly plastered so that it looked as white as snow and was decorated with four framed hanging scrolls. On her head she wore a kingfisher-blue gold lamé headband, her fret was adorned with four gold pins, and a pair of clove-shaped earrings dangled from her ears. Her body was clad in a purple damask jacket and a black chiffon cape, over a jade-colored silk chiffon skirt. She stepped forward and greeted Hsi-men Ch'ing with a bow, after which, she promptly served him a cup of tea to drink.

Speaking in a whisper, she said, "I'm afraid that Auntie Han next door may become aware of us."

"Never fear," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I kept in the dark, so she couldn't have seen me."

Thereupon:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he proceeded to embrace the woman and give her a kiss. Pulling over a pillow, he undressed her, laid her down on the edge of the k'ang, lifted up her legs, and started to thrust away. The clasp was already fastened on his organ. No sooner had he inserted it into her vagina and withdrawn it several times than, down below:

Her vaginal fluids began to overflow, leaving her blue cotton drawers soaking wet. Hsi-men Ch'ing then withdrew his organ, groped a packet of the aphrodisiac powder known as "The Quavery Voices of Amorous Beauties" out of his wallet, rubbed some of it on his turtle head, and thrust it back inside. Only then did he stem the flow of her vaginal fluids. While he gave himself over to thrusting and retracting, the woman clasped Hsi-men Ch'ing around the shoulders with both hands. As they responded to each other, the woman from underneath him raised her quavery voice and gave vent to unending groans of satisfaction. Hsi-men Ch'ing, exhilarated by the wine, lifted her two legs over his shoulders and proceeded to alternately submerge and expose the knob of his glans:

Advancing with alacrity and galloping forward, as he slammed away at her no less than two or three hundred times. In no time at all:

Her cloud-shaped chignon became disheveled,⁵³

The tip of her tongue became ice-cold, and

Her voice became completely inarticulate;⁵⁴

while Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Reduced to panting and puffing, as the melting sensation in his "divine turtle" was such that he:

Ejaculated like a geyser.

After some time, he retracted his organ, releasing her vaginal secretions, which she proceeded to wipe up with a handkerchief.

Pen the Fourth's Wife Braves the Cold to Engage Her Lover

After the two of them had readjusted their clothing, fastened their girdles, and put themselves to rights, Hsi-men Ch'ing groped five or six taels worth of loose silver out of his sleeve, together with two pairs of gold-headed hairpins, and presented them to the woman with which to buy costume jewelry for the New Year's season. The woman bowed to him in gratitude and surreptitiously let him out the door. Tai-an was waiting in the shop, listening intently for the sound of the door knocker, and promptly opened the main gate to let Hsi-men Ch'ing in. He was confident that no one was aware of his actions, and afterwards, as the mornings and evenings succeeded one another, he made out with her several times.

Truly:

The best way to avoid being found out,
Is not to do it in the first place.

Who could have known that Auntie Han would perceive the situation with her sardonic eye and pass the information on to Chin-lien in the rear compound, who opted not to expose the state of affairs for the time being.

One day, on the fifteenth of the twelfth month, the household of Ch'iao Hung hosted a party, and Hsi-men Ch'ing, along with Ying Po-chüeh and Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, set out to attend it together. There were many relatives and friends there that day, and they enjoyed the performance of theatrical selections and drinking wine until the second watch before the party broke up. The next day, each of them also received the gift of a table setting of food, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Let us return to the story of Ts'ui Pen, who had purchased two thousand taels worth of silk piece goods in Hu-chou, hired a boat to transport them, and set out for home early in the twelfth month. Upon arriving at the dock in Lin-ch'ing, he left the young employee Jung Hai to look after the goods, hired a donkey on which to ride, and headed for home in order to get the silver for the cartage fee.

When he arrived at the gate of the shop and dismounted, Ch'in-t'ung said, "So Brother Ts'ui has come home. Take a seat in the reception hall. Father is in the house across the street. I'll go fetch him."

Upon going across the street, he did not see Hsi-men Ch'ing and asked P'ing-an where he was.

"Father has probably gone back to the rear compound," said P'ing-an.

Ch'in-t'ung, accordingly, went back to the master suite and asked Yüeh-niang where he was.

"You lousy jailbird. You've been seeing things," said Yüeh-niang. "Father went out early this morning and hasn't been back inside since."

Ch'in-t'ung proceeded to look for him in the quarters of all the residents, as well as the garden and the studio, but failed to find him.

On coming back to the main gate, he raised his voice, saying, "How utterly frustrating! Who knows where Father has gotten to that he is nowhere to be found? Even in broad daylight, he is nowhere to be seen. Brother Ts'ui Pen has been here all this time and has been forced to wait in vain."

Tai-an was well aware of the situation but did not utter a word. Unexpectedly, Hsi-men Ch'ing emerged from the front compound to the utter befuddlement of the page boys. It so happens that he had been in Pen the Fourth's quarters making out with his wife and had only just come out. P'ing-an directed Hsi-men Ch'ing to the shop across the street and then stuck out the tip of his tongue at Ch'in-t'ung.

They all broke into a sweat on his behalf, saying, "No doubt, once Brother Ts'ui Pen has gone, you'll be in for a few strokes of the cane."

Who could have anticipated the fact that when Hsi-men Ch'ing made his way into the reception hall, Ts'ui Pen kowtowed to him and turned over his account books, saying, "When the boat arrived at the dock I found that I lacked sufficient silver for the cartage fee. We set out together on the first day of the twelfth month, but on arriving in Yang-chou I separated from the other two while they went on to Hang-chou. We all stayed for two days at the home of your kinsman Miao Ch'ing."

He then went on to say, "Miao Ch'ing has expended ten taels of silver to purchase the daughter of a battalion commander of the Yang-chou Guard as a present for you. She is only fifteen years old and is named Ch'u-yün. Words are inadequate to describe her.

Her face is like a flower,
Her flesh is like jade,
Her eyes are like stars,
Her eyebrows are like crescent moons,
Her waist is like a willow,
Her stockings are like hooks, and
Her two feet are barely three inches long.

Truly:

She has a face that induces fish to dive and geese to plunge;
Her visage outshines the moon while putting flowers to shame.⁵⁵

She has a repertory of three thousand short songs and eight hundred long songs. Truly:

If one were to describe her glamour:
It is like a shining pearl rolling on a crystal plate.
If one were to speak of her demeanor:
It is like a red apricot on a branch tip caught in the morning sun.

Miao Ch'ing is maintaining her in his home for the time being, so he can have a vanity case made for her and provide her with an appropriate wardrobe. This coming spring, Han Tao-kuo and Lai-pao will bring her on their boat so she can wait upon Your Honor and serve to:

Dissipate your melancholy and dispel your gloom."⁵⁶

When he heard this, Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted and remarked, "You could just as well have brought her on your boat. What need is there for him to provide her with a wardrobe, or to have a dressing case made for her? As though my household were unable to supply such things."

Thereupon, his only regret was that he could not:

Mount the clouds and spread his wings, in order to fly to Yang-chou, take possession of this voluptuous beauty, and enjoy the happy event to his heart's content. Truly:

The case of the deer was one that the minister of Cheng was unable to solve;⁵⁷
Whether the butterfly was Chuang Chou, or vice versa, cannot be determined.⁵⁸

There is a poem that testifies to this:

He has heard tell that in Yang-chou
there is one Ch'u-yün;
But the word of such an obscure bird
may not be reliable.
He does not realize that good things are often evanescent;
Just ask their owner about the fate of his plum blossoms.⁵⁹

Hsi-men Ch'ing kept Ts'ui Pen company while he had something to eat and then weighed out fifty taels of silver to cover the cartage fee. He also wrote a letter to Secretary Ch'ien Lung-yeh of the Lin-ch'ing customs house, requesting that he be granted favorable treatment. When they had finished talking together, Ts'ui Pen took his leave and went to Ch'iao Hung's household to report his return.

When P'ing-an saw that Hsi-men Ch'ing did not bother to find fault with Ch'in-t'ung, he remarked, "You don't know how lucky you are. Were it not so, when Father came inside, at the very least, you would have been in for several strokes of the cane."

Ch'in-t'ung laughed at this, saying, "I guess you're the only one who truly understands Father's nature."

By the time the cargo of silk piece goods had been transported from Lin-ch'ing and unloaded at the shop on Lion Street, it was the last decade of the month. Hsi-men Ch'ing was at home at the time, supervising the delivery of New Year's gifts, when a messenger from Director-in-Chief Ching Chung arrived unexpectedly with a calling card that read: "Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien's report should have arrived in the capital some days ago, but I don't know whether the imperial rescript in response to it has come down yet or not. I humbly submit, venerable sir, that if you could send someone to the censor's yamen to inquire about it, it would be most gratifying."

Hsi-men Ch'ing forthwith sent an adjutant with five mace of silver to inquire about it from a clerical subofficial in the provincial censor's yamen, and, sure enough, the government gazette had come down the previous day, and the clerk agreed to make a copy of the relevant material for Hsi-men Ch'ing's perusal. It read as follows:

Memorial submitted by Sung Ch'iao-nien, Regional Investigating Censor of Shantung

In re: The Evaluation, According to Precedent, of the Local Civil and Military Officials, with a View toward Inspiring the Feelings of the Populace, and Enhancing Your Majesty's Sage Administration

I venture to observe that civil officials exist to nurture the people, and military officials exist to prevent disorder, so as to protect the territory,⁶⁰ and ensure the people's livelihood. Should the wrong men hold office,⁶¹ their actions will be illegitimate, the people will suffer, and the state will have no one on whom to rely. No institution is more important than the censorial evaluations for the inspiration and motivation of the civil and military officials, and they cannot but be undertaken with due diligence. Your servant has been delegated to survey the situation in the territory of Shantung, and to personally monitor the state of public morality. With regard to the effectiveness of the administration, the hardships of the people, and the qualifications of the civil and military officials, he has scrupulously looked into all of them, has sought the assessments of the highest authorities regarding the worthiness, or lack thereof, of all the relevant officials, and is confident that he has succeeded in ascertaining the truth about them. Now that the end of my assignment is imminent, it is incumbent upon me to present in detail the results of my investigation.

The provincial administration commissioner of Shantung, Ch'en Ssu-chen, is loyal and honest in his personal conduct, and proficient at nurturing the people.

The investigation commissioner for Shantung, Chao No, upholds the legal standards with clarity, so that both gentry and commoners submit to them.

The vice-commissioner of education, Ch'en Cheng-hui, exemplifies motivational conduct and adheres strictly to the principles of leadership.

I have also ascertained that the assistant commissioner of the Military Defense Circuit, Lei Ch'i-yüan, has earned the respect of both soldiers and civilians for his judicious exercise of mercy and severity, and won the praise of both colleagues and subordinates for his experienced direction.

The prefect of Chi-nan, Chang Shu-yeh, is respected for his thrifty administration and has demonstrated a talent for governing.

The prefect of Tung-p'ing, Hu Shih-wen, is honest and scrupulous in the exercise of his office and is as solicitous of the populace as though they were invalids.⁶²

The prefect of Hsü-chou, Han Pang-ch'i, is sedulous in his devotion to his duties, and worthy of a position in the imperial court.

The prefect of Lai-chou, Yeh Ch'ien, has repulsed the maritime pirates and governed so effectively that people do not pick up articles dropped by the wayside.⁶³ He has also served the agricultural needs of the populace by preventing their land from becoming too saline.

These several officials are all worthy of being rewarded with promotion to higher positions.

I have also learned that the left assistant administration commissioner, Feng T'ing-hu, has a humpbacked physique and is in the sunset of his life.⁶⁴ Though he has no more vitality than a wooden puppet, he remains as rapacious as ever.

The prefect of Tung-ch'ang, Hsü Sung, allows the father of his concubine to engage in bribery, so that the court is swamped with accusations. He is so extortionate in assessing taxes that censure is rampant in his jurisdiction.

These two officials deserve to be promptly removed from office.

In addition, I have ascertained that the commandant of the Left Army and notary of the Bureau of Military Affairs, Chou Hsiu, is imposing in stature, and skilled at maintaining discipline, having mastered the qualifications of a military commander. He has won the allegiance of the troops in his command, and quelled the banditry in his jurisdiction.

The military director-in-chief of Chi-chou, Ching Chung, is both young and energetic, and his talent and faculties are fully developed. He won first place in the military examinations and is renowned as an erudite officer whose masterful tactics enhance his ability to engage in combat. His commands are uniform and strictly enforced, and his strategies enable him to resist aggression.

The military director-in-chief of Yen-chou, Wen Hsi, is proficient at military strategy, and practiced at archery and horsemanship. He maintains a contingent of cavalry in order to prepare for the unexpected⁶⁵ and labors to erect fortifications as a defense against the unforeseen.⁶⁶

These three officials deserve to be promptly promoted to higher office.

The battalion commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, Wu K'ai, possesses fully developed talent and understands the responsibilities of a guard commander. In commanding his forces to attack the most hardened opponents, he never fails to win every engagement. By stocking provisions with which to feed his men, not one of them is forced to go unfed. His ability to express empathy for others⁶⁷ inspires his troops to put their lives at risk. He is truly a bastion in defense of the region and a bulwark ensuring the safety of the state. He ought to be specially promoted in order to motivate his fellow officials.

If Your Majesty sincerely believes that your servant's suggestions are worthy of consideration and chooses to implement them, it is to be hoped that the ranks of officialdom may be cleansed of superfluity, the resolution of the people may be inspired,⁶⁸ the right men may be appointed to office, and Your sage administration will have a foundation on which to rely.

The rescript elicited by this memorial read:

These proposals have met with imperial approval and should be directed to the attention of the appropriate boards.

There followed a response from the Ministry of Personnel and the Ministry of War which read as follows:

Having perused the contents of the memorial submitted by Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, we find that his evaluation of the civil and military officials in his jurisdiction is an expression of his loyalty to the state. It incorporates public opinion and is based on honest investigation, with the intent of bolstering Your Majesty's sage administration. We humbly submit that if Your Majesty's sage wisdom sees fit to enact these proposals, the empire would then be fortunate indeed, and the people would then be fortunate indeed.⁶⁹

The rescript elicited by this memorial read:

These recommendations are imperially approved. Let them be enacted as proposed.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished reading this material he was utterly delighted and, taking the government gazette with him, made his way back to the rear compound, where he said to Yüeh-niang, "The response to Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien's evaluation has already come down. Your elder brother has been promoted to the position of assistant commander of the Ch'ing-ho Guard, with the substantive position of supervisor of the State Farm Battalion. Commandant Chou Hsiu and His Honor Ching Chung have also been promoted to the rank of assistant commander-generals. Right now, we ought to promptly send a page boy to invite your elder brother over so we can tell him about it."

"You go ahead and send someone to invite him," responded Yüeh-niang. "I'll get a maidservant to fetch wine and refreshments for him. My only worry is that he will be short of silver to spend on the ceremony of assuming office."

"That doesn't matter," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'm prepared to lend him a few taels of silver to take care of it."

It was not long before Brother-in-law Wu K'ai arrived, and Hsi-men Ch'ing showed him the texts of the relevant memorials and rescripts.

Wu K'ai promptly bowed in gratitude to Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang, saying, "I am greatly indebted to the support of my brother-in-law and my sister.

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

"Brother-in-law," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "if you are short of money with which to put on a party to celebrate your assumption of office, I am willing to weigh out a thousand taels of silver for you to use for the purpose."

Wu K'ai, once again, bowed in gratitude, after which, wine was served in Yüeh-niang's room, and Yüeh-niang herself sat down to keep them company. Hsi-men Ch'ing then directed Ch'en Ching-chi to make a copy of the relevant data from the government gazette and give it to Wu K'ai, and he also sent Tai-an to deliver copies of the gazette to the homes of Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung and Commandant Chou Hsiu in order to convey the good news. HSI-MEN CH'ING VENTURES UPON A SECOND ENGAGEMENT WITH LADY LIN; WU YÜEH- NIANG INVITES HO YUNG-SHOU'S WIFE TO VIEW THE LANTERNS

The pitch changes in the lowest pitch-pipe as a propitious breath blows;
When the yin retreats and the yang ascends the temperate ether returns.¹
The sunflower's shadow begins to shift on the day of the winter solstice;
The plum blossom begins to bloom at the time of the solar term Little Cold.
The day of the sacrifice to the Eight Spirits² portends an auspicious year;
As the ether blows into the pitch-pipes, the ash of the pith is disturbed.
The willows on the riverbanks are all ready for the change of season;
In their profusion, they are more than happy to usher in the Spring.³

THE STORY GOES that on that day Hsi-men Ch'ing kept Brother-in-law Wu K'ai company as they drank together until he went home that evening.

Early the next morning, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung came on horseback to thank him, saying, "When I read the rescript that you sent me yesterday, I was:

Unable to contain my satisfaction.

It is more than sufficient to show the extent of your generous regard. I will certainly:

Carry rings and knot grass, and never forget it.

Battalion Commander Fan Hsün is getting old, and Militia Commander Chang Kuan had hoped for a promotion, but they have been left where they were and may feel somewhat disappointed."

After they had finished speaking, and the tea had been twice replenished, Ching Chung got up to go and asked, "When is His Honor Yün Li-shou going to invite us over for a drink to celebrate his promotion?"

"He won't be able to invite us during these few days before New Year's," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "It will have to wait until sometime next month."

He then escorted him to the gate, where he mounted his horse and departed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then supervised the preparation of a freshly slaughtered pig, two jars of Chekiang wine, a round-collared scarlet robe of velvet embroidered with gold thread and emblazoned with a hsieh-chih, the mythical one-horned goat who was said to gore wrongdoers, a round-collared robe of black figured satin, and a hundred stuffed gold-colored pastries, as an expression of his gratitude to Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, and sent Ch'un-hung, with a calling card, to deliver them to the provincial censor's yamen. The gatekeeper went inside to report his arrival, and Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien called him into a heated chamber in the rear reception hall, where he was provided with tea while he waited for him to write an answer. When he had done so, he put it into an envelope, sealed it, and rewarded Ch'un-hung with three mace of silver.

When Ch'un-hung arrived home and presented it to Hsi-men Ch'ing, he tore it open and saw that it read as follows:

Having twice imposed upon your illustrious household, I am profoundly embarrassed. And now, I am once again the undeserving recipient of your magnanimity. What can I do to be worthy of such largess? I have already memorialized on behalf of your kinsman, Wu K'ai, and your colleague, Ching Chung, as I expect you know. For days on end I have longed for a glimpse of your radiant countenance, so that we may discuss things in person, and I may have an opportunity to express my gratitude.

The signature at the end read: "Respectfully indited by his devoted servant, Sung Ch'iao-nien, for the perusal of the distinguished officer of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, His Honor the gentleman Hsi-men Ch'ing."

Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien, soon thereafter, sent someone to deliver a hundred copies of the official calendar for the coming year, four hundred sheets of stationery, and a pig as a return gift to Hsi-men Ch'ing.

One day, a document came down from the higher authorities confirming that Brother-in-law Wu K'ai should report to the yamen of the local guard and assume the duties of his new office. Hsi-men Ch'ing visited him in order to offer his congratulations and gave him thirty taels of silver, and four bolts of capital brocade, to expend, both high and low.

On the twenty-fourth, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who was entitled to a recess for the holiday season, put away his seal of office and came home, where he had prepared mutton and wine, red banners, and an inscribed scroll, and invited his relatives and friends for a party to celebrate Wu K'ai's accession to office. Upon returning from the guard yamen after assuming office, Wu K'ai was welcomed to the home of Hsi-men Ch'ing, where a sumptuous feast was provided in his honor.

Around the same time, the dependents of Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou arrived from the Eastern Capital, and Hsi-men Ch'ing sent a welcoming gift of tea to them in Wu Yüeh-niang's name.

On the twenty-sixth, Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor, along with twelve of his acolytes, came to the Hsi-men Ch'ing residence to perform the scripture recitation on the "hundredth day" after Li P'ing-erh's death. The appropriate texts for the salvation of the departed were recited ten times over, the ritual was performed with due solemnity, and there was:

Loud playing on wind and percussion instruments,⁴ to further enhance the incense-burning procession. A large number of relatives and friends came to offer gifts of tea and were duly invited to partake of the sacrificial oblations. The party did not break up until the evening. But no more of this.

On the twenty-seventh, Hsi-men Ch'ing supervised the sending out of New Year's gifts. The households of Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, Manager Fu Ming, Manager Kan Jun, Han Tao-kuo, Pen Ti-ch'uan, and Ts'ui Pen were each given half a pig, half a sheep, a jar of wine, a sack of rice, and a tael of silver. Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, and Cheng Ai-yüeh from the licensed quarter were each given an outfit of Hang-chou silk clothing and three taels of silver. Wu Yüeh-niang had also commissioned Nun Hsüeh to preside over a service at her nunnery and ordered Lai-an to deliver incense, lamp-oil, rice, flour, and silver for the occasion. But no more of this.

Before long, it was the last day of the year.

The moon shines on the plum trees in the window;
The wind disturbs the snow lying upon the eaves.⁵
Firecrackers explode before a thousand doors;
Lanterns burn in front of ten thousand gates.⁶
Every home displays lucky interlocking lozenges;
Everywhere hang couplets inscribed on peachwood.

Hsi-men Ch'ing burned paper money and then went to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to make a sacrificial offering before her spirit tablet, after which wine was served in the rear reception hall. When the whole household, high and low, including Yüeh-niang, Li Chiao-erh, Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and his son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, had saluted him with a drink, they sat down arrayed to either side. Then Ch'un-mei, Ying-ch'un, Yü-hsiao, Lan-hsiang, and Ju-i, the five of them, kowtowed to him, followed by Hsiao-yü, Hsiu-ch'un, Hsiao-luan, Yüan-hsiao, Chung-ch'iu, and Ch'iu-chü. After this, Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," Hui-ch'ing, Lai-pao's wife Hui-hsiang, Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu, and Lai-chüeh's wife Hui-yüan, the spouses of the four principal servants, kowtowed. Only after this did Wang Ching, Ch'un-hung, Tai-an, P'ing-an, Lai-an, Ch'i-t'ung, Ch'in-t'ung, Hua-t'ung, Lai-chao's son Little Iron Rod, Lai-pao's son Seng-pao, and Lai-hsing's daughter Nien-erh kowtow to him in turn. Hsi-men Ch'ing and Yüeh-niang presented each of them with handkerchiefs, kerchiefs, and silver.

The next day was New Year's Day, the first day of the first month of the first year of the Ch'ung-ho reign period.⁷ Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early, donned his formal cap and crimson robe, lit incense dedicated to Heaven and Earth, burned paper money, had something to eat, called for his horse, and set out to proffer his New Year's greetings to Regional Investigating Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien.

Yüeh-niang and the other ladies of the household also got up early:

Daubed on makeup and applied powder,
Stuck floral trinkets in their hair;
Donned brocade skirts, embroidered jackets,⁸ Silken hose, and shoes with upturned tips;
Dressed themselves up to look captivating, Decorated themselves to appear enchanting;

and forgathered in Yüeh-niang's room to exchange greetings.

P'ing-an and the orderly on duty that day stationed themselves at the front gate to accept the calling cards and record the names of the officials and gentlemen who came to call.

Tai-an and Wang Ching, wearing new clothes, new boots, and new caps, went outside the gate, where they played at shuttlecock, let off firecrackers, cracked melon seeds with their teeth, concealed sachets of pomander in their sleeves, and sported quivering paper cutouts of spring moths on their heads.

The vast number of Hsi-men Ch'ing's employees, managers, and protégés who gathered to extend their New Year's greetings was so great they could hardly be counted. Ch'en Ching-chi was assigned the task of single-handedly entertaining them in the front guest room.

The furnishings for an elaborate feast were laid out in the large reception hall in the rear compound for the entertainment of the friends and relatives of the family.

In the summerhouse in the garden, felt curtains and heat-holding drapes were suspended, brocade carpets and embroidered rugs were arrayed, along with braziers burning animal-shaped briquettes, and ten tables replete with gold lamé tablecloths and figured seat cushions.

Platters were piled high with rare fruits,

Vases were embellished with gold blossoms,

The feast was spread on tortoiseshell mats,⁹ all reserved for the entertainment of the visiting gentlemen and officials.

Around noontime, Hsi-men Ch'ing came home after making his formal calls at the prefectural and district yamens. He had just dismounted from his horse when Wang the Third from the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang, garbed in formal attire and followed by four or five attendants, showed up to proffer his greetings. On arriving in the reception hall, he proceeded to perform:

Four brace makes eight kowtows,

after which he asked if Wu Yüeh-niang could come out so he could meet her. Hsi-men Ch'ing, accordingly, invited him into the rear compound to meet Yüeh-niang and then ushered him back to the front reception hall and offered him a seat. They had just saluted each other with a cup of wine when Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou came by to proffer his greetings. Hsi-men Ch'ing directed Ch'en Ching-chi to entertain Wang the Third, while he went to the summerhouse to receive Ho Yung-shou. Upon drinking a little while longer, Wang the Third said goodbye, and Ch'en Ching-chi escorted him to the front gate, where he mounted his horse and departed. After this, Military Director-in-Chief Ching Chung, Commander Yün Li-shou, and Ch'iao Hung also showed up one after the other.

By this time, as a consequence of entertaining visitors all day long, Hsi-men Ch'ing was:

Half inebriated with wine.

That evening, after seeing everyone off, he returned to the master suite and went to sleep for the night.

The next morning, Hsi-men Ch'ing went out again to make New Year's calls and did not return until evening. In his absence, Han Ming-ch'uan, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, and Hua Tzu-yu had all come to call, and Ch'en Ching-chi had the task of entertaining them in the reception hall, where they had been waiting for some time. When Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived, a new serving of wine and accompanying delicacies was provided, and they fell to drinking again. Since Han Ming-ch'uan and Hua Tzu-yu lived outside the city wall, they were the first to get up and go, but Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh continued to sit there until they were so drunk they bobbed about like the float valve in an oil jar, without venturing to leave. Brother-in-law Wu the Second also showed up. After expressing his greetings, he went back to the rear compound to pay a visit to Yüeh-niang and then came out again to join them. They continued drinking until after the lamps were lit before the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing was already stinking drunk by the time he saw off Ying Po-chüeh and the others at the front gate.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that Tai-an was standing beside him, he squeezed his hand, and Tai-an, who understood what this meant, said, "No one else is in her place."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, thereupon, made his way toward Pen Ti-ch'uan's quarters. The woman, who was already standing inside the outer door, welcomed him inside, and the two of them, without wasting any words, went into the inner room, where the woman:

Took off her clothes, undid her girdle, and Lay down on the k'ang with her legs spread.

Hsi-men Ch'ing let down his trousers and lifted up her legs. The silver clasp was already fastened on his organ, and he proceeded to set to work with it. It so happens that the woman liked to keep her thighs together during intercourse, but she used her two hands to separate them so that Hsi-men Ch'ing could better stimulate her clitoris. In consequence, her vaginal secretions flowed out in a warm flood, soaking the mattress. Hsi-men Ch'ing had applied an aphrodisiac to his turtle head, and he plunged it inside her, claspng her around the waist with both hands, while the two of them proceeded to knead away at each other until his chowrie handle penetrated her to the root:

Without leaving a hairsbreadth outside.¹⁰

The woman opened her eyes wide, while calling out, "My own daddy!"

Hsi-men Ch'ing asked her, "What is your given name? Tell me."

"My maiden name is Yeh," she responded, "and I am the fifth sibling in my family."

Hsi-men Ch'ing muttered to himself, saying, "Yeh the Fifth, I don't know whether you are familiar with oral intercourse, or not."

This woman had originally been employed as a wet nurse and had engaged in an affair with Pen the Fourth, who absconded with her and took her as his wife. She was petite in stature, with a sultry, treacle-sweet gaze, and was born in the year of the hare, so that she was just thirty-one years old, and there wasn't much she didn't know about anything.

Repetitions of the words "My own daddy" poured out of her mouth in an endless stream until Hsi-men Ch'ing's feelings came to a climax, and he:

Ejaculated like a geyser.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing retracted his chowrie handle and wanted to wipe it off, the woman prevented him from doing so, saying, "Don't wipe it off. Let this whore of yours get down and suck it clean for you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted by this proposal.

The woman then actually squatted down on her haunches, took hold of his organ with both hands, and sucked it completely clean, before allowing him to refasten his trousers.

She then went on to ask Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Why is it that my husband has been gone all this time without coming home?"

"I've also been expecting him," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I fear that His Honor Hsia Yen-ling in the capital may be keeping him there for some reason."

He then proceeded to reward the woman with two or three taels of silver as pin money, saying, "I would give you an outfit of clothes, but I fear that if Pen the Fourth were to find out about it, it would prove embarrassing. It's better to give you this silver, so you can buy what you want for yourself."

The woman then opened the door and let him out. Tai-an was alone in the shop, where he waited behind the closed door for Hsi-men Ch'ing to come in, before securing it for the night, while Hsi-men Ch'ing made his way back to the rear compound.

Gentle reader take note: It has always been true that:

If the ridgepole is not straight,

The rafters will be crooked.

This is a natural principle.¹¹

If the head of a household commits morally questionable acts, the servants in his home will follow his example. It so happens that this wife of Pen the Fourth was not the sort to abide by her lot. She had already been carrying on an affair with Tai-an, and now she had succeeded in enticing Hsi-men Ch'ing as well.

No sooner had Tai-an seen Hsi-men Ch'ing into the house than he took advantage of the fact that Manager Fu Ming was not spending the night in the shop to join P'ing-an in filling two large vessels of wine and visiting Pen the Fourth's wife in her quarters, where they drank together until the second watch. When P'ing-an returned to the shop to sleep, Tai-an proceeded to spend the night with Pen the Fourth's wife. Can such things be? Truly:

There is no need for the people of today to practice threading needles;

How could the Weaving Maid have the leisure to confer such dexterity?¹²

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Romantic feelings bedazzle the eyes, causing one's vision to blur;

Why is it that the scattered blossoms end up trampled into the mud?

Laying aside his zither, he ceases to perform

Shang-ling's sad lament;¹³

Which is making the mountain fowl chatter as they fly among the trees.¹⁴

To resume our story, that evening Pen the Fourth's wife said to Tai-an, "The only thing I'm afraid of is that Auntie Han next door may leak information about what's going on to the ladies in the rear compound. As in the case of Manager Han Tao-kuo's wife, if they have anything to say about it, I'll be utterly mortified¹⁵ to be seen by them."

"Aside from the First Lady and the Fifth Lady," said Tai-an, "the others don't matter. The First Lady is all right, but the Fifth Lady is prone to be officious. If you take my advice, buy something as a New Year's gift and go inside to offer it to the First Lady as a demonstration of your filial respect. She may not care that much about anything else, but she has always had a liking for steamed shortcake. You ought to buy a mace worth of stuffed steamed-short-cake pastries and a box of large melon seeds to present to her. The ninth day of the month is the Fifth Lady's birthday. You ought to give her a gift as well, and go in person to present her with a box of melon seeds. If you go inside and kowtow to them tomorrow, I guarantee it will have the effect of stopping their mouths."

Pen the Fourth's wife chose to act on Tai-an's advice, and the next day, while Hsi-men Ch'ing was not at home, Tai-an bought the gift boxes for her and took them back to Yüeh-niang's room in the rear compound.

"Where do these come from?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"Pen the Fourth's wife is presenting these boxes of delicacies and melon seeds for Mother to eat," responded Tai-an.

"When her husband is not even at home," remarked Yüeh-niang, "how did she come up with the money to go to such trouble on my behalf?"

She promptly accepted them and sent her a box of steamed dumplings and a box of fruit in return, saying, "Present her with my respects, and thank her for me."

That day, when Hsi-men Ch'ing returned home from paying New Year's visits, Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor came to extend his compliments. Hsi-men Ch'ing entertained him for a drink in the reception hall before seeing him off.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then took off his formal clothes and said to Tai-an, "You take the horse and go pay a visit to Auntie Wen. Say to her, 'Father would like to come pay his respects to Lady Lin today,' and see what she says."

"There is no need for me to go, Father," responded Tai-an. A while ago, I ran into Auntie Wen, who was riding her donkey past the front gate. Tomorrow, on the fourth, Wang the Third is going to depart for the Eastern Capital to pay his respects to his wife's uncle, the eunuch Huang Ching-ch'en. Lady Lin says she would like Father to pay her a New Year's visit on the sixth. She will be expecting you then."

"Did she really say that?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"You don't mean to suggest that I would dare tell a lie, do you?" protested Tai-an.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then proceeded to go back to the rear compound. He had hardly arrived in the master suite and sat down before Lai-an suddenly appeared and reported that Brother-in-law Wu had come.

Wu K'ai, accordingly, came into the rear parlor, dressed in formal attire, including a girdle with a gold plaque, and bowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying:

"It's a long story,

but I, Wu K'ai, am greatly indebted to you, Brother-in-law, for promoting my interests and looking after me the way you have. It has cost you something to do so, and I am extremely grateful for your lavish gifts. The other day when you condescended to pay me a visit,

I was not at home. The fact that I was not there to welcome you has left me feeling as though I let you down. Today, I have come to respectfully kowtow to you in the hope that you will forgive my remissness."

So saying, he offered him a kowtow.

Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly kowtowed to him in return, saying, "Brother-in-law, congratulations on your promotion.

It is only a natural development;
as a close relative of mine:

What need is there to discuss it?"

When Wu K'ai had finished paying obeisance to Hsi-men Ch'ing, Yüeh-niang came out and kowtowed to her elder brother. She was decked out in a gilt-ridged cap of pale lavender crepe under a sealskin toque, a white satin jacket that opened down the middle, an aloeswood-colored brocaded vest, and a wide-cut skirt of jade-colored satin. On her ears she wore a pair of earrings adorned with two pearls apiece, her chignon was studded with combs and hairpins in the shape of gold phoenixes, and on her breast there hung a gold chatelaine with its three pendant charms that served as a clasp for her collar. Beside her skirt was suspended a purple brocaded purse with eight tassels, and a key chain of variegated cord. On her feet she wore a pair of high-heeled shoes of white satin brocade with an embroidered pattern. In short, she was dolled up very vividly. Coming forward:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze:

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying;

Just as if inserting a taper in its holder;
she kowtowed to her brother four times.

This threw Wu K'ai into such consternation that he promptly performed a half kowtow in return, saying, "Sister, two kowtows are enough."

He then continued, "Your elder brother and his wife are so:

Unconscious of right and wrong, that we are constantly coming and imposing on the two of you. Your elder brother is aging, and we are increasingly dependent on you."

"If we ever let you down," responded Yüeh-niang, "I hope that you will forgive us."

"Sister," said Wu K'ai, "it goes without saying that we have put the two of you to no small trouble on our behalf."

When this exchange of courtesies was over, Hsi-men Ch'ing invited Wu K'ai to sit down, saying, "By this time of day, I assume that my brother-in-law will not be visiting anyone else to extend his New Year's greetings. Why don't you loosen your clothes and sit down in the room here for a visit."

Who could have anticipated that Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien, who were both in an adjacent room, upon hearing the stir that Brother-in-law Wu's arrival had created, would promptly proceed to come in and kowtow to him. They both wore sealskin toques, white satin jackets, and jade-colored drawnwork skirts. One of them wore a green brocaded vest, and the other a purple brocaded vest. On their heads, they both sported frets, but Meng Yü-lou's was set off with pearl circlets, while P'an Chin-lien's was enhanced by pendant onyx earrings, and below they revealed the upturned points of their golden lotuses. After kowtowing to Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, they retreated to their own quarters.

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had ushered his brother-in-law to a seat in the room, a table was placed over the brazier, and platters of appetizers, boxes of candied fruit, assorted bowls of hot viands, large steamed dumplings, and a soup of eight ingredients were brought in and placed upon it. Hsiao-yü and Yü-hsiao also came in and kowtowed to Brother-in-law Wu. In a little while, after they had finished with the soup and rice, Yüeh-niang took up a small gold goblet, inlaid with tortoiseshell, filled it with wine, and offered it to Wu K'ai, while Hsi-men Ch'ing continued to play the role of host.

Brother-in-law Wu demurred, saying, "Sister, why don't you come and sit down with us?"

"I'll be there in a moment," responded Yüeh-niang, as she went into the inner room and came out with an assortment of delicacies to go with the wine, consisting of bamboo shoots, whitebait, ground squirrel, minced sturgeon, jellyfish, edible fungus, apples, betel nuts, fresh tangerines, pomegranates, dried caltrops, snow pears, and the like.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then asked, "Has my brother-in-law's recent promotion gone through satisfactorily?"

"Thanks to my brother-in-law's support," responded Wu K'ai, "my new appointment came through at New Year's. I have already distributed 70 or 80 percent of the customary gratuities, both above and below, but have not yet visited the site of the State Farm Battalion. Tomorrow is an auspicious day for me to go and assume my new office. The Ch'ing-ho Guard has already issued my official seal of office. When I return home, I will have to prepare some gift boxes and have them carried to the yamen of the State Farm Battalion in time for my assumption of office, and also dispatch an order for the heads of the State Farms to assemble so I can issue their instructions. My predecessor, Director Ting, having mismanaged affairs, has already been impeached by Grand Coordinator Hou Meng, and been removed from office. Now that I have been appointed to:

Assume his position and carry out his duties,

I will have to examine closely the lists of registered tenants, and motivate the heads of the State Farms to go over them with a fine-tooth comb and clearly report any additions or subtractions, in order to facilitate the collection of the autumn and summer tax assessments."

"How extensive, altogether, are the State Farms that will be under your jurisdiction?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"As for these State Farms," replied Wu K'ai, "I will be candid with you, Brother-in-law. According to the precedent promulgated by Emperor T'ai-tsu,¹⁶ units of the Military Guard were assigned to work on State Farms, which were established in order to save the transportation costs of logistical support. Later on, the grand counselor Wang An-shih introduced the Green Sprouts system,¹⁷ which involved the additional assessment of this summer tax. Prior to that time, the State Farms were only required to submit the autumn tax assessment, and this summer tax was not applied to land owned by the civilian population. At present, within the jurisdiction of Chichou, leaving aside uncultivated land, the Imperial Reed Beds, harbors, and narrows, the total area of the State Farms is twenty-seven thousand mou. The total value of the produce collected by the autumn and summer tax assessments is one tael and eight mace per ch'ing of land, which amounts to no more than five hundred taels of silver. At the end of the year, when the taxed produce has been collected, it is turned over to the authorities in Tung-p'ing prefecture, who in turn engage merchants to transport it, in order to provide logistical support and fodder for the army."

"Is there anything left over to profit from?" asked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Although there are always some unregistered tenants," replied Wu K'ai, "these rural villagers are a wily lot. If you try too hard to extort anything out of them by using weighted scales or oversize containers, you run the risk of arousing adverse public opinion."

"As long as there is something left over," opined Hsi-men Ch'ing, "it should be all right. The government can hardly be expected to extract everything. If something can be retained through the manipulation of containers and scales, it should be sufficient to take care of your necessary expenditures, both high and low."

"To be candid with you, Brother-in-law," said Wu K'ai, "if I am adroit in managing these State Farms, in the space of no more than a year, I should be able to realize as much as a hundred or more taels of silver. In addition to which, at the end of the year, there will be tenants who choose to present me in person with chickens, geese, pigs, or rice. These gifts are not demanded of them and fall outside what can be expected in the way of income. I am greatly indebted to you, Brother-in-law, for the strength of your support."

"As long as it suffices for your needs," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "I will do what little I can on your behalf."

As they were talking, Yüeh-niang came in and sat down at their side. The three of them continued drinking together until after the lamps were lit before Brother-in-law Wu K'ai got up and took his leave. That day, Hsi-men Ch'ing went to Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound to spend the night.

The next day, Hsi-men Ch'ing reported to the yamen, where he resumed the use of his seal of office, taking his place on the bench, calling the roll, and dispatching official business.

Before this, the household of Yün Li-shou had sent out cards inviting Hsi-men Ch'ing and the officers of the Guard to attend a party on the fifth in celebration of his official appointment, and Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, had sent a card inviting Yüeh-niang and her sister wives for a get-together on the sixth.

On the fifth, Hsi-men Ch'ing, Ying Po-chüeh, and Brother-in-law Wu, the three of them, set out together to attend the party at Yün Li-shou's place. It so happens that Yün Li-shou had rented the house next door for the occasion and used the eighteen-foot-wide parlor there to entertain his guests. He had engaged musicians playing wind and percussion instruments to welcome his visitors, each of whom was provided with an individual table setting. They enjoyed themselves there until the evening before returning home.

Hsi-men Ch'ing could hardly wait until Yüeh-niang had departed to attend the party at the home of Ho Yung-shou the next day. He then proceeded to dress himself up to befit the occasion, stuffed packets of gratuities into his sleeve, mounted his horse, put on his eye shades, and, attended by Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, set out in the early afternoon for the mansion of Imperial Commissioner Wang in order to extend his New Year's greetings. Wang the Third was away from home at the time, but he left a calling card for him. Auntie Wen was already there and, taking possession of his calling card, promptly went inside to report his arrival to Lady Lin.

Upon coming out, she said, "Your Honor is invited to come back to the rear of the residence and take a seat."

Making his way past the large reception hall, he headed toward the rear of the establishment, passed through the ceremonial gate, lifted aside the translucent portiere, and entered the thirty-foot-wide parlor in the residential quarter. In the place of honor at the head of the room there was suspended a full-length portrait of the family patriarch Wang Ching-ch'ung, before which there stood two tables with sacrificial offerings of food and wine. He was depicted seated on a crimson dais in a folding armchair, covered with a tiger skin. Before the portrait:

The entire floor was covered with rugs, and

The drapery consisted of hanging red curtains.

Before long, Lady Lin appeared, wearing a full-sleeved jacket of scarlet material:

Her head was covered with pearls and trinkets, and

Her face was glossy with powder and cosmetics.

After exchanging the customary courtesies with Hsi-men Ch'ing, she invited him to sit down and share a serving of tea, and ordered a servant to lead his horse back to the stables in the rear and take care of feeding it. When they had finished drinking their tea, she suggested that Hsi-men Ch'ing should loosen his outer clothing and sit down with her in her own room.

"My son set out for the Eastern Capital on the fourth," she explained, "in order to kowtow to his wife's uncle, Defender-in-Chief Huang Ching-ch'en. He will not come back until after the Lantern Festival."

Hsi-men Ch'ing, accordingly, took off his outer garments, under which he wore a white satin jacket, an ultramarine flying fish python robe, and white-soled black boots, presenting a really natty appearance. In the woman's room a table was set up beside a square brazier of yellow brass with animal heads protruding from its four sides, filled with smoldering charcoal. The chamber was facing the sun, which shone through the windows, so that it was brightly illuminated.

In a little while, maidservants brought in the wine.

The cups and plates were duly arranged,

Filled to the brim with rare delicacies.

The wine overflowed with golden ripples, and

A kettle of hydrangea-flavored tea was brewing.

The woman, garbed in:

A brocade skirt and embroidered jacket,
With her white teeth and bright eyes,
Passed the cup with her jadelike hands,
Conveying ardent feelings in her glance.

The two of them engaged in:

Playing at guess-fingers and throwing dice,
As their laughing banter became suggestive.
Chatting for some time,
Their thoughts were genial and their feelings warm;
Drinking quite a while,
Their gazing became risqué and their hearts stirred.
By degrees,
The sun set and dusk descended,
Before long,
Silver candles burned brightly.¹⁸

Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung were provided with wine and food at a table set up in a side chamber under the supervision of Auntie Wen. Wang the Third's wife resided in a room on the other side of the postern gate and was waited on by her own maidservants and waiting women, so that she did not ordinarily intrude on Lady Lin's living quarters. The woman had also seen to it that the postern gate was locked from the inside, so that none of the male servants would venture to barge in upon her.

When the two of them began to feel the effects of the wine, they went into the woman's boudoir together, where they:

Raised the brocade curtains, and Closed the window casements.
A maidservant deftly trimmed the silver lamp;
The beauty hastily closed the vermilion door.
The gentleman took off his clothes and went to bed;
The lady washed her feet and climbed in beside him.
The pillows were decorated with peonies;
The coverlet disturbed by crimson waves.

It so happens that before leaving home Hsi-men Ch'ing, had:

Made ready his arsenal of weapons,¹⁹ and brought his bag of sexual implements with him, intending to engage the woman in a furious battle. He had already taken a dose of the Indian monk's medicine, washing it down with wine, and had attached a pair of clasps to his organ. Under the coverlet, he lifted up the woman's two legs, inserted his chowrie handle into her vagina, arched his back and set vigorously to work. In the ensuing bout, as he lifted her body into the air and pegged away at it, the sound resembled that made by a throng of coolies plunging through the mud.²⁰

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly.

The woman, in her abject position, called out "Daddy!" unceasingly. Truly:

Amid autumn colors, the battle flags and banners are reflected in the sea;
By the light of the moon, the Heaven-smiting beat of military drums resounds.

There is a long set-piece of parallel prose that describes this engagement. Behold:

Before the brocade screen,
A soul-disorienting formation²¹ is arrayed;
Under embroidered curtains,
A spirit-conjuring banderole is unfurled.
From the soul-disorienting formation,
There emerges a guardian deity of wine,
a demon king of sex.
On his head is a flesh-colored helmet,
with a brocade visor;
On his body is a suit of glossy armor,
and a vermilion gown,
With protuberant bands, a fish skin belt,
and seamless boots.

He flaunts a black-tasseled spear,
 A tiger-eyed whip,
 A shooting star double-balled mace,
 And featherless arrows.
 Astride his curly-haired sunken-eyed roan,
 He waves a rain-flipping cloud-flapping²²
 commander's flag.
 Beneath the spirit-conjuring banderole,

Lady Lin Has a Second Engagement within the Bed Curtains

There appears a powdered skeleton,²³
 a flamboyant vixen.
 On her head is a two-phoenix ornament,
 with hanging ropes of pearls;
 On her body is a blouse of white silk,
 a kingfisher skirt waist,

A crotch of white treated silk, with wave-tripping stockings,
 A waistband of mermaid silk, replete with phoenix-toed shoes.
 She wields dismissive lashes,
 A garrulous tongue,
 Invisible arrows,
 A blubbing bludgeon,
 An emaciated mace,
 And silk-curtained scutcheon.
 Astride her coquettish jade-surfaced cunt,
 She sports a tossing and tumbling mating phoenixes²⁴ parasol.
 Before long, on one side, with a p'u tung-tung, drums resound like spring thunder;
 While on the other side, in wild profusion, the scent of orchid and musk disperses.
 On one side, amid a warm aura, the coverlet is disturbed by crimson waves;
 On the other side, with a rustle, curtains are suspended on silver hooks.
 As the coverlet is disturbed by crimson waves,
 his passions are demanding;
 Beneath the curtains suspended on silver hooks,
 her sentiments are bizarre.
 One of them, urgently, tries to run the gamut of all twenty-four positions;²⁵
 The other, abruptly, finds it hard to manage eighteen rolling responses.
 One of them is used to wielding a red floss noose²⁶ and tying a lovers' knot;
 The other is adept at using the kidnapper's shooting star date-shaped mace.
 One of them, wielding his flaring cylindrical spear,
 Looks forward to jabbing her three thousand times;
 The other, deploying her quivering
 labia bucklers, Expects to be surmounted at least fifty times.
 This one is accustomed to don his armor and wear a uniform when he fights;
 That one is deft at purloining the semen and sucking the marrow of her foe.
 One of them, riding his fighting steed,
 with a p'a t'a-t'a,
 Tramples the realm of song and dance;
 The other, like a cunning foot soldier,
 surreptitiously,
 Hides in the densely wooded gorge.
 One of them presents an ugly, belligerent,
 and unbending physique;
 The other reveals a seductive apricot face and peach-colored cheeks.

One of them flaunts his ability to maintain even a prolonged conflict;
The other her skill at giving forth oriole's notes and swallow's cries.²⁷
One of them, after undergoing a protracted engagement, Drips with sweat, her hairpins askew, her coiffure in disarray;²⁸
The other, after maintaining a relentless assault, Pants and puffs, his pillow dislodged, his mattress displaced.
Before long, behold, the ballista attacks have reduced Crotch County to rubble, Leaving each of them with bulging brows
and swollen eyes;
In no time, one perceives, the sparsely wooded field is so gored with the spear,
That they are each left with split flesh and broken skin.²⁹

Truly:

The thundering clouds rise up as high as
the nine-layered heavens,
While down below the defeated combatants lie tumbled on the field.³⁰
Although he had often engaged lascivious women in furious battles,
None of them had ever risen to the level
of this one's intensity.³¹

On this occasion, Hsi-men Ch'ing burned two pellets of moxa on the middle of the woman's chest and her mons veneris and promised that he would put on a party at his residence in the near future, and invite her and Wang the Third's wife to come and enjoy viewing the lanterns. The woman's body and mind had already been so tightly entrained by Hsi-men Ch'ing that she:

Effusively voiced her acceptance,³² promising that they would both go. Hsi-men Ch'ing was utterly delighted to hear this. On getting up, they resumed drinking heartily and enjoying each other's company until the second watch, when the horse was led out to the back gate, and Hsi-men Ch'ing took his leave and returned home. Truly:

Do not fear lest the bright moon should set,
It will be succeeded by a subtle fragrance.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

All day long I yearn for you, within my painted boudoir;
Having met, I cannot give you up, but press you to remain.
Master Liu³³ is undeterred by the age of the peach blossoms;
Wantonly scattering the pink petals into the flowing stream.³⁴

To resume our story, when Hsi-men Ch'ing arrived home, he was met at the gate by P'ing-an, who reported, "Today, Eunuch Director Hsüeh sent someone to deliver a written invitation for you to pay a visit to the imperial estates outside the city wall tomorrow morning, in order to enjoy the advent of spring. In addition, Yün Li-shou has sent someone to deliver five calling cards inviting the ladies of your household to a New Year's party. I have already sent the cards inside."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he had nothing to say, but proceeded to make his way back to Yüeh-niang's room in the rear compound. Meng Yü-lou and P'an Chin-lien were already sitting there. Yüeh-niang, who had just returned from the party at Ho Yung-shou's place, had already removed her head ornaments and was only wearing a fret, held in place with six gold pins, and a pearl headband. Attired above in a blue satin jacket, and below a skirt of soft yellow cotton material, she had sat down to chat with them. When Hsi-men Ch'ing came in, she hastily stood up and greeted him with a bow.

After Hsi-men Ch'ing had taken a seat at the head of the room, she asked him, "Where have you been today that you have come home so late?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing hesitated before replying, "I was at Brother Ying the Second's place, where he retained me until now."

Yüeh-niang then told him about the party at Ho Yung-shou's place that day, saying, "It so happens that Battalion Commander Ho's wife is still young, being only seventeen-years-old this year. She is as pretty as a figure on a decorative lantern, possesses an impressive demeanor:

Is well-informed about the present and the past,³⁵ and is as vivacious as can be. She treated me as intimately as though we had already met more than once and showed herself to be extremely congenial. She has been married to Ho Yung-shou for only two years or so, but she already has four maidservants, two waiting women, and two servants' wives at her disposal."

Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "She is the niece of Eunuch Director Lan Ts'ung-hsi, who is in charge of the Daily Provisions Office of the Imperial Household Department and provided her with a substantial dowry when she was married."

Yüeh-niang went on to say, "As the page boy has probably told you, the household of Yün Li-shou has also invited us womenfolk to a New Year's party, sending five individual invitations, which are lying there on top of the cabinet, along with the invitation from Eunuch Director Hsüeh."

She then turned to Yü-hsiao and said, "Bring them over for Father to take a look at."

Hsi-men Ch'ing looked over the invitation from Eunuch Director Hsüeh and those from Yün Li-shou's household and noticed that the latter were signed below by his wife with the words, "Respectfully indited with straightened skirts by the lady, née Su, of the Yün family."

"Tomorrow, all of you might as well get your things together and go," said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"We should leave Sister Sun Hsüeh-o at home," said Yüeh-niang. "I fear that during this major festival season, if someone were to pay us a call, there would be no one to cope with the situation."

"All right, then," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you can leave Sun Hsüeh-o at home while the other four of you go. I won't be going anywhere tomorrow either. Eunuch Director Hsüeh has invited me to come to his place outside the city wall to enjoy the advent of spring with him, but I'm reluctant to go. The last few days, I don't know whether it is due to the advent of spring, or what, but I've developed a pain on one side of my waist and my thigh."

"If you are feeling pain in your waist and thigh," opined Yüeh-niang, "I fear it must be an outbreak of phlegm-fire. You ought to get Doctor Jen Hou-ch'i to prescribe a couple of doses of medicine to treat it. What's the point of merely putting up with it?"

"It doesn't matter," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "If I wait a few days before seeking any medication, things will calm down."

He then went on to discuss his plans with Yüeh-niang, saying, "On the occasion of the Lantern Festival a few days from now, we'll have to throw a party and invite Ho Yung-shou's wife, Commandant Chou Hsiu's wife, Ching Chung's wife, Chang Kuan's wife, Ch'iao Hung's wife, Yün Li-shou's wife, Wang the Third's mother, Sister-in-law Wu, and Ts'ui Pen's mother for a get-together. On the twelfth or thirteenth, we'll have to hang up the lanterns, and engage the services of the troupe of actors maintained by Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, to entertain us for the day. Unfortunately, however, last year Pen the Fourth was here and took care of the erection of stands for the fireworks display, but this year he has gone off to the Eastern Capital and hasn't come back yet, so who are we to get to take care of the fireworks?"

Chin-lien interrupted him from the sidelines, saying, "Since Pen the Fourth is not here, his wife is equally adept at dealing with erections."

At this, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave Chin-lien a look, saying, "Why you little whore! You can't utter three sentences without getting vulgar."

Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou chose to ignore this exchange, and Yüeh-niang went on to say, "As for the mother of Wang the Third, none of us has formally met her.

We are newly acquainted and hardly know each other.

What's the point of inviting her? I fear she is unlikely to come."

"Since she has acknowledged me as a kinsman," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "we might as well send her an invitation. Whether she chooses to come or not is up to her."

Yüeh-niang then went on to say, "I don't think I'll go to Yün Li-shou's place tomorrow. I'm in the last month of my pregnancy, and if I continue to run around this way it will only cause tongues to wag."

"Sister," remarked Meng Yü-lou, "there's really nothing to be afraid of. The fact that you are pregnant is not conspicuous, and I doubt if your child will actually be born within the month. It doesn't matter. You might as well relax and enjoy yourself during such a major festival."

When they had done discussing it, Hsi-men Ch'ing finished his tea and headed for Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters in the rear compound. When P'an Chin-lien saw that he had chosen to go to Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters, she spoke to Hsi-men Ta-chieh and accompanied her out to the front compound. Upon arriving in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters that evening, Hsi-men Ch'ing had her pummel his legs and massage his body for half the night. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next morning, who should appear but Ying Po-chüeh, who came to borrow some clothes and head ornaments, saying to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Yesterday, the wife of Yün Li-shou sent a card inviting my wife to join my sisters-in-law at her party. Although she has some old clothes at home, they are all in bad shape. During the first month of the new year:

Venturing out and returning home,³⁶ without decent clothes to wear can only give rise to ridicule. For this reason, I have made bold to come pay my respects to my sister-in-law, in the hope that if she has any sets of clothing and head ornaments, hairpins, or bracelets to spare, I might borrow a few of them so she can be appropriately garbed for the occasion.”

Hsi-men Ch'ing accordingly turned to Wang Ching and said, “Go inside and convey the message to the First Lady.”

Ying Po-chüeh also addressed Wang Ching, saying, “Ying Pao is waiting outside with a felt bag and a box. May I impose on you to take them inside and bring them back out when the borrowed things have been packed in them?”

Wang Ching, thereupon, collected the felt bag and went back to the rear compound.

After some time, he came back out with the parcel and handed it to Ying Pao, saying, “There are two outfits of first-class satin brocaded garments, five head ornaments, large and small, and a pair of earrings adorned with two pearls apiece inside.”

Ying Pao took the package and set out for home, while Hsi-men Ch'ing drank tea with Ying Po-chüeh, saying, “Yesterday, my wife attended a party at Ho Yung-shou's place and did not return home until late. And today, unexpectedly, Yün Li-shou's wife has sent five cards inviting my spouses to a get-together. My First Lady is in the last month of her pregnancy and was reluctant to go, but I said to her, ‘Since they have taken the trouble to invite you on the occasion of a major festival like this, all of you might as well go.’ I also haven't had any free time the last few days. It was only yesterday that I finished paying my New Year's courtesy calls. The other day, we all went to that party at Yün Li-shou's place, and yesterday, I had to go out again to fulfill a minor obligation and didn't arrive home until late. On top of which, today, Eunuch Director Hsüeh has invited me to visit his place outside the city wall in order to enjoy the advent of spring. How can I find the time to go? Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Temple of the Jade Emperor has also sent a card reminding me that he is going to perform the annual chiao rites of cosmic renewal on the ninth. I won't be able to go myself but will send my son-in-law instead. The last few days, I don't know whether it's because I've had too much to drink, or what, but I've been suffering from pain in my lower back and haven't felt like doing anything.”

“Brother,” responded Ying Po-chüeh, “it probably is a case of excessive drinking causing damp phlegm to accumulate in the lower body.”

“During this festival season,” remarked Hsi-men Ch'ing, “who is going to let you off lightly? One can scarcely avoid drinking.”

“How many of my sisters-in-law are going to attend the party today?” asked Ying Po-chüeh.

“The First Lady, the Second and Third Ladies, and the Fifth Lady, the four of them, are going,” replied Hsi-men Ch'ing. As for me, I'm going to stay home and rest for a few days.”

As they were speaking, who should appear but Tai-an, carrying a card box in his hand, who announced, “His Honor Ho Yung-shou's household has sent someone to deliver an invitation to a New Year's party on the ninth.”

“You see what I mean,” Hsi-men Ch'ing remarked to Ying Po-chüeh. “When people take the trouble to invite you, one can hardly refuse.”

Thereupon, he looked in the card box and saw that it contained three invitations. One of them, inscribed on safflower red paper, was addressed, “To My Superior the Venerable Gentleman Ssu-ch'üan,” one of them, “To the Assistant Commander of the Guard the Venerable Gentleman Wu K'ai,” and another, “To the Respected Member of the Community the Venerable Gentleman Ying Po-chüeh.” All of them were signed, “Respectfully indited with his compliments by your devoted servant, Ho Yung-shou.”

Tai-an explained, “The sender said that since he was not yet acquainted with the other two gentlemen, he hoped that we would forward their invitations on his behalf.”

On taking this in, Ying Po-chüeh said, “What am I to do about this? Before I have sent anything to him, he has seen fit to send an invitation to me. How can I go under the circumstances?”

“I can seal up the customary gift of a handkerchief on your behalf,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing, “and you can have Ying Pao deliver it to him. That ought to take care of it.”

So saying, he said to Wang Ching, “Go seal up two mace of silver and a handkerchief, write Ying Po-chüeh's name on the package, and give it to him.”

He then turned to Ying Po-chüeh, and said, “If you put this invitation of yours in your sleeve you can save me the trouble of having it forwarded to you. I'll have Lai-an deliver Wu K'ai's invitation to him.”

Before long, Wang Ching sealed up the gift of the handkerchief and handed it to Ying Po-chüeh, who thanked Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, “Brother, you've made it a lot easier for me. I'll come over early the day after tomorrow, and we can set off together.”

When he had finished speaking, he took his leave and departed.

To resume our story, that noon, Wu Yüeh-niang and the others, having dressed themselves appropriately, set out in one large sedan chair and three smaller sedan chairs, followed by Hui-yüan, the wife of Lai Chüeh, who accompanied them in a small sedan chair in order to look after their clothes. With four orderlies preceding them to clear the way, and attended by Ch'in-t'ung, Ch'un-hung, Ch'i-t'ung, and Lai-an, they proceeded to the residence of Yün Li-shou to attend the party. Truly:

With blackened eyebrows and cloudy locks,
they are pretty as pictures;
Displaying slender and lithesome waists,
they are out of this world.
Veritable models of the Goddess of the Moon, up in the heavens;
In their seductive beauty they generate fervent spring feelings.³⁷

We will say no more about how Wu Yüeh-niang, together with Li Chiaoerh, Meng Yü-lou, and P'an Chin-lien, set out to attend the party at Yün Lishou's residence.

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave orders to P'ing-an, the keeper of the main gate, saying, “No matter who may come, simply tell them that I am not at home. If they have cards to leave, just accept them, that's all.”

P'ing-an, having already suffered the consequences of failing to strictly obey such orders in the past, did not dare to stray from his post but remained seated at the gate. No matter who showed up, he simply told them that the master was not at home.

As for Hsi-men Ch'ing, that day he went into Li P'ing-erh's quarters and sat down to warm himself at the stove.

Ever since Li P'ing-erh had died, Yüeh-niang had instructed Ju-i not to bind up her breasts in order to prevent lactation, but to breast-feed Lai-hsing's baby daughter Ch'eng-erh every day. For several days in a row, Hsi-men Ch'ing had been suffering from pain in his legs. Suddenly he recalled that Dr. Jen Houch'i had given him a prescription for life-prolonging pills that were to be taken with human milk. For this reason, on coming into Li P'ing-erh's quarters, he asked Ju-i to squeeze out some of her milk for him.

Ju-i, in celebration of the New Year's festival, had studded her chignon with frosty gold-colored pins and rings, so that:

Her head was covered with costume jewelry, set-off with a kingfisher-blue gold lamé headband. She wore a jacket of blue pongee, and a cloak of jade-white cloud-patterned satin, over a yellow cotton skirt, and a pair of sand-green Lu-chou silk shoes with high white-satin heels. She was dressed up quite differently from the way she had been in the past and was also wearing four silver-coated pewter rings on her hands.

She sat down beside Hsi-men Ch'ing in order to assist him in taking his medication and then proceeded to pour wine for him and urge him to have something to eat. After Ying-ch'un had seen to providing a meal for him, she withdrew into the next room, where she sat down to play at a board game with Ch'un-mei. If tea or water were required, Hsiu-ch'un was available to fetch them from the kitchen.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing saw that the maidservants had vacated the room, he leaned nonchalantly against the back of the k'ang, undid the white satin cord of his woolen trousers, exposed his organ, which was already fitted with a silver clasp, and told her to suck it for him. As she did so, he was able to help himself to the wine and delicacies that were conveniently arrayed at his side.

Calling out, “Chang the Fourth, my child,” he went on to say, “if you do your best to suck it off for me, tomorrow, I’ll find a patterned satin vest for you to wear for the Lantern Festival that begins on the twelfth.”

“I appreciate your concern,” the woman responded.

After she had played with his organ for the time it would take to eat a meal, Hsi-men Ch’ing said, “My child, I’d like to burn some moxa on your body.”

“Do as you please,” the woman replied. “You can burn moxa on me wherever you like.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing told her to close the door to the room, take off her skirt, climb onto the k’ang, and recline face-up on the pillow. On her lower body, she was wearing a pair of newly made scarlet drawers of Lu-chou silk, one leg of which she proceeded to pull down. In his sleeve, Hsi-men Ch’ing still retained three pellets of the moxa steeped in distilled spirits that he had burnt on Lady Lin. Removing her bodice, he placed one of them on the middle of her chest, one on her lower abdomen, and one on her mons veneris. Igniting them with a stick of benzoin incense, he thrust his organ into her vagina and lowered his head in order to observe its movements. Alternately submerging and exposing the knob of his glans, he proceeded to move it in and out without ceasing. He also moved a mirror stand over beside him so he could better observe the action. In a little while, as the moxa burnt its way down to the skin, the woman:

Knit her brows and clenched her teeth,³⁸

in order to endure the pain.

In a trembling voice and faint tones,

While groaning for all she was worth, she cried out inarticulately, “Daddy! Father! You’ll be the end of me yet. It’s really hard to take.”

“Chang the Fourth, whore that you are,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “whose wife are you?”

“I’m Father’s wife,” the woman responded.

Hsi-men Ch’ing instructed her, “Say to me, ‘I was once Hsiung Wang’s wife, but today I belong to my own daddy.’”

The woman did as she was told, saying, “Whore that I am, I was originally Hsiung Wang’s wife, but today I belong to my own daddy.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing went on to ask, “Do I know how to fuck or not?”

“Daddy really knows how to fuck a cunt,” the woman replied.

What with their:

Obscene noises and lascivious words, there was nothing the two of them left unsaid. Hsi-men Ch’ing’s organ was thick and large, stretching the woman’s vagina to the limits. As it went back and forth and in and out, it agitated her clitoris:

As red as a parrot’s tongue,

And as dark as a bat’s wing, in a pleasurable way. Hsi-men Ch’ing thereupon placed her two legs around his waist, so that their four limbs were intertwined as they responded to each other. His organ penetrated her all the way to the root:

Without leaving a hairsbreadth outside.

The woman opened her eyes wide and cried out involuntarily as her vaginal fluids flowed out below. When Hsi-men Ch’ing’s passion became intense and his pleasure reached its height, his semen spurted out like a gushing spring. Truly:

Not yet apprised that the tidings of spring

had already arrived;

They knew only that their bodies and joints

were melting away.³⁹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Letting him have his way in proffering his cups of “sunset clouds.”⁴⁰

Her brain is flooded with lustful feelings, vast and without limit.

Her whole body is at the disposal of The Lord of the East’s whim;

What does she care if her jeweled hairpin should fall by the bedside?⁴¹

On that day, after Hsi-men Ch’ing had finished burning three pellets of moxa on the woman’s body, he opened the door, searched out a patterned vest of jet-colored satin, and presented it to her.

That evening, when Yüeh-ning and the others returned home, she said to Hsi-men Ch’ing, “It turns out that Yün Li-shou’s wife is also in a late state of pregnancy. At the party today, the two of us toasted each other and agreed that when the time comes for us to give birth, if one of the babies is a boy and the other a girl, our two households will betroth them to each other, and thus become related. If they are both boys, we will arrange for them to study together, and if they are both girls, we will have them treat each other as sisters, do their needlework together, and play with each other as if they were related. Ying Po-chüeh’s wife undertook to act as a witness to the agreement.”

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he merely smiled.

To make a long story short, the next day was the eve of P'an Chin-lien's birthday. Hsi-men Ch'ing got up early that morning to go to the yamen. Before doing so, he ordered the page boys to get out the lanterns, clean them up, take care of suspending them in the large reception hall, the summerhouse, and elsewhere, and set out brocade hangings and standing screens for the occasion. He also told Lai-hsing to buy fresh fruits and so forth, and engage the services of boy musicians, for the celebration that evening.

That morning, P'an Chin-lien dressed herself up and came out:

Richly adorned and daubed with powder,

In turquoise sleeves with rouged lips, and ventured into the large reception hall, where she saw Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, standing on high stools, in order to suspend the three beaded hanging lanterns with their large bowls.

With an ingratiating smile, she said, "I wondered who I would find here, and it turns out to be the two of you, hanging up the lanterns."

"Today is the eve of your birthday," said Ch'in-t'ung, "and Father ordered us to hang up the lanterns so they will be in place for your birthday party tomorrow. This evening, we will all come and kowtow to you, and expect to be rewarded appropriately."

"If it's a beating you want, I will be happy to oblige," the woman responded. "But as for rewards, there won't be any."

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Ch'in-t'ung. "You:

Rarely say a word without threatening a beating.

Whatever we do, you respond by proposing to beat us. We are all like your children, after all. It would be better if you were to care for us instead of constantly threatening us with punishment."

"You lousy jailbird!" the woman responded. "You had better stop shooting off your mouth and get back to the task of carefully hanging up the lanterns. If you don't watch what you're doing, you're likely to lose your grip, and let one of them fall to the ground. The other day, before New Year's, when Ts'ui Pen arrived home, you were heard to say, 'Even in broad daylight, Father is nowhere to be seen.' On that occasion, despite the risk you ran, you were lucky enough to escape a beating. But, on this occasion, you may be in for one."

"Mother," protested Ch'in-t'ung, "how can you persist in using such disparaging language? My existence is precarious enough as it is without your continuing to frighten me."

"Mother was not there to hear that remark of his," interjected Tai-an. "How did you know about it?"

The woman responded:

"Outside the palace is a pine tree,

Inside the palace there is a bell;

Just as a bell has its sound,

A tree has its shadow.

How could I not know about it? The other day, Father said to the First Lady, 'Last year Pen the Fourth was here and took care of the erection of stands for the fireworks display, but this year he is not here, so there is no one to take care of the fireworks.' This prompted me to remark, 'Although he is not here, his wife is equally adept at handling erections. You might as well let her take care of it.'"

"Mother," protested Tai-an, "how can you bring yourself to utter such an allegation? You're talking about the household of his own manager. How could there be any such thing?"

The woman responded:

"What kind of talk is that?

It's got a sandalwood haft.

Such things do indeed occur. Though you may draw a line against such conduct, people will be tempted to violate the boundary."

"Mother," said Ch'in-t'ung, "you ought not to believe what people accuse her of. I fear that when Pen the Fourth arrives home, he will find out about it."

"You may succeed in deceiving a thousand gullible cuckolds," the woman responded, "but I pronounce this cuckold to be an open cuckold. It is not surprising that he should be willing to go off to the Eastern Capital while leaving his wife behind, knowing full well that she would be unwilling to let her cunt lie idle. You lousy jailbirds should keep your mouths shut. You band together to act as procurers for your master and make it possible for him to have his way, while hoping to be able to follow in his footsteps. Am I right, or am I not? And yet you dare to suggest that I don't know what I'm talking about. No wonder that lousy whore bought me a birthday gift, made a present of steamed shortcake to the First Lady, and even had a large box of melon seeds delivered to me in order to buy my silence. She's an old hand at taking on lovers, and my guess is that one of them is none other than Tai-an. It's that lousy jailbird that has:

Laid plans and hatched a scheme,
on her behalf."

"Mother," protested Tai-an, "you do me a mortal injustice. Why should I concern myself with her doings, for no good reason? I don't ordinarily frequent her quarters. You really ought not to listen to what that wife of Mohammedan Han has to say. The two of them have been quarreling vociferously over their children. As the sayings go:

It is hard to keep on good terms,

But it is easy to pick a quarrel.
The collapse of a house may not be deadly,
But an evil tongue can lead to your death.
If you believe something, it will be true,
If you disbelieve in it, it will be false.

If you stop to consider it, Pen the Fourth's wife possesses an accommodating nature. Dwelling as she does by the gate of the residence, she has not antagonized even a single member of the household, great or small. Who is there who has not procured a serving of tea from her? Do you mean to suggest that she has taken them all on as lovers? There would hardly be room for them all."

"I know that watery-eyed whore for what she is," responded Chin-lien. "What with her short stature, she's no bigger than half a brick, and when she squeezes those eyes of hers, you could almost scoop the liquid out of them with a spoon. She's nothing but a crazy whore, just like that overgrown pumpkin head of a whore, the wife of Han Tao-kuo. I don't know but what I'd rather scratch my eyes out than have to contemplate the likes of her."

As they were speaking, who should appear but Hsiao-yü, who came in and said, "My mistress is calling for you, Fifth Lady. Your mother, Old Mrs. P'an, has arrived and needs you to pay the cost of her sedan chair."

"I've been standing here all this time," responded Chin-lien. "When did she come in?"

"The old lady entered through the enclosed passageway," said Ch'in-t'ung, "and I escorted her inside. The bearers who brought her want six candareens of silver."

"Where would I get the silver from?" said Chin-lien. "Whoever heard of anyone coming by sedan chair without bringing the money to pay the fare?"

She then went back to the rear compound to see her mother but did not give her the money for the fare, saying, "I don't have it."

"You can give your mother a mace of silver," said Yüeh-niang, "and enter it in your account book for the household expenses."

"I can't touch that money," said Chin-lien. "It is provided by our husband in definite amounts to purchase provisions for the household. He wouldn't want me to spend it on sedan chair fares."

They sat there for a while, merely staring at each other with wide-open eyes, while the sedan chair bearers outside pressed for the fare so they could leave. Finally, Meng Yü-lou, seeing that they had reached an impasse, groped a mace of silver out of her sleeve and took care of sending the sedan chair on its way.

Before long, Sister-in-law Wu, Wu the Second's wife, and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery arrived, and Yüeh-niang provided them with a serving of tea.

Old Mrs. P'an then set out for her daughter's quarters in the front compound, and Chin-lien proceeded to upbraid her severely, saying, "Who asked you to come if you didn't even have enough money to pay for the sedan chair? If you make such a shameful spectacle of yourself, you will only cause people to look down on you."

"My daughter," protested Old Mrs. P'an, "if you refuse me the money to pay for a visit, where am I to get it? It was hard enough for me to come up with the cost of a gift for you."

"You may have expected to get the money from me," said Chin-lien, "but where am I to get it from? If you will only open your eyes, you will see that for every seven outlays, there are eight people waiting to be paid. In the future, if you have the money to pay for a sedan chair, come here to visit; but if you don't have enough money to pay for a sedan chair, don't bother to come. I doubt if his household will feel diminished by the lack of such poor relatives as yourself. Don't risk the retribution of having your face slapped. You've got to be tough like:

Kuan Yü, the God of War, peddling his bean curd:
The man is hard, even though his goods are not.⁴²

I'm sick and tired of having to listen to people shooting off their cunts about me behind my back. The other day, merely because you went home earlier than she expected, I ended up getting into:

A vituperative altercation, with the First Lady. If you knew how it is for me, you'd shut up.

The droppings of a donkey may be shiny enough on the outside;⁴³
But you are quite unaware of how messy
they are on the inside."

With these few remarks she managed to reduce Old Mrs. P'an to a state of:

Sobbing and wailing,
as she broke out in tears.

"Mother," Ch'un-mei protested, "whatever has induced you to find fault with your old lady this way today?"

So saying, she helped the old woman onto the k'ang in the inner room and hastened to pour her a serving of tea. Old Mrs. P'an was so exasperated that all she could do was lie down on the k'ang and go to sleep. Only when someone from the rear compound came to invite her to join Sister-in-law Wu for a meal did she get up and go back to the rear compound.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had returned home from the yamen and was about to sit down for a meal in the master suite, when Tai-an suddenly came in with a calling card and said, "His Honor Ching Chung has been promoted to the post of commander-general of the Southeast and has come to pay his respects."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing looked at the card he saw that it read, "Respectfully indited with his compliments by the newly promoted commander-general of the Southeast, and concurrently grain transport commander, Regional Commander Ching Chung."

This threw Hsi-men Ch'ing into such consternation that he ordered the dining table to be removed, hastened to don his formal garments, including his official cap and girdle, and went out to welcome his guest. What should he see but Commander-General Ching Chung, wearing a crimson robe emblazoned with a mandarin square featuring a ch'i-lin, and a gold-buckled girdle, followed by a retinue of subordinates and soldiers. Hsi-men Ch'ing ushered him into the large reception hall, where they exchanged the customary amenities and then sat down in the positions of guest and host.

Tea was served, and after it was finished, Ching Chung said, "The rescript confirming my promotion only arrived the other day, and before even formally assuming office, I have come to express my gratitude to you, venerable sir."

"Venerable commander," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you are to be congratulated on your illustrious promotion. Talents as great as yours are sure to be put to significant use."

It is only natural, and redounds to the credit of the rest of us. It is appropriate that we should offer our congratulations."

Going on to say, "Please loosen your respected garments, and sit down for something to eat," he ordered his attendants to set up a table.

Ching Chung repeatedly expressed his thanks, saying, "Your pupil must inform you, venerable sir, that I have not yet gone to pay my respects anywhere else and have a great many insignificant tasks to attend to. Allow me to come seek your instruction another day."

So saying, he got up to go, but Hsi-men Ch'ing would not have it and proceeded to order his attendants to come forward and take his outer garments, wipe off the table, and provide it with wine and food.

Animal-shaped briquettes smolder,
Heat-holding drapes are suspended.
Golden flagons decant jade hued liquids,
Turquoise goblets contain Yang-kao wine.

Just as the wine was being poured, who should appear but Cheng Ch'un and Wang Hsiang, the two boy actors, who came in, knelt down before them, and kowtowed.

"Why are the two of you so late?" inquired Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"And what is the name of this other fellow?" he asked Cheng Ch'un.

"His name is Wang Hsiang," said Cheng Ch'un, "and he is the younger brother of Wang Chu."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then told them, "Get out your instruments and come play and sing for the entertainment of His Honor Ching Chung."

In no time at all, when the two boy actors had readied their instruments, they proceeded to perform the song suite the first number of which, to the tune "Flowers in Brocade," begins with the words:

The fair weather is balmy.⁴⁴

As they did so, the attendants brought out two partitioned food boxes filled with pastries and refreshments, and two bottles of wine, for the people that had come with Ching Chung.

"This will never do," said Ching Chung. "Your pupil is the recipient of your magnanimity, and my servants are also to enjoy the bestowal of refreshments."

What can I do to be worthy of such largess?"

So saying, he ordered his servants to come forward and kowtow.

"In a few days," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "my wife plans, with the utmost sincerity, to invite your honorable spouse to attend a party in order to enjoy the lanterns. It is our humble hope that she will condescend to come. Those she plans to invite include your venerable lady, my kinsman Chang Kuan's wife, my colleague Ho Yung-shou's wife, and two other female relatives of ours. No one else has been invited."

"Upon receipt of your venerable lady's invitation," said Ching Chung, "my humble spouse will be sure to attend."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then inquired, "How is it that the venerable Commandant Chou Hsiu has not yet received a promotion?"

"I have heard," replied Ching Chung, "that in the third month Chou Hsiu will be promoted to a position in the Capital Training Divisions."

"That seems appropriate," remarked Hsi-men Ch'ing.

After sitting for a while, Ching Chung said goodbye and got up to go. Hsi-men Ch'ing escorted him to the gate and looked on as he mounted his horse and departed, with his attendants shouting to clear the way.

That evening, they celebrated the eve of P'an Chin-lien's birthday. The boy actors played their instruments and sang to entertain the company in the rear reception hall. When everyone had been provided with wine, Hsi-men Ch'ing got up and went out to Chin-lien's quarters, while Yüeh-niang, along with Sister-in-law Wu, Old Mrs. P'an, the professional singer Big Sister Yü, and the two nuns sat down in the master suite to enjoy their wine.

P'an Chin-lien accompanied Hsi-men Ch'ing to her quarters, where she set out more wine and personally proffered him a drink and kowtowed to him. After a while, Old Mrs. P'an came in, and Chin-lien packed her off to Li P'ing-erh's quarters to spend the night, while she kept Hsi-men Ch'ing company, drinking wine and enjoying themselves, as they went on to play with each other.

To resume our story, when Old Mrs. P'an arrived in Li P'ing-erh's quarters next door, Ju-i and Ying-ch'un invited her to sit down on the heated k'ang. On her way in, Old Mrs. P'an noticed that before Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet in the parlor there were arrayed candied effigies of Buddhist lions, immortals, and the Five Ancients; tree-borne fresh fruits such as tangerines, pomegranates, apples, and snow pears; steamed-shortcake pastries, crullers, and fried dough twists. A brazier was burning powdered incense, and a candle was lit in the long-lasting vigil lamp. The table was shrouded in a gold lamé tablecloth, and beside it there hung her half-length portrait, dressed in a crimson brocaded gown, a brocade skirt and embroidered jacket, and a chignon decorated with two phoenixes, from whose beaks dangled bangles on ropes of pearls.

Stepping forward, she saluted the portrait in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "Sister, you are blessed in having ascended to Heaven."

Then, after sitting down on the k'ang, she said to Ju-i and Ying-ch'un, "Your mistress is lucky to have a husband who has gone to such lengths to insure her salvation, and in being the recipient of such lavish offerings. It is more than ample. She is fortunate indeed."

"Recently," said Ju-i, "on the occasion of the 'hundredth-day' ceremony after our mistress's death, though you were invited to attend, you failed to come. Hua Tzu-yu's wife from outside the city wall and Sister-in-law Wu were both here. Twelve Taoist acolytes came to perform the scripture recitation, and there was:

Loud playing on wind and percussion instruments.

What with the flag-raising ceremony to invite the presence of the gods, and the Water and Fire sublimation ritual, night had fallen before they left."

"With the New Year's festivities so close at hand," explained Old Mrs. P'an, "and the child I am taking care of at home, if I had come, there would have been no one to look after the place. So I chose not to come. Why have I not seen Aunt Yang here today?"

"You must not have heard about it yet," said Ju-i, "but Aunt Yang finally died of sickness and old age so she also was unable to come for our mistress's 'hundredth-day' scripture-reading ceremony. The ladies of our household all went to the northern quarter of the city to offer their sacrifices to the deceased."

"How sad," exclaimed Old Mrs. P'an. "She was older than I am, but I didn't know that she had died. No wonder I didn't see her today."

After they had talked about Aunt Yang for a while, Ju-i said, "We have some sweet wine on hand. Why don't you try some of it?"

She then turned to Ying-ch'un and said, "Sister, set up a bed table on the k'ang, and pour out some sweet wine so Old Mrs. P'an can have a cup of it."

In no time at all, the wine was provided, and as they were drinking it, Old Mrs. P'an brought up the subject of Li P'ing-erh again, saying, "Your mistress was a good person. She was both kind and just, and she had a warm disposition. Whenever I came here, she never treated me as a stranger, but always provided me with hot tea and hot water, and only objected if I didn't drink them. At night she would sit up and talk to me, and when I was ready to go home, she would always wrap something up to take with me. I swear, she never let me depart empty-handed. Not to deceive the two of you, this cape I am wearing right now is something your mistress gave me. This perverse daughter of mine, on the other hand, has never come up with so much as half a broken needle for me.⁴⁵ I am not lying when I state before Amitābha Buddha himself that even if:

I had neither water nor rice to eat,⁴⁶

if she were willing to cough up so much as a mace of silver for me, my eyeballs would drop onto the ground. When your mistress gave me anything, she would accuse me of being:

Mean-spirited and covetous, hankering after other people's possessions. Today, for example, with regard to the fare for the sedan chair I came in, though you have a large amount of silver at your disposal, were you willing to cough up a few candareens on my behalf, or what? Instead, you just clenched your teeth and denied that you had any money to spare, so that, in the end, the Lady from the west side of the rear compound had to come up with a mace of silver to take care of the bearers of the sedan chair, and send them on their way. And when we returned to her quarters, she upbraided me severely, saying, 'In the future, if you have the money to pay for a sedan chair, go ahead and come; but if you don't have enough money to pay for a sedan chair, you had better not cross my doorstep.' When I leave this time, I won't come back. Who wants to come here only to become a target for her anger? Let her do as she pleases. No doubt there are many hard-hearted people in this world, but none of them is a match for this death-bound short-life of a daughter of mine. You two pay heed to what I say. Should I die, in the future, what with her refusal to take anyone's advice, who knows what sort of a harvest she will reap for herself. You ought to remember how, after your father died when you were only six years old, I have continued to care for you right up to the present. How I taught you to do needlework while you were still a child. How I sent you to a girls' school in the home of Licentiate Yü. How I made sure that you had:

Compressed hands and bound feet.⁴⁷

You have always been just as smart as can be, which has made it possible for you to arrive at your present state. But now, she orders her mother around, this way and that, without giving her so much as a glance."

"So the Fifth Lady went to school as a child, did she?" said Ju-i. "No wonder, now that you mention it, she is as literate as she is."

"She started to a girls' school when she was six years old," said Old Mrs. P'an, "and attended it for three years. While there, she learned to trace characters from books of sample calligraphy, so there are hardly any characters in the printed copies of poetry, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies that she doesn't know."

As they were speaking, they heard the sound of knocking at the postern gate, and Ju-i said, "I wonder who it could be knocking at the gate?"

She then turned to Hsiu-ch'un and said, "Second Sister, go see who it is."

Hsiu-ch'un came back and reported, "It's Sister Ch'un-mei who has come."

At this, Ju-i hastily squeezed the hand of Old Mrs. P'an and said, "You'd better watch what you say. Ch'un-mei is here."

"I understand," said Old Mrs. P'an. "She could be said to share a leg with that perverse daughter of mine."

What should they see at this juncture but Ch'un-mei, who came in sporting a cloud-shaped chignon with turquoise ornaments on her head, a gold-spangled pearl headband, a blue satin jacket that opened down the middle, over a yellow cotton skirt, gold lantern earrings, and a sable muffler.

Upon coming in and seeing that they were drinking wine with Old Mrs. P'an, she said, "I see that Granny hasn't gone to bed yet. I've come to visit with her."

Ju-i offered her a seat, and Ch'un-mei hoisted up her skirt and proceeded to park her posterior on the k'ang. Ying-ch'un sat down next to her on one side, while Ju-i sat to her right by the head of the k'ang, and Old Mrs. P'an sat in the middle.

"Have your master and mistress gone to bed yet, or not?" asked Old Mrs. P'an.

"They finished drinking just now," said Ch'un-mei, "and I have sent the two of them off to bed. I have come over here to visit with you, Granny, and have several delicacies and a flagon of wine to share with you."

She then asked Hsiu-ch'un, "Would you go next door and tell Ch'iu-chü to bring them over here? I have already prepared them."

Hsiu-ch'un, accordingly, went next door to fetch them and came back in no time at all, with Ch'iu-chü carrying a square box containing the delicacies, while she brought a pewter pitcher of Chin-hua wine.

Ch'un-mei then ordered Ch'iu-chü, "You go back to our place and keep your ears open. If they should call for me, come back here and let me know."

Ch'iu-chü went back as she was told, but with a pout on her lips.

The repast was duly laid out on the bed table that had been placed on the k'ang. It consisted of roast duck, ham, smoked goose, marinated fish in a fine mash, nut kernels, savory preserved fruits, seafood, and so forth, covering the entire table surface. Hsiu-ch'un closed the postern gate and then came in and sat down beside them. Thereupon, when the wine had been poured, Ch'un-mei first offered a cup to Old Mrs. P'an, and then a cup to Ju-i, and a cup to Ying-ch'un. Hsiu-ch'un sat down on the edge of the k'ang, and the five of them proceeded to enjoy their drinks.

Ch'un-mei, protecting her clothes with a napkin, selected morsels from each of the dishes and offered them to Old Mrs. P'an and the rest, saying, "Granny, these are all special delicacies. Feel free to sample them."

"Sister," the old woman responded, "I'll help myself."

She then went on to say, "Even your mistress has never gone to the trouble to entertain me in the way you are doing. Sister, you possess a heart that is:

Concerned for the bereft and kind to the aged.

In the future, you will surely be able:

Step by step,⁴⁸

to better your condition. That perverse daughter of mine, on the other hand, is utterly lacking in humanity and righteousness. On more than one occasion, when she has been acting outrageously, and I have attempted to remonstrate with her, she has turned her wrath against me and caused me to lose face. This morning, as you saw for yourself, Sister, I came to visit in the hope of picking up a few morsels of cold food, and she once again treated me as badly as she did."

"Granny," said Ch'un-mei:

"You only see one side of it,

Without perceiving the other."⁴⁹

It is the disposition of my mistress to:

Contend for supremacy without conceding defeat."⁵⁰

She cannot be compared to the Sixth Lady, who had a fortune at her disposal, while she has no money of her own. You allege that she refuses to give you anything. Others may not know the true story, but I do. Although Father has entrusted her with the silver for household expenses, which is stored in her quarters, my mistress does not presume to regard it as her own. When she needs to buy costume jewelry or things like that for herself, she is meticulous about asking him for them up front, rather than:

Surreptitiously acquiring things on the sly,⁵¹

thereby causing people to look down on her, and making it hard for her to open her mouth and accuse anyone else of anything. Since she really has no money of her own, for you to hold it against her, Granny, is unjust. You may accuse me of endeavoring to excuse her conduct, but one must be just about it."

"You are wrong to hold it against the Fifth Lady," said Ju-i. "It has always been true that:

Relatives are one's own flesh and blood.

If the Fifth Lady had any money of her own, were she not to show her filiality by sharing it with you, Granny, whom should she lavish it upon? As the sayings have it:

Before beating a child one should regard it's mother's face.

Even a thousand peach blossoms may stem from a single tree."⁵²

In the future, when the day comes when your:

Yellow gold is stored in the coffer,

the Fifth Lady will be bereft of any close relatives, like the rest of us whose mothers have died.”

The old woman responded, “As for me:

I’ve lived to this year, but not the next.

Who knows whether:

I’ll succumb today, or succumb tomorrow?

I won’t hold it against her any longer.”

Ch’un-mei, upon seeing that the old woman, after consuming two goblets of wine, was becoming more loquacious, said to Ying-ch’un, “Go get the dice-box. Let’s throw the dice and amuse ourselves by playing at ‘Competing for the Red.’”

In no time at all, a dicebox with forty dice in it was brought out, and Ch’unmei proceeded to play a game with Ju-i. After they had played for a while, she went on to play with Ying-ch’un. The losers of each round had to down large goblets of wine.

What with:

First a cup for you,

Then a goblet for me,

it was not long before they:

Felt the effects of the Bamboo Leaf wine, and

Peach blossoms bloomed upon their cheeks,⁵³ as they polished off the entire pewter pitcher of wine. Ying-ch’un then produced half a jar of Ma-ku wine, and they managed to finish it as well. As the time approached the second watch, Old Mrs. P’an could not hold out any longer and took to:

Swaying forwards and backwards, as she started to doze off. Only then did the party break up.

Ch’un-mei headed back next door and gave the postern gate a push. When it opened, she proceeded through the courtyard and found that Ch’iu-chü was situated on a wide bench in the parlor, next to a crack in the wooden partition, eavesdropping on Hsi-men Ch’ing and Chin-lien as they engaged in sexual intercourse in the bedroom in order to hear what noises they produced and what exclamations they uttered.

She was so preoccupied that she failed to prevent Ch’un-mei from coming right up to her and giving her a slap on the cheek with all her strength, saying as she did so, “You lousy dead duck of a slave! Just what are you listening to, for no good reason?”

She hit Ch’iu-chü so hard that she opened her eyes wide and protested, “I was only dozing here. What was I listening to that would justify your slapping me that way?”

Who could have anticipated that this exchange was overheard by the woman in the bedroom, who asked Ch’un-mei who she was talking to.

“There’s nobody here,” replied Ch’un-mei. “I told Ch’iu-chü to close the door, and she failed to respond. That’s all.”

In this way she covered up for Ch’iu-chü, who rubbed her eyes and went to close the door of the room. Ch’un-mei then got onto the k’ang, removed her headdress, and went to sleep. But no more of this. Truly:

Though the oriole wishes to retain the evanescent day;

The unfeeling cuckoo relishes the luster of the night.⁵⁴

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day was P’an Chin-lien’s birthday, and those who were present to celebrate it included the wife of Manager Fu Ming, the wife of Manager Kan Jun, Pen the Fourth’s wife, Ts’ui Pen’s wife Big Sister Tuan, Wu Shun-ch’en’s wife Third Sister Cheng, and Wu the Second’s wife.

Hsi-men Ch’ing, along with Wu K’ai and Ying Po-chüeh:

Straightened his robe and cap;

Assumed a dignified demeanor,⁵⁵

and set out on horseback, with attendants shouting to clear the way, to attend the party at the home of Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou. There were many other officials there that day, and they were entertained by four singing girls and a vaudeville troupe. Commandant Chou Hsiu was also among those present. They continued drinking until evening, when Hsi-men Ch’ing returned home and spent the night with Ju-i in the front compound.

On the tenth, invitations were sent out inviting the wives of the various officials to a party, and Yüeh-niang said to Hsi-men Ch’ing, “For this lantern-viewing party on the twelfth, I suggest that we also invite Meng Yü-lou’s elder sister from outside the city gate and my elder sister to attend, lest they find out about it and resent the fact that they were not invited.”

“It’s a good thing you mentioned it,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, and he told Ch’en Ching-chi to write out two additional invitations and send Ch’in-t’ung to deliver them.

P’an Chin-lien, who was standing nearby, overheard this and was disturbed by it. Going back to her quarters, she pressed Old Mrs. P’an to depart immediately.

When Yüeh-niang learned of this, she said, "Granny, what are you in such a hurry to leave for? Why not stay over another day?"

"Sister," said Chin-lien, "it's the New Year's season, and she has left a child at home with no one to look after her. You had better let her go."

This threw Yüeh-niang into such consternation that she hastily prepared two boxes of delicacies for her, provided her with a mace of silver with which to pay her sedan chair fare, and sent her on her way.

Chin-lien subsequently explained this to Li Chiao-erh, saying, "She's invited her well-to-do elder sister to come to the lantern-viewing party, and that old baggage of mine is only likely to be looked askance at. If I hadn't sent her away, what would be the point of keeping her around here? If she were taken to be a guest, she would not be appropriately dressed. If she were taken to be a charwoman, she doesn't really look the part. It could only have the effect of driving me to my wit's end."

Hsi-men Ch'ing sent Tai-an to deliver another two invitations to Imperial Commissioner Wang's residence, one to invite Lady Lin, and one to invite Wang the Third's wife, née Huang. He also sent to the licensed quarter to engage the services of the four singing girls, Li Kuei-chieh, Wu Yin-erh, Cheng Ai-yüeh, and Hung the Fourth, as well as the three young actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng.

Who could have anticipated that Pen the Fourth should arrive back from the Eastern Capital that day. After washing his face and combing his hair, he dressed himself appropriately and came to kowtow to Hsi-men Ch'ing, presenting him with a letter of reply from Hsia Yen-ling.

"How come you stayed as long as this before returning?" Hsi-men Ch'ing demanded to know.

Pen the Fourth explained that he had been stricken with a severe cold in the capital, saying, "It was not until the second day of the first month that I was able to get my things together and set out for home. His Honor Hsia Yen-ling sends you his compliments and wishes to thank you for all you have done on his behalf."

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave him the keys as before and put him back in charge of his knitting and sewing supplies store. He also opened an adjacent shop in which Wu the Second could continue to sell silk goods. In the future, when the boatload of goods from Sung-chiang arrived, he planned to have it all stored in the house on Lion Street, where Lai-pao could cooperate with the others in selling it. He also told Pen the Fourth to hire a fireworks specialist to come and prepare two racks of fireworks, ready to be set off on the twelfth for the entertainment of their female guests. He had already invited Ying Pochüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Wu K'ai, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh to convene with him in an anteroom during the daylight hours on that occasion.

That evening, who should appear but Ying Po-chüeh, bringing Li the Third with him to see Hsi-men Ch'ing. After first thanking him for the help he had received the other day, and then sitting down to drink his tea, he initiated the conversation by saying, "Brother Li the Third is here because there is a piece of business he would like to propose to you, if you are willing to participate in it."

"Really?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What piece of business is that? Tell me about it."

"At present," responded Li the Third, "a document has come down from the court in the Eastern Capital requiring each of the thirteen provinces in the realm to submit to it several tens of thousands of taels worth of antiquarian relics. This Tung-p'ing prefecture of ours has been allotted a quota of ten thousand taels worth of these antique artifacts. The rescript authorizing this behest is still in the hands of the grand coordinator and has not yet come down to the lower levels of the bureaucracy. At present, Chang the Second of Main Street has put up two hundred taels of silver in a bid to secure this contract, but it will require a total of ten thousand taels in all. I have come, together with Uncle Ying the Second, to broach the subject with Your Honor. If Your Honor is willing to participate, Chang the Second will put up five thousand taels, Your Honor will put up the other five thousand taels, and the two of you can close the deal between you. No one else will be involved but Uncle Ying the Second, myself, and Huang the Fourth on your side, and two of Chang the Second's managers on the other, and the profits will be shared on a ratio of eight to two between the principals and their backers. But I don't know what Your Honor thinks about it."

"What sort of antiquarian relics are involved?" inquired Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"Your Honor may not know about it yet," said Li the Third, "but at present the Emperor has changed the name of the recently completed Mount Ken Imperial Park in the Forbidden City to the Mount Longevity Imperial Park. Within it he has erected numerous pavilions, terraces, halls, and chambers, including the Precious Tablet Temple of Highest Clarity,⁵⁶ the Chamber of the Assembled Perfected, the Hall of Meditative Concentration,⁵⁷ and even the dressing chamber of his favorite, Consort An, née Liu.⁵⁸ He has stocked them with:

Rare birds and unusual animals,⁵⁹

Chou vessels and Shang tripods,⁶⁰

Han censers and Ch'in burners,

The stone drums of King Hsüan,⁶¹

Bronze ladles of various eras,

Immortals' palms,

Dew-catching pans,⁶²

and rare antiques and relics of all kinds.⁶³ He has initiated lavish building projects and expended no insignificant amount in the way of resources."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he said, "Rather than going into partnership with anyone else, why shouldn't I undertake to do it on my own? No doubt you assume that I would be unable to come up with ten or twenty thousand taels of silver."

"If Your Honor wants to take it all on yourself, that would be fine," said Li the Third. "We can keep the other side in the dark about it, and on our side, no one will be involved other than Uncle Ying the Second, Huang the Fourth, and myself."

"Brother," said Ying Po-chüeh, "do you plan to bring in anyone from your household, or not?"

"When he shows up, I'll have Pen the Fourth participate," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "He can do some of the legwork for us."

Hsi-men Ch'ing then went on to ask, "Where is the document authorizing this transaction at present?"

"It is still in the hands of the grand coordinator," said Li the Third, "and has not yet come down to the lower levels of the bureaucracy."

"That shouldn't be a problem," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I'll send someone with a letter, and an appropriate gift, to ask Sung Ch'iao-nien to obtain it for us."

"If Your Honor is going to try to get hold of it," said Li the Third, "the matter will brook no delay. It has always been the case that:

In warfare, speediness of execution is fundamental.⁶⁴

The first one to cook the rice is the first to eat.

I fear that by the time you get to the prefectural yamen, someone else may have gotten hold of it before you."

Hsi-men Ch'ing laughed at this, saying, "I'm not afraid of that. Even if someone should get to the prefectural yamen before me, I would still be able to induce Sung Ch'iao-nien to recover it. The prefect of Tung-p'ing, Hu Shihwen, is also an acquaintance of mine."

Thereupon, he invited Li the Third and Ying Po-chüeh to share a meal with him and promised them, saying, "I will have a letter written now and will send off a servant with it tomorrow."

"There is another problem," said Li the Third. "His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien is making his investigative rounds and is not in Tung-p'ing at present. The day before yesterday, he set out for Yen-chou prefecture to conduct his investigations there."

"You could make the trip to Yen-chou prefecture tomorrow, together with my servant," suggested Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"That would not be a problem," responded Li the Third. "I'll go then. The round trip won't take more than five or six days. Which of your servants does Your Honor intend to send? When we have concluded our plans, and the letter is written, send him over to my place to spend the night, so we can set out early tomorrow morning."

"His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien is not familiar with any of my other servants," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but he has always been fond of Ch'un-hung. I'll have Ch'un-hung and Lai-chüeh, the two of them, go together."

Thereupon, he called the two servants into his presence to meet with Li the Third and instructed them to go spend the night at his place.

"That's the way to do it," remarked Ying Po-chüeh. "This is something that needs to be acted upon as quickly as possible.

Only he with the most talent and swiftest feet can accomplish it."⁶⁵

Thereupon, when he and Li the Third had finished their meal, they took their leave and departed.

Hsi-men Ch'ing, after getting Ch'en Ching-chi to write the letter, also sealed up ten ounces of gold leaf in the packet and entrusted it to Ch'un-hung and Lai-chüeh, saying, "Be careful on the road, and if you succeed in obtaining the document, return immediately. When you get to Yen-chou prefecture, ask His Honor Sung Ch'iao-nien for a note entitling you to pick it up in Tung-p'ing."

"Father, you need not instruct us any further," said Lai-chüeh. "I once worked for Assistant Administration Commissioner Hsü of Yen-chou and will know what to do."

Thereupon, he took the packet containing the letter, secreted it upon his person, and set out with his companion for the house of Li the Third. We will say no more at present about how Lai-chüeh, Ch'un-hung, and Li the Third hired long-distance mounts early on the morning of the eleventh and set out for Yen-chou prefecture.

To resume our story, on the twelfth, Hsi-men Ch'ing's family had invited the wives of the various officials to a party, and he chose to remain at home without going out. He had already invited Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh, the four of them, to join him in the summerhouse that evening to enjoy the lanterns and drink wine together. The troupe of actors that he had arranged to engage from Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, showed up that morning, carrying their box of costumes, and set up an anteroom in the front compound as their green room. When the female guests arrived, they beat on bronze gongs and bronze drums to welcome them.

Commandant Chou Hsiu's wife was suffering from an eye ailment and was thus unable to come, though she sent someone to explain the situation. The wife of Commander-General Ching Chung, the wife of Militia Commander Chang Kuan, the wife of Commander Yün Li-shou, along with Ch'iao Hung's wife, Ts'ui Pen's mother, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, and Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, were the first to arrive. Only Ho Yung-shou's wife, Wang the Third's mother Lady Lin, and Wang the Third's wife had not yet come, and Hsi-men Ch'ing sent an orderly, along with Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung, back and forth two or three times, urging them to come. He also sent Auntie Wen to the household of Imperial Commissioner Wang for the same end.

At noontime, Lady Lin arrived in a large sedan chair, followed by a smaller one, and asked to pay her respects to Hsi-men Ch'ing, who inquired, "Why has Wang the Third's wife not come?"

"My son is not at home," replied Lady Lin, "so there is no one to look after the place."

After paying her respects, she withdrew to the rear compound.

It was well after noon before Ho Yung-shou's wife finally arrived, riding in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers, with a servant's wife riding in a smaller sedan chair behind her, and accompanied by orderlies carrying her dressing case, as well as two servants in black livery, trotting close beside the carrying poles. Only after being borne past the second gate did she deign to get out of her sedan chair, to the welcoming music of drums, and wind and percussion instruments, as Wu Yüeh-niang and her sister wives came out to the ceremonial gate to receive her.

Hsi-men Ch'ing had concealed himself in the anteroom on the western side of the courtyard and let down the blinds, so that he could gaze at her surreptitiously. Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, was no more than nineteen years old. She was:

Tall and slender in stature, and was made up so that she looked to be:
Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.
On her head:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles,
Phoenix feathers emerged in pairs.

She was wearing a full-sleeved crimson jacket, adorned with a variegated motif of the four animals representing the cardinal directions paying homage to the ch'i-lin, her waist was encircled with a girdle featuring a plaque of green jade inlaid with gold, beneath which she wore a skirt of blue brocade, hanging from which decorative pendants tinkled, exuding the scent of musk and orchid. Behold:

Her image is captivating;⁶⁶
Her demeanor is delicate.⁶⁷
By nature, she is as clever as can be;
Her height is neither short nor tall.
Delicately curved, her two moth eyebrows,⁶⁸
Extend to her temples;
With a flutter, her pair of phoenix eyes,
Glance back and forth.
Her captivating voice is like that of an oriole singing in the sun;
Her lissome waist reminds one of willow fronds tossed in the wind.

Truly:

Although born amid quantities of silk and gauze,
She opts to avoid the trappings of luxury;
Though raised amid piles of pearls and trinkets,
She adorns herself with elegant simplicity.
The flowering crab apples are in full bloom,
But she does not ask how many blossomed overnight;
The willow catkins are scattered everywhere,
But she is unaware of the spring season's advance.
The only one who knows anything of her true feelings,
Is the bright moon that penetrates her gauze windows;
The only thing that affects the content of her heart,
Is the clear breeze that flutters her brocade drapes.⁶⁹
Lightly moving her lotus feet,
She is alluring as an immortal from the Palace of Clustered Pearls;
Gently lifting her beige skirt,
She has the bearing of the Bodhisattva
Kuan-yin of the Water Moon.⁷⁰

Truly:

She is like a bloom that can converse;
She is like jade that emits fragrance.⁷¹

If Hsi-men Ch'ing had not seen her, that would have been that; but having seen her:

His ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and
His material souls fled to the Nine Heavens.
Even without any physical contact,
He had already forfeited his soul.

It did not take long for Yüeh-niang and the others to usher her into the parlor in the rear compound where, after they had exchanged the customary amenities, she asked to be introduced to Hsi-men Ch'ing. This was just the signal he had been waiting for, and he hastily adjusted his formal attire and came in to present himself to her. It seemed to him just as though:

A tree of jade in a forest of alabaster had descended into the world;
The Goddess of Witches' Mountain had emerged in the subcelestial realm.

Hsi-men Ch'ing:

Bent his body to perform an obeisance.
His heart was agitated and his eyes disturbed,

to such an extent that:

He was unable to control himself.

When they had finished paying their respects to each other, Yüeh-niang invited her guests into the summerhouse where tables had been set up for tea, and an assortment of exotic viands had been provided; after which they took their places in the large reception hall, where:

Rare delicacies from land and sea, were already arrayed.

Behold:

At the head of the room,
There stand Shih Ch'ung's brocade windbreak⁷² and folding screens;
On all four sides,
There are tortoiseshell mats and capacious
table settings.
Decorated lanterns are raised on high;
Colorful ropes are suspended in midair.
From the carved rafters brocaded
bands droop low;
Painted candles throw light upon jeweled canopies.
Lanterns depicting fish and dragons sporting in the mountains,
Scintillate like a cluster of pearls;
Others depicting halls and chambers,
towers and terraces,
Gather like a thousand balls of jade.
On the left,
The nine older and ten younger sisters,
Are depicted as portraits of beauties⁷³
in red and green;
On the right,
The nine stars and eight grotto heavens,
Are seen with their gods and immortals in gold and azure.
The food provided consists of,
Dragons' livers and phoenix marrow,
Bears' paws and dromedaries' humps;
The music performed is that of,
Patterned cithara, silver psaltery,
Phoenix flute, and ivory clarinet.
The resounding beat of alligator drums
startles the flying birds;
The melodious sound of singing voices diverts the moving clouds.
The alluring beauties at the feast,
Are like clustering pearls and kingfisher ornaments;
The entertainers beneath the steps,

Enact life's partings and reunions, sorrows and joys.⁷⁴
Truly, it is the case that:

The maidservants proffering wine are duplicates of the Goddess of the Lo River;⁷⁵
The serving girls presenting soup are replicas of Ch'ang-o, the Goddess of the Moon.⁷⁶

On this occasion, when Lady Lin had taken her seat at the feast, the hsi-wen drama Hsiao T'ien-hsiang pan-yeh ch'ao-yüan, or Little Heavenly Fragrance Ascends to Paradise at Midnight,⁷⁷ was performed. After the first two scenes had been acted, the players withdrew, and the four singing girls, Li Kueichieh, Wu Yin-erh, Cheng Ai-yüeh, and Hung the Fourth, came out to play their musical instruments and sing for the entertainment of the company. Because Meng Yü-lou's elder sister resided outside the city gate, she was the first to get up to go, and in order to see her off they sang the song suite in celebration of the Lantern Festival that begins with the tune "Drunk in the Flowers' Shade," the first line of which is:

Decorative embroidered lanterns are suspended in midair.⁷⁸

Meanwhile, Hsi-men Ch'ing was drinking in the summerhouse with Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh, while the three boy actors, Li Ming, Wu Hui, and Cheng Feng, played their instruments and sang for their entertainment. From time to time, he left the others and peered into the large reception hall through the latticework. The servants and attendants who had accompanied the sedan chairs of the female guests were supplied with food and wine in the front reception hall, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Gentle reader take note:

Only at intervals is the bright moon full;
The variegated clouds are easily dispersed.
When joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow;
The nadir will be followed by the zenith.
This is a self-evident principle.

Hsi-men Ch'ing was only bent on:

Competing for prestige and usurping profit,⁷⁹
Indulging his desires and slaking his lust.

He was utterly oblivious to the fact that, since:

The Way of Heaven is inimical to excess,⁸⁰
The recorders of Hell were on his heels,
And the hour of his death was impending.⁸¹

That evening, as the lanterns in the chamber were lit, and the boy actors sang songs in celebration of the Lantern Festival, even before the first watch began, Hsi-men Ch'ing, while sitting in the presence of his guests, began to snore loudly as he dozed off.

Ying Po-chüeh continued:

Gaming at forfeits and playing at guess-fingers, and pestered him, saying, "Brother, you don't seem to be in high spirits today. How is it that you keep dozing off this way?"

"I didn't get enough sleep yesterday," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I don't know why, but today I don't seem to have any energy, and keep dozing off."

When the four singing girls came in from entertaining the ladies, Ying Pochüeh told two of them to sing Lantern Festival songs, and the other two to serve the wine. Thereupon, Hung the Fourth and Cheng Ai-yüeh accompanied themselves on the psaltery and the balloon guitar as they sang for them, while Wu Yin-erh and Li Kuei-chieh served the wine.

Just as they were enjoying themselves to the full, Tai-an suddenly came in and announced that Lady Lin and Ho Yung-shou's wife were preparing to leave. Hsi-men Ch'ing promptly withdrew from the gathering and, concealing himself in the dark shadows, made his way to the second gate in order to catch a surreptitious view of them as they got into their sedan chairs.

Yüeh-ning and the others escorted them as far as the front courtyard to watch the setting off of the fireworks. Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, had on a jacket of crimson brocade, a sable cloak, and a skirt of kingfisher-blue brocade. Lady Lin wore a white satin jacket, a sable cloak, and a crimson skirt, with gold bracelets and jade bangles. Their attendants, carrying lanterns, clustered around them as they got into their sedan chairs and made their departure.

As for Hsi-men Ch'ing, truly:

Though his hungry eyes were about to burst,⁸²
He could only swallow his thirsting saliva,⁸³

and could hardly wait to begin an affair with her. Having watched Ho Yung-shou's wife, née Lan, depart, he was quietly making his way inside through the enclosed passageway when:

Without coincidences there would be no stories;
Predestined unions have a way of happening;
Strange as it may seem,

he could not have anticipated that Lai-chüeh's wife, Hui-yüan, on seeing that the female guests had left, was coming back up front in order to open the door to her quarters, when she happened to run right into Hsi-men Ch'ing and had no way of avoiding him.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch'ing had already observed the natural seductiveness of Lai-chüeh's wife and had long since set his sights on her. Although she was not quite as attractive as Lai-wang's wife, Sung Hui-lien, she was more than adequate as a substitute. Thereupon, exhilarated by the wine he had consumed, he embraced her with both arms, stepped into her quarters with her, and proceeded to kiss her. Originally, this woman had worked for Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, but she had engaged in hanky-panky with her master, which caused such an uproar in his household that she was driven out. On this day, confronted with an opportunity to pursue the same path, she saw no reason to refuse. There and then, she responded by sticking her tongue into Hsi-men Ch'ing's mouth, and the two of them proceeded to unfasten their clothing and let down their pants. Lying down on the edge of the k'ang and raising her legs, she allowed Hsi-men Ch'ing to thrust away at her until he might well have ejaculated:

Is it not delightful?

Truly:

Failing to consummate his assignation
with Ts'ui Ying-ying;
He settled for a tryst with Hung-niang
to relieve his lust.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The competing lusters of lanterns and moon⁸⁴
bathe the jade flagon;
Their clear rays of light serve separately to illuminate Lü-chu.⁸⁵
Protest not that the gentleman already has a wife of his own;
He is tempted, beneath the mulberry trees,
to seek out Lo-fu.⁸⁶

Chapter 79

HSI-MEN CH'ING IN HIS SEXUAL INDULGENCE INCURS AN ILLNESS; WU YÜEH-NIANG BEARS A CHILD UPON THE DEATH OF HER HUSBAND

Even the kindest of men are seldom able to maintain consistency;
Be careful, whatever you do, never to say,
"It doesn't matter."
Those who always strive for precedence resort to evil devices;
Words that are uttered in due turn have a more enduring savor.
A surfeit of tasty foodstuffs will end up making you sick;
Pleasurable events, once over, are sure to result in disaster.
Rather than having to seek for medicine
after you are sick;
It would be better to take preventive steps before falling ill.¹

THESE EIGHT LINES of poetry are by Shao Yung. Their message is that:

The Way of Heaven ensures fortune for the good;²
Both ghosts and spirits are inimical to excess.
Those whose conduct is good will be rewarded with a hundred blessings;
Those whose conduct is evil will be rewarded with a hundred disasters.³

Hsi-men Ch'ing only knew how to:

Defile the wife and children of another,⁴ but remained:

Unaware that his own death was imminent.

That day, after encountering Lai-chüeh's wife in the enclosed passageway and committing adultery with her, he went back to the summerhouse and continued drinking with Wu K'ai, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh.

The wife of Commander-General Ching Chung, the wife of Militia Commander Chang Kuan, Ch'iao Hung's wife, Ts'ui Pen's mother, Wu Yüeh-niang's elder sister, Wu K'ai's wife, and Big Sister Tuan remained for some time. It was only after the Lantern Festival dumplings had been served that they prepared to go, said their farewells, got into their sedan chairs, and departed. Wu K'ai's wife and Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third Sister Cheng, accompanied each other on the way home. Ch'en Ching-chi sent off the troupe of actors from the household of Wang the Second, the distaff relative of the imperial family, with two taels of silver as remuneration for their performance, after seeing that they were provided with food and wine. The four singing girls, and the boy actors, were still in the summerhouse meanwhile, where they continued to play their musical instruments, sing, and pour wine for the company.

Ying Po-chüeh said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Brother, tomorrow is Hua Tzu-yu's birthday. Have you sent a present to him, or not?"

"I sent something to him this morning," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Tai-an said, "Hua Tzu-yu's household has already sent Lai-ting to us with an invitation for the occasion."

"Brother," asked Ying Po-chüeh, "are you going to go tomorrow, or not? I can come over and go with you."

"I'll have to see how I feel tomorrow," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Actually, you'd better go ahead on your own, and I'll follow when I feel up to it."

After serving a round of wine, the four singing girls went back to the rear compound, and Li Ming and the other boy actors came forward to play their instruments and sing for the company. Hsi-men Ch'ing, meanwhile, was constantly dozing off on his chair.

Observing this, Wu K'ai said, "Brother-in-law, you have been wearing yourself out for days on end. Enough is enough. We had better bid you farewell."

Thereupon, they got up to go, but Hsi-men Ch'ing held them back and insisted on their resuming their seats. It was not until the second watch that the party broke up. Hsi-men Ch'ing saw off the four singing girls in their sedan chairs and then rewarded Li Ming and the other two boy actors with two large goblets of wine apiece and gave them six mace of silver for their performance.

As they were about to go out the gate, he called Li Ming back and said to him, "On the fifteenth, I'm going to invite His Honor Chou Hsiu, His Honor Ching Chung, and His Honor Ho Yung-shou to a party. Would you, as soon as possible, engage the services of four singing girls for the occasion on my behalf? It is important that you not be remiss about it."

Li Ming knelt down before him and inquired, "Father, which four do you want?"

Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "Fan Pai-chia-nu, Ch'in Yü-chih, that Feng Chin-pao who sang the other day at His Honor Ho Yung-shou's place, and Lü Sai-erh. Do your best to engage them for me."

Li Ming assented, saying, "I understand," and then kowtowed and departed.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing went back to Yüeh-niang's room in the rear compound, she said to him, "Today, at the party, Lady Lin and Ching Chung's wife really enjoyed each others' company and stayed quite late before going home. Ching Chung's wife also expressed to me her thanks for the support you have rendered her husband, saying:

'Whatever benefit he may obtain,

He will never dare to forget it.'

Next month he is going to report to the Huai River region to take charge of speeding up the grain transport system."

She then went on to say, "His Honor Ho Yung-shou's wife also had a lot to drink today. She took a liking to Sister Six, who took her into the garden to see the artificial hill. All of the guests today gave generous gifts to the singing girls."

When they had finished talking, Hsi-men Ch'ing chose to spend the night there in the master suite.

In the middle of the night, Yüeh-niang had a dream which she described to Hsi-men Ch'ing the next morning, saying, "No doubt it was because I had noticed the robe of crimson velvet that Lady Lin was wearing at the party, but during the night I dreamed that you had taken a robe of crimson velvet out of Li P'ing-erh's trunk and given it to me to wear, when Sister P'an the Sixth grabbed it away from me and put it on herself. This really annoyed me, and I said to her, 'You have already demanded her fur coat for yourself, and now you are taking this robe as well.' At which, in a fit of temper, she tore a large hole in the robe, which caused me to get into a shouting match with her that woke me up. To my surprise, it turned out to be nothing but:

A dream of the Southern Branch."

"When you woke up," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "you were cursing angrily. It's not important. I'll find one like it for you to wear in the future, that's all. It has always been true that:

Dreams are produced by what is on your mind."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing got up the next day, his head felt heavy, and he did not feel well enough to go to the yamen. After combing his hair and washing his face, he put on his clothes and went out to his studio in the front compound, where he sat down and warmed himself at the brazier. Who should appear at this juncture but Yü-hsiao, who had gone over to Ju-i's room that morning and had her squeeze out half a cup of milk, which she brought to the studio for Hsi-men Ch'ing to take with his medicine. She found Hsi-men Ch'ing reclining on the bed while Wang Ching pummeled his thighs for him. On seeing Yü-hsiao come in, Wang Ching withdrew. After she had helped him to take his medicine, Hsi-men Ch'ing gave her a pair of gold-plated hairpins and four silver-coated pewter rings and told her to deliver them to the quarters of Lai-chüeh's wife. When Yü-hsiao heard her master send her on this mission, it reminded her of the affair of Lai-wang's wife, and being quick to:

Stick her head into any cranny, she tucked them into her sleeve and went off on her errand.

Having delivered the objects, she came back to report to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "She accepted them and said that she would kowtow to you on another day."

Taking the empty cup with her, she went back to the master suite, where Yüeh-niang asked her, "If Father has already taken his medicine, what is he doing in his studio?"

"He didn't say," responded Yü-hsiao.

"You should heat up some congee for him," Yüeh-niang told her, but when breakfast time had come and gone, he had not yet returned.

It so happens that Wang Ching had delivered a package of gifts from his sister Wang Liu-erh, which he handed to Hsi-men Ch'ing to look at, and extended her invitation for him to visit her at home. When Hsi-men Ch'ing opened the paper wrapping, he found a lock of her dark-black glossy hair, bound into a circlet with variegated satin displaying the motif of "joined hearts," and with two brocade straps attached to it, so that it could be fastened around the root of his chowrie handle. It was a work of exquisite craftsmanship. In addition, there was a wallet with two pockets, decorated with a pair of mandarin ducks, with a diapered border of close-stitched embroidered brocade, and filled with melon seeds. Hsi-men Ch'ing admired them for some time and was utterly delighted. Eventually, he put the wallet in the bookcase and tucked the brocade circlet into his sleeve.

Just as he was lost in thought, Wu Yüeh-niang suddenly came in. Lifting aside the portiere, she saw that he was lying on the bed, while Wang Ching knelt beside him, pummeling his thighs.

"Why do you insist on staying here in the front compound," she said, "instead of coming back to our quarters, where your congee is waiting for you? Tell me what's going on. How are you feeling, that you seem to be so lethargic?"

"I don't know why," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I'm feeling out of sorts, and I'm suffering from pain in the thighs."

"I imagine it must be due to the advent of spring," said Yüeh-niang. "Take your medicine, and go easy on your way back."

Having induced him to return to the master suite, and fed him his congee, she said, "During a major festival like this, you had better pluck up your spirits. Today is the birthday of Hua Tzu-yu, who resides outside the city wall, and he has invited you to pay him a visit. You can summon Ying the Second to go with you.”

“He’s not at home,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “He’s already left to attend Hua Tzu-yu’s birthday party. If you would have some wine and food prepared for me, I could go pay a visit to the house by the Lantern Market and share a drink with Brother-in-law Wu the Second.”

“You might as well saddle up your horse and go,” said Yüeh-niang. “I’ll have the maidservants prepare the food and wine for you.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing, thereupon, told Tai-an to prepare his horse, asked Wang Ching to accompany him, put on his clothes, and headed straight for the Lantern Market on Lion Street. What did the Lantern Market look like? Behold:

Carriages and horses rumble like thunder;

The round lanterns are ablaze with color.

The revelers swarm like ants;

The merrymaking is at its height.

In this era of great peace,⁵ beneficent breezes enhance the scene; Beauties in gauze and silk return after showing off their finery.

Hills of lanterns soar into the heights⁶ above the azure clouds;

From whence do revelers not congregate to take in the sights?⁷

After pausing to admire the lanterns, Hsi-men Ch’ing proceeded to the door of the house on Lion Street, where he dismounted, went inside, and sat down. This threw Brother-in-law Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth into such consternation that they both hastened to come forward and welcome him with a bow, reporting that the shop was doing a thriving business. Laichao’s wife, “The Beanpole,” quickly lit a brazier in the studio and provided a serving of tea. It was not long before Wu Yüeh-niang sent Ch’in-t’ung and Lai-an to deliver two square boxes of appetizers and other dishes to go with the drinks. There was a supply of mung bean wine in the shop that had been brought back from the South, a jug of which was opened and taken upstairs to be heated on the brazier in the studio. Hsi-men Ch’ing invited Brother-in-law Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth to join him in toasting each other as they drank, and they enjoyed the spectacle of the Lantern Market right outside the window, where crowds of people moved back and forth incessantly, and the goods purveyed by the various guilds were piled up like mountains.

When they had indulged themselves until after the normal lunch hour, Hsi-men Ch’ing sent Wang Ching to inform Wang Liu-erh of his visit. Upon hearing that Hsi-men Ch’ing was coming, Wang Liu-erh prepared a table replete with boxes of candied fruit, wine, and other delicacies and awaited his arrival. Hsi-men Ch’ing told Lai-chao to keep what was left of the table setting of food and wine for Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth to enjoy that evening while on night duty, rather than sending it home. He also directed Ch’in-t’ung to deliver a jug of wine to Wang Liu-erh’s place, after which he mounted his horse and made his way directly to her home.

The woman had dressed herself up to welcome him and conducted him into the parlor, where she kowtowed to him four times:

Just as if inserting a taper in its holder.

Hsi-men Ch’ing responded by saying, “I am grateful for your lavish gifts on more than one occasion, but why is it that the last two times we invited you to our home you failed to come?”

“Father, that’s a fine way to talk,” she said. “Who else is there to look after the place? I don’t know why it is, but the last few days I’ve been feeling out of sorts, and haven’t even felt like eating or drinking. I’ve hardly been able to get started on anything.”

“No doubt,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “it’s because you’ve been longing for your old man.”

“Since when have I been longing for him?” the woman responded. “It’s rather because you have neglected me for such a long time. I don’t know how I have been remiss toward you that you should put me in the position of:

The rings that hold your hairnet in place, always at the back of your head.

I fear you must have found someone else who is uppermost in your mind.”

Hsi-men Ch’ing laughed, saying, “Where did you get any such idea? It’s simply because during this festival season I’ve been busy entertaining people at our place the last few days.”

“I have heard that yesterday you entertained a bunch of female guests,” said the woman.

“That is true,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “The First Lady had been entertained at two New Year’s parties and felt obliged to put on a party in return.”

“What female guests were invited?” the woman asked.

“So-and-so and so-and-so,” Hsi-men Ch’ing responded, and went on to run through the list from beginning to end.

“So,” the woman responded, “for your lantern-viewing party you only invited important guests, but not the likes of me.”

“Don’t make such a thing out of it,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “In days to come, on the sixteenth of the first month, we’re going to have a party for the wives of my managers and employees, to which you had better come, and not make any excuses for not doing so.”

“If Mother deigns to send me an invitation,” the woman said, “how would I dare not to come? However, the other day, that young lady from your household reviled Second Sister Shen so severely that she was filled with resentment and took it out on me. That day, she had not wanted to go, and it was I who persuaded her to do so. Afterwards, when she came back after suffering such abuse, she broke down and cried like anything, to my extreme mortification; and it was only after you and Mother sent a box of delicacies and a tael of silver to mollify her, that she stopped complaining. I was unaware that the young lady in question had such an explosive temper. After all:

Before beating a dog, you ought to consider the face of its owner.”⁸

“You don’t know that little oily mouth,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing. “She’s got an extremely gutsy personality and has even been known to brazen it out with me. But if she asked Second Sister Shen to sing a song for her, why should she have refused to do so? Whoever told her not only to refuse to sing, but to criticize her into the bargain?”

“Ai-ya! Ai-ya!” the woman protested. “She assured me that she had never criticized the young lady, but that she came barging in, pointed a finger at her, and began to abuse her, telling her to get out. By the time she got back here, she was in terrible shape and broke out crying:

Sniveling three ribbons of snot, and Dribbling two rivulets of tears.

I kept her here overnight before sending her home the next day.”

After they had talked for a while, a maidservant brought in a serving of tea. The page boy Chin-ts’ai had gone out to purchase appetizers, fresh fish, and other viands, which Old Mother Feng was preparing in the kitchen. She also came out and kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch’ing.

Hsi-men Ch’ing gave her a lump of silver worth three or four mace and said, “Since your mistress died, you have not visited my place very often.”

Wang Liu-erh said, “Since her mistress died, what reason would she have to do that? Instead, she frequently comes here to keep me company.”

In a little while, when her room had been straightened up, the woman invited Hsi-men Ch’ing to come inside and sit down, asking him, “Father, have you eaten lunch, or not?”

“I had a little congee at home this morning,” replied Hsi-men Ch’ing, “and just now I shared a snack with Brother-in-law Wu the Second, but I haven’t had a real meal.”

A table was, accordingly, set up and a spread laid out to go with the wine, consisting of festival foods, and fine delicacies of all kinds. The woman told Wang Ching to open the jug of mung bean wine, and fill their cups so she could have a drink with Hsi-men Ch’ing.

The woman then said, “Father, I assume that you have looked over the gift that I sent you. I coiled up and cut off a lock of hair from the crown of my head and fashioned it with my own hands. I’m sure that it must have tickled your fancy.”

“I’m grateful for your consideration,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing.

After they had:

Drunk until they were half inebriated,⁹ observing that they were alone in the room, Hsi-men Ch’ing pulled it out of his sleeve, placed it around the base of his organ, and tied the two brocade straps around his waist. He also attached a “Yunnanese tickler”¹⁰ to his turtle head and washed down a dose of the Indian monk’s medicine with his wine. The woman started to manipulate his organ with her hand, and in no time at all:

Its protuberances swelled, its head sprang up,

Its distended blood vessels were all exposed, and it was the color of purple liver. The device proved to be more than a match for the silver clasp or the white satin band. Hsi-men Ch’ing pulled the woman onto his lap and inserted his organ into her vagina, while up above, the two of them passed the same goblet back and forth between them as they drank wine and sucked each other’s tongues. The woman also used the tip of her tongue to pass nut kernels into Hsi-men Ch’ing’s mouth.

They continued to play with each other as they ate and drank until lamplighting time, when Old Mother Feng came in from the kitchen with some pork and leek pastries that she had made. The woman and Hsi-men Ch’ing ate two of them apiece, after which a maidservant took the leftovers away. The two of them then made their way to the heated k’ang in the inner room where they:

Lifted aside the brocade curtains,

Took off their clothes, and went to bed.

The woman knew that Hsi-men Ch’ing liked to engage in intercourse by lamplight, so she moved a lampstand from the parlor and placed it on a table beside the k’ang. She then proceeded to close the sliding paper door, wash her private parts, and put on a pair of slippers made of crimson Lu-chou silk with flat white satin soles; after which, she took off her drawers, burrowed her way under the bedclothes, and snuggled up to Hsi-men Ch’ing. As they hugged and embraced each other, they dozed off for a while.

It so happens that Hsi-men Ch’ing’s mind was totally obsessed with Ho Yung-shou’s wife, née Lan; and, as a result, his Lecherous desires were on fire, and his organ became stiff and hard. He started out by telling the woman to get down on all fours in front of him and then inserted his organ into the flower in her rear courtyard and proceeded to slam away at her as hard as he could two or three hundred times; slamming into her bottom so hard that:

The reiterated sounds reverberated loudly,

while the woman beneath him stimulated her clitoris with her hand and called out “Daddy” unceasingly.

Thereupon, still not completely satisfied, he got up and put on a short jacket of white satin, sat down on a pillow, and had the woman recline face up, while he sought out two of her foot bindings and used them to suspend her feet from the bed posts on either side so that she appeared like “A Golden Dragon Extending Its Claws.” Upon inserting his organ into her vagina, he began alternately submerging and exposing the knob of his glans, as he gave himself over to a series of shallow retractions and deep thrusts. As his organ continued to be half exposed and half submerged, he finally started:

Advancing with alacrity and galloping forward.

Fearing that the woman might be cold, he also covered her body with a short jacket of red satin. Exhilarated by the wine he had consumed, Hsi-men Ch’ing moved the lampstand closer and:

Bent his head in order the better to savor,

The marvelous sight as it went in and out, while he retracted his organ as far as the knob of the glans, and then plunged it in all the way up to the root another several hundred times. Meanwhile the woman gave vent to her feelings in a hundred ways:

In a faint voice and trembling tones.

Hsi-men Ch’ing also took some of the pink ointment the Indian monk had given him and daubed it on his turtle head before plunging it back in. The woman’s vagina was so intensely stimulated that she could hardly bear it, and she begged him to penetrate more deeply as they responded to each other. But Hsi-men Ch’ing deliberately lingered, playfully dallying around the mouth of her vagina and titillating her clitoris, while refusing to penetrate more deeply, which aroused the woman to the point that her vaginal fluids began to flow, like a snail secreting its slime. As he moved back and forth, it agitated her clitoris in a pleasurable way. By the light of the lamp, Hsi-men Ch’ing contemplated her two fresh white legs, clad in crimson shoes, as they were suspended high on either side. As they moved back and forth, lunging and butting at each other, he could hardly contain his excitement.

Thereupon, he called out, “Whore that you are, do you care for me, or not?”

“How could I not care for my daddy?” the woman responded. “So long as you remain constant like:

The pine and the cypress that are evergreen through both winter and summer, everything will be fine; but you must not:

Grow distant and aloof as the days go by,¹¹ and choose to ignore me once you’ve had your fill of fun. Though I should long to death for you, who could I tell about it, and who would care? When that cuckold of mine comes home, there would be no point in my telling him about it. I hardly think that while he is away from home on business and has money in hand, he chooses to remain chaste for love of me.”

“My child,” said Hsi-men Ch’ing, “if you can dedicate yourself exclusively to me, when he comes home I’ll simply find another wife for him, and you can devote yourself to me on a long-term basis.”

“My own daddy,” the woman responded, “when he comes home, go ahead, whatever happens, and find him another wife. You can either maintain me outside, or take me into your household, whichever you like. This whore of yours will simply abandon her worthless body to you, that’s all. There is no wish of yours that I will refuse to comply with.”

“I understand,” responded Hsi-men Ch’ing.

While they talked together, they had been going at it for the time it would take to eat two meals before Hsi-men Ch’ing finally ejaculated. He then unfastened the woman’s foot bindings and proceeded to embrace her under the bedclothes. The two of them:

Head to head and thigh over thigh,

As their drunken eyes grew bleary,¹² slept until the third watch before waking up.

Hsi-men Ch’ing got out of bed, put on his clothes, and washed his hands, while the woman opened the door of the room and called in a maidservant.

Thereupon, they:

Replenished the special delicacies,

Resumed drinking the fragrant wine,

Decanting the warmed-over beverage, and drank another ten cups or more together. Only after they began to feel intoxicated did they proceed to pour some tea and rinse out their mouths with it.

Hsi-men Ch’ing then groped a card out of his sleeve and handed it to the woman, saying, “Show this to Kan Jun, the manager of my silk goods store, and have him give you an outfit of clothes to wear, of any pattern you choose.”

The woman thanked Hsi-men Ch’ing with a bow and saw him to the door. Wang Ching was there to hold the lantern for him, and Tai-an and Ch’int’ung stood by with his horse. Only after she had seen him into the saddle did the woman return inside and shut the door.

Hsi-men Ch’ing sat on his horse wearing a purple sheep’s wool coat and a scarf wrapped around his neck. It was already the third watch of the night and dark clouds in the sky:

Darkened and obscured,¹³

the light of the moon. Silence had descended over the marketplace, the nine thoroughfares were empty, and the only sound to be heard in the streets was the rattle of the night watchman:

Shouting the hour and ringing his bell.

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave his horse a touch with the whip and started on his way. Just as he arrived in front of the stone bridge at the western end of the street, a dark shadow swirled up from under the bridge and lunged at him. At the sight of the shadow his horse shied and Hsi-men Ch'ing felt a cold shiver go up his spine.¹⁴ Drunkenly he struck his horse with his whip and it shook its mane. Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung pulled on the bridle with all their might but were unable to hold the beast in check. Like a cloud scudding before the wind, the horse bolted for home and only slowed to a halt when it reached the front gate. Wang Ching, who had charge of the lantern, was unable to catch up with them.

When Hsi-men Ch'ing dismounted, he was unsteady on his legs and had to be helped inside by the servants, whereupon he went straight to P'an Chin-lien's quarters in the front garden. Nothing might have happened if he had not gone there, but since he did go, truly, it was a case of:

A sleepy slugabed encountering the General
of the Five Ways;
A cold and hungry demon running into
Chung K'uei.¹⁵

It so happens that P'an Chin-lien had returned to her quarters from the rear compound but had not yet gone to sleep. Without bothering to undress she had stretched out on the k'ang to wait for Hsi-men Ch'ing. When she heard him come in, she hastily crawled to her feet and came forward to take his clothes from him. He was obviously stinking drunk, and she didn't dare ask him where he had been.

Hsi-men Ch'ing embraced her as best he could with one hand resting on her shoulder and mumbled, "You little whore! Your Daddy's drunk tonight. Get the bed ready so I can go to sleep."

The woman helped him onto the k'ang and got him bedded down for the night. No sooner did Hsi-men Ch'ing's head hit the pillow than he began:

Snoring thunderously, and could not be shaken awake. The woman then removed her own clothes, burrowed her way under the bedclothes, and began lazily to grope around his loins for his organ. It was as soft as cotton and as lifeless as could be.

"Wherever has he come from?" she wondered as she:

Tossed first this way and then that,
unable to withstand:

The flames of desire that consumed her body;
The lustful visions that disturbed her mind.

For some time she devoted herself to manipulating his organ with her hand. Then she crouched down under the covers and teased it with her lips a hundred ways, but it refused to rise.

Frustrated beyond endurance, she asked Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Where have you put the monk's medicine?"

She had to shake him for what seemed like half a day before he woke up.

"You crazy little whore!" Hsi-men Ch'ing protested. "What makes you so demanding? You want your daddy to take care of you, but today your daddy's just not up to it. The medicine's in the cylindrical gold pillbox in the sleeve of my jacket. Go ahead and take some. If you can suck the thing till it stands up, more power to you."

The woman groped in the sleeve of his jacket until she found the pillbox. When she opened it she saw that there were only three or four pills left.¹⁶ She picked up a flask of distilled spirits, poured some into a cup, and took one of the pills. She feared that the normal dosage would not be enough to do the trick so although:

She never, ever, should have done it, she put all three pills into his mouth and washed them down with a draught of distilled spirits. Too drunk to know what he was doing, Hsi-men Ch'ing closed his eyes and swallowed the whole dose.

In less time than it takes to drink a cup of hot tea, the medicine began to take effect. The moment the woman tied the white satin band around the root of his organ:

It sprang lustily to life.¹⁷
Behold:

In the bursting melon-head the sunken eye grows round;
Trailing its side whiskers the body swells itself erect.

Although she realized full well that all her partner wanted to do was go back to sleep, the woman sat astride his body,¹⁸ put a glob of aphrodisiac ointment in the mouth of his urethra, and plunged the object into her vagina. Thus impaled, she gave herself over to wriggling until the tip of his organ penetrated all the way to her cervix. She felt a melting sensation as though her whole body were turning numb,¹⁹ the pleasure of which was indescribable. Then, supporting herself on the pillow with both hands, she raised and lowered her hips, alternately submerging and exposing the knob of his glans one or two hundred times. At first it felt uncomfortably tight, but once her vaginal secretions began to flow it grew more slippery.

Hsi-men Ch'ing let her disport herself as she pleased without paying any attention.²⁰ The woman could control herself no longer. Sticking her tongue into Hsi-men Ch'ing's mouth, she put her arms around his neck and wriggled for all she was worth, rubbing up against him this way and that. His chowrie handle was totally submerged inside her, all the way up to the root, while only his two testicles remained outside. Meanwhile she stimulated herself with her hand until she began to feel inexpressible delight.²¹ She wiped away her vaginal secretions but they continued to flow. By the time the third watch was over she had used up five napkins for this purpose²² and had two orgasms in rapid succession.²³

But Hsi-men Ch'ing did not ejaculate. His turtle head had swollen larger than ever and turned the color of purple liver.²⁴

Its distended blood vessels were all exposed, and it was as hot as fire to the touch. It was gorged with blood, and though he told the woman to remove the band that was tied around its root, it continued to swell without ceasing. He told her to suck it, and so she crouched over his body, engulfed his turtle head with her ruby lips, and proceeded to move it:

Back and forth without stopping.

She continued for as much time as it would take to eat a meal, until the semen in his urethra spurted out en masse like mercury pouring into a bucket. She tried to catch it in her mouth and swallow it but she wasn't quick enough.

The emission went on and on. At first it was semen but it soon changed to blood. There was no stopping it. Hsi-men Ch'ing had fainted and his four limbs lay inert. In a state of panic the woman put a red date into his mouth and he swallowed it.²⁵ When the flow of semen ceased, it was followed by blood,²⁶ when the flow of blood stopped, nothing came out but a discharge of cold air. It was some time before this came to an end.

The woman was beside herself. Embracing Hsi-men Ch'ing, she asked, "My darling, what do you feel like inside?"

When Hsi-men Ch'ing finally came to, he said:

"My head feels so dizzy,

I hardly know where I am."²⁷

"Why did you have such a big discharge today?" she asked, but said nothing of the overdose of aphrodisiac she had given him.

Gentle reader take note:

The vitality of the individual is finite, but

The prurience in this world is unlimited.

It has also been said that:

Where desires and cravings are deep,

The Heavenly impulse is shallow.²⁸

Hsi-men Ch'ing sought only his own sexual gratification but did not realize that:

When its oil is used up the lamp goes out;

When his marrow is drained a man will die.

It so happens that the allure of feminine beauty ensnares men in such a way that:

Where there is initial success,

There will be ultimate disaster.²⁹

A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition that put this very well:

A flower-faced guardian god,

A jade-fleshed demon king,³⁰

She is a ravenous beast attired in silk and satin.

Her bed is an execution ground,

Her ivory couch a penitentiary.

Her willowy brows are blades,

Her starry eyes are swords,

Her ruby lips are spears.

Her sweet mouth and her fragrant tongue,

Mask the designs of a snake or scorpion;³¹

No one who succumbs to her is able to avoid disaster.

They are but fine dust in fluid,

Or snowflakes in scalding water.

The states of Ch'in and Ch'u were hardy,

The states of Wu and Yüeh were powerful,

But they perished on her account.

You may be warned that beauty is a deadly sword,

That slays us all; but few defend themselves.³²

The beauty of sixteen³³ has a body
as smooth as cream,
Her loins are a sword³⁴ with which to slay the unwary.
Though no one may see your head
fall from your neck,
Before you know it, the marrow of your bones is sapped.³⁵

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

Early the next morning Hsi-men Ch'ing got up and started to comb his hair when he was suddenly overcome by a spell of dizziness, which caused him to pitch forward in his chair. Fortunately Ch'un-mei caught him in her arms and prevented him from falling to the floor and hurting his head or face. She sat him back in his chair, and it was some time before he recovered.

Chin-lien was alarmed and blurted out, "You must be feeling debilitated from lack of food. You had better just sit where you are and have something to eat before going anywhere."

She told Ch'iu-chü, "Go back to the kitchen and fetch some congee for Father to eat."

Ch'iu-chü went back to the kitchen in the rear compound and said to Sun Hsüeh-o, "Is the congee ready yet? This morning, thus and so, when Father got up he had a spell of vertigo that nearly caused him to collapse. He needs some congee to eat right away."

Wu Yüeh-niang happened to overhear what Ch'iu-chü said and called her into her presence to ask what had happened. Ch'iu-chü told her the whole story of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had felt so light-headed that morning that he had nearly fallen over while combing his hair.

If Yüeh-niang had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard it:

Her ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and

Her material souls fled to the Nine Heavens.

After telling Sun Hsüeh-o to prepare the congee right away, she headed straight for Chin-lien's quarters to see for herself what condition her husband was in.

She found Hsi-men Ch'ing sitting in a chair and asked him, "What brought about this attack of giddiness today?"

"I don't know what's the matter with me," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "A little while ago I just started feeling woozy."

"It's lucky Ch'un-mei and I were here to catch him," said Chin-lien. "Otherwise, light-headed as he was, he might have had a really nasty fall."

"You must have stayed out late last night," said Yüeh-niang, "and had more to drink than was good for you. It's still affecting your head."

"Whose place were you drinking at anyway," demanded Chin-lien, "that you didn't get back until such an hour?"

"He was drinking with my second brother in the shop on Lion Street," said Yüeh-niang.

Before long, Sun Hsüeh-o finished boiling the congee and told Ch'iu-chü to take it to Hsi-men Ch'ing to eat. Hsi-men Ch'ing took up the congee but lost interest after eating only half a bowl and put it down again.

"What are you feeling inside?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"Nothing in particular," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "just empty and queasy, and not much like doing anything."

"You really shouldn't go to the yamen today," said Yüeh-niang.

"I'm not going to," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied. "In a while I'll go out to the front compound and get Ch'en Ching-chi to write out the invitations and send them off. I'm inviting Chou Hsiu, Ching Chung, Ho Yung-shou, and some other officials to come over for a drink on the fifteenth."

"You haven't taken your medicine yet today," said Yüeh-niang. "Get your milk and take another dose with it. You've been overextending yourself for days on end and have let yourself get run down."

She had Ch'un-mei ask Ju-i to squeeze a little of her milk into a cup for him and watched Hsi-men Ch'ing take his medicine before getting up and going to the front compound. Ch'un-mei helped him along, but before he had gotten as far as the postern gate into the garden he started to black out. Unable to stand on his tottering legs, he would have fallen down if Ch'un-mei had not been there to help him back inside.

"If I were you," said Yüeh-niang, "I'd take it easy for a couple of days and forget about inviting all those people. Who cares about things like that at a time like this? Stay at home and rest for a few days, and forget about going out."

"And if there's anything you'd specially like to eat," she added. "I'll go back to the kitchen and get the maidservants to prepare it for you."

"I don't feel like eating anything," Hsi-men Ch'ing replied.

When Yüeh-niang returned to the rear compound, she questioned Chin-lien again, saying, "If he wasn't already drunk when he came home last night, and he didn't have anything more to drink, what sort of shenanigans was he up to with you?"

When Chin-lien heard this, she:

Wished she had more mouths than nature had provided,
so that she could issue a thousand denials.

"Sister," she protested, "needless to say, by the time he got home he was so drunk he didn't even bother to greet me. On top of which, he demanded that I bring him distilled spirits so he could continue drinking. I gave him tea instead, telling him I didn't have any spirits, and then put him right to bed. Ever since you spoke to me about it, who would have dared to have anything to do with him in that way? How embarrassing can you get? It may well be that he had been up to something outside. Of course, I wouldn't know about that. But I can assure you that absolutely nothing of the kind occurred after he got home."

Yüeh-niang, who was sitting there along with Meng Yü-lou, called Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung before her and interrogated them, saying, "Where was Father out drinking yesterday? If you tell the truth, I'll let it go at that. But if you engage in:

The slightest deceit or prevarication, you two jailbirds will be held to account.

Tai-an clenched his teeth and insisted, "He was drinking with Brother-in-law Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth in the shop on Lion Street and didn't venture anywhere else."

Later, she called Brother-in-law Wu in to ask him about it, and he said, "Brother-in-law drank with us for only a short time, and then got up and went somewhere else."

When Yüeh-niang heard this she became enraged. As soon as Brother-in-law Wu the Second left, she gave Tai-an and Ch'in-t'ung a real dressing down and threatened them with a beating. The two of them panicked and finally admitted, "Yesterday he went to have a drink with Han Tao-kuo's wife."

This was just the signal that P'an Chin-lien had been waiting for, and she came forward, saying, "Sister, when you showed your resentment against me just now, it was a case of:

Taking things out on an innocent bystander, while giving the culprit a laugh.

After all:

Every person has a face;
Every tree has its bark.

When you talk about me that way, it makes it look as though, all day long, I give this one thing priority over everything else."

She then went on to say, "Sister, you ought to further ask those two jailbirds why it was that he arrived home so late the other day when you went to the party at Ho Yung-shou's place. Who knows where he had been? It's hardly likely that anyone would stay out that late making a New Year's courtesy call."

Tai-an, who was afraid that Ch'in-t'ung would spill the beans, decided not to conceal the truth any longer and told her all about Hsi-men Ch'ing's surreptitious affair with Lady Lin.

Only then did Yüeh-niang believe him and remark, "No wonder he had me send an invitation to her. I said to him:

'We are newly acquainted and hardly know each other.

I fear she is unlikely to come.' Who could have known that he was having an affair with her? It seems to me that, for someone of her age to:

Paint her eyebrows and dye her hair, powdering her face till it looks as though it's been plastered with putty, only shows her to be nothing but an aging strumpet."

"Sister," remarked Meng Yü-lou, "who ever heard of anyone with a grown-up son, who has already taken a wife, still carrying on that way? If she can't bear her widowhood, she should take another husband."

"That old whore," pronounced Chin-lien, "shameless as she is, could not accept the disgrace that would entail."

"I said that I feared she would refuse to come," said Yüeh-niang. "Who could have anticipated that she would be wanton enough to exhibit herself that way?"

"As far as she is concerned, Sister," said Chin-lien, "you have finally perceived the difference between black and white. But with regard to that whore of Han Tao-kuo's, you have been critical of me for condemning her. The fact is that their whole household collaborates in affairs like this. Her mate is an open cuckold, and yet our husband continues to support that beggar of a cuckold. In the future he may well prove to be as fatal as a ghost-snatching demon."

"You call Wang the Third's mother an old whore," said Yüeh-niang. "But she says that when you were young you were employed as a servant in their household."

If Chin-lien had not heard this, nothing might have happened, but having heard it, her face turned crimson from her ears to her neck and she started to swear, saying, "That lousy old whore is delirious. What would I be doing in her household for no good reason? The fact is that my maternal aunt lived next door to her. They had a garden, and when I was staying with my aunt as a child, I used to go over to their place to play with their maidservants. She may claim that I worked for her family, but I don't acknowledge anything of the sort. She's nothing but an:

Open-eyed and brazen-faced,
old whore."

"You'd better watch that mouth of yours," said Yüeh-niang. "I merely told you what she said, and you start cursing her."

Chin-lien did not have another word to say on the subject.

Yüeh-niang then told Sun Hsüeh-o to make some boiled dumplings for Hsi-men Ch'ing, and she set out for the front compound in order to feed them to him.

Just as she got to the ceremonial gate, she saw P'ing-an going into the garden and called him to a halt, saying, "What are you up to?"

"Li Ming has engaged the services of four singing girls to entertain the company at the party on the fifteenth," P'ing-an explained. "He has come to report this and wants to know whether it will take place as planned, or not. I told him the invitations had not yet been sent out, but he didn't believe me and asked me to come in and tell Father about it."

"You crazy louse of a slave!" Yüeh-niang exclaimed. "How can we have a party under the circumstances? What need is there for you to ask about it? Why didn't you simply send that cuckold away, instead of coming to report anything to your master or mistress?"

She railed at P'ing-an until he fled, as though:

Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,

There was no place for him to hide.

Yüeh-niang proceeded on her way to Chin-lien's quarters, where she looked on as Hsi-men Ch'ing ate three or four boiled dumplings before stopping and refusing to eat any more.

She then reported to him, "Li Ming came to report that he had engaged the singing girls, but I sent him away, telling him to cancel the engagement, because the party would have to be called off and rescheduled for another day."

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded in agreement, assuming that he would probably feel somewhat better in a few days.

Who could have anticipated that, after getting through the night, the next day his depleted organ swelled up, his genitalia became inflamed, and his testicles became so swollen they looked like shiny eggplants. When he urinated, his urethra felt as though it were being scraped with a knife; and every time he did so, it hurt the same way.

His orderlies and attendants had saddled his horse and were waiting outside for Hsi-men Ch'ing, in order to escort him to the yamen to preside over the general disposition of impending cases scheduled for the fifteenth of the month. Who could have foreseen that he would be afflicted with these symptoms?

Yüeh-niang said to him, "If you will do as I suggest, send a note to His Honor Ho Yung-shou, telling him that you are staying at home undergoing treatment for the next few days and can't go to the yamen. If you are feeling so debilitated, you ought to send a page boy, as soon as possible, to ask Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come and examine you, and then take whatever medications he prescribes. You ought not to delay this way. That's no solution. For someone of your constitution not to eat anything to speak of for two days is hardly sustainable."

But Hsi-men Ch'ing would not give his consent to summoning the doctor, saying, "It doesn't matter. I'll be all right in a couple of days and should be able to go out by then."

He thereupon sent someone off to the yamen with an explanatory note and a tally entitling him to a leave of absence and then lay down on the bed, but he felt restless and out of sorts.

When Ying Po-chüeh heard about his condition, he came to see him, and Hsi-men Ch'ing invited him into Chin-lien's quarters and offered him a seat.

Ying Po-chüeh bowed to him in greeting and said, "I imposed on your hospitality the other day Brother, but I did not know that you were feeling unwell. It is not surprising that you did not go to Hua Tzu-yu's birthday party."

"If I had felt any better, I would have gone," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I don't know why, but I just didn't feel up to doing anything."

"Brother," asked Ying Po-chüeh, "how are you feeling right now?"

"It doesn't amount to much," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I've had spells of vertigo, and when I stand up, I'm unsteady on my feet and find it difficult to walk."

"I notice that your face is red," said Ying Po-chüeh. "You must be running a fever. Have you sent for someone to examine you, or not?"

"My wife said I ought to invite Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come and examine me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but I told her that I wasn't suffering from any ailment serious enough to justify calling for him."

"Brother, you are mistaken there," pronounced Ying Po-chüeh. "You ought to invite him to come examine you, and see what he has to say. If you take several doses of whatever he prescribes, it should dissipate your fever, and facilitate your recovery. With the advent of spring, people often suffer this way from outbreaks of phlegm-fire. Yesterday, I ran into Li Ming, who told me that you had asked him to engage the services of some singing girls for a party you were going to hold today, but that you were not feeling well and had postponed the date. This news gave me quite a start, and he suggested that I should come to see you first thing today."

"I wasn't even able to go to the yamen today to preside over the ceremony of bowing before the imperial tablet," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but had to send in the tally that entitles me to a leave of absence."

"It's obvious that you couldn't go," said Ying Po-chüeh. "If you undergo the appropriate medical treatment for a few days, you should be able to go out again."

When he had finished drinking his tea, he said, "I'll go now, and come back to see you later. I should also let you know that Li Kuei-chieh has arranged with Wu Yin-erh to come see how you are."

"Why don't you stay for a meal before you go?" said Hsi-men Ch'ing.

"I don't want anything to eat," said Ying Po-chüeh, as he went nonchalantly off without more ado.

Hsi-men Ch'ing then sent Ch'in-t'ung outside the city gate to invite Dr. Jen Hou-ch'i to come examine him.

When he came into the room and took his pulse, he said, "This ailment of yours, venerable sir, is a case of vacuity fire flaming upward, and the depletion of semen in your testicles. This lack of equilibrium in your system is symptomatic of a loss of yang energy. Your yin vacuity must be replenished before you can recover."

When he had finished pronouncing his diagnosis, he took his leave, got up, and left.

Hsi-men Ch'ing sealed up five mace of silver in order to pay for the medication he prescribed and took it; but although it put a stop to his bouts of vertigo, his body remained as weak as ever, and he could not stand up. Down below, his scrotum continued to swell painfully, and he found it extremely difficult to urinate.

That afternoon, Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh came to see him in their sedan chairs, bringing with them two gift boxes apiece, containing stuffed pastries, rose-flavored gold-colored tarts, a set of pig's feet, and two roast ducks.

Upon entering the room, and kowtowing to Hsi-men Ch'ing, they said, "Father, what is it that's troubling you?"

"It is enough that you two sisters should come to see me," said Hsi-men Ch'ing. "What need was there for you to take the trouble to purchase gifts for me?"

He then went on to say, "I don't know why, but this year I am afflicted with unusually severe phlegm-fire."

"Father," said Li Kuei-chieh, "you must have been drinking too heavily during this festival season. If you will only abstain for a few days, you should recover."

After sitting with him for a while, they went over to Li P'ing-erh's quarters, to convey their holiday greetings to Yüeh-niang and the others. They were invited back to the rear compound and served tea, after which, they returned to the front compound, intending to sit down and visit with Hsi-men Ch'ing.

In the interim, Ying Po-chüeh, accompanied by Hsieh Hsi-ta and Ch'ang Shih-chieh, had come to see him. Hsi-men Ch'ing asked Yü-hsiao to help him up to a sitting position and retained his three visitors, calling for a table to be set up, so they could drink together.

"Has Brother had any congee to eat, or not?" inquired Hsieh Hsi-ta.

Yü-hsiao turned her head away and did not respond, but Hsi-men Ch'ing said, "I haven't had any congee. I don't seem to be able to swallow it."

"Go get some congee," suggested Hsieh Hsi-ta. "We'll keep Brother company as he eats it. That ought to help."

Before long, she came back with some congee and stood by him with a cup of it in hand, while his guests kept him company by eating snacks and other refreshments. Hsi-men Ch'ing took up the congee but only managed to scoop down half a cup of it before he stopped eating. Meanwhile, Yüeh-niang was entertaining Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh in Li P'ing-erh's quarters next door.

Ying Po-chüeh asked, "Why are Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh not to be seen?"

"They are sitting right next door," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Ying Po-chüeh then turned to Lai-an and said, "You go over there and invite them to come here and sing a song suite for your master's entertainment."

Wu Yüeh-niang was afraid that Hsi-men Ch'ing was in no shape to be thus entertained and refused to let them go on the grounds that they were having a drink together.

After his guests had drunk together for a time, they said, "Brother, we fear that if you continue to sit up with us, you may wear yourself out. We'd better go, so you can lie back down for a while."

"I appreciate your concern for me," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The three of them then said goodbye and proceeded to leave.

When Ying Po-chüeh had gone through the little gate to the courtyard, he called Tai-an over and said to him, "Tell the First Lady that Ying the Second reported that your Father's face has changed color, a sign of stagnant circulation, and that she ought to have someone come and examine him as soon as possible. Dr. Hu, who resides on Main Street, is especially proficient at treating phlegm-fire. Why don't you have someone go and invite him to come and examine him? There is no time to be wasted."

Tai-an did not dare to be remiss and promptly went to report this to Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh-niang hastily went into the room he was in and said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "Ying the Second, just now, told Tai-an that Dr. Hu, who resides on Main Street, is good at treating phlegm-fire. Why don't you invite him to come examine you?"

"That Dr. Hu," replied Hsi-men Ch'ing, "formerly came to treat Li P'ing-erh, but to no effect. Why should I invite him?"

Yüeh-niang responded:

"Medicine cures only those diseases

which are not fatal;

The Buddha saves only those destined to be saved.³⁶

Though he may not have treated her effectively, it could be your destiny to recover after taking his medication."

"All right," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "Go ahead and invite him."

Before long, Ch'i-t'ung was sent on this errand and brought Dr. Hu back with him. He arrived just as Brother-in-law Wu K'ai came by to see Hsi-men Ch'ing, and they entered his room together.

After taking his pulse, he said to Wu K'ai and Ch'en Ching-chi, "His Honor is suffering from accumulated toxicity in his genitalia. Unless this is treated in a timely manner, it will produce a leakage of blood in his urine. This condition is the result of engaging in sexual intercourse while suppressing the urge to urinate."

Once again, five mace of silver was sealed up to pay for the medication he prescribed, but when Hsi-men Ch'ing took it, it was no more efficacious than:

A stone sunk in the vast sea, and he found himself unable to urinate at all.

Yüeh-niang was so alarmed by this that she sent Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh away and then invited Dr. Ho Ch'un-ch'üan, the son of Old Man Ho, to come and examine him.

He said, "This is a urinary blockage due to the inflammatory swelling of the lymph nodes in the groin, caused by the descent of pathogenic fire from the bladder. The accumulation of damp phlegm in the circulatory channels of the four limbs has interrupted the communication between the heart and the kidneys."

Once again, five mace of silver was sealed up to pay for the medication he prescribed, but when Hsi-men Ch'ing took it, his depleted organ rose up until his chowrie handle was as hard as iron and would not relax by day or by night. That night, P'an Chin-lien, as though she:

 Didn't know any better,
sat astride Hsi-men Ch'ing's body and amused herself by "dipping the candle upside down" until he:

 Passed out and then came to again,³⁷
a number of times in succession.

The next day, Ho Yung-shou came to see him and sent someone ahead to announce his coming.

On hearing this, Yüeh-niang said to Hsi-men Ch'ing, "His Honor Ho Yung-shou is about to come visit you. Let me help you move back to the rear compound. This out-of-the-way location is not a fit place to receive guests."

Hsi-men Ch'ing nodded in assent, and Yüeh-niang, thereupon, helped him into some warm clothes; after which, she and Chin-lien supported him on either side as he made his way out of Chin-lien's quarters and back to the master suite in the rear compound. Once there, they put down a mattress and bedding, propped him up on a high pillow on the k'ang in the master bedroom, straightened up the room, and lit some incense.

Before long, Ho Yung-shou arrived, and Ch'en Ching-chi invited him into the bedroom in the rear compound, where he found Hsi-men Ch'ing sitting up in his sickbed, and said, "My colleague, I will not bother with a formal obeisance."

Hsi-men Ch'ing in His Sexual Indulgence Forfeits His Life

He then went on to ask, "Do you feel that your ailment is getting any better?"

"The fever in my upper body has receded somewhat," said Hsi-men Ch'ing, "but the toxicity in my swollen scrotum down below is more than I can take."

"That sounds like a case of swollen lymph nodes in the groin," said Ho Yung-shou. "Your pupil has an acquaintance who has been visiting his relatives in Tung-ch'ang prefecture but just arrived back yesterday. I have a note to that effect at home. He is a native of Fen-chou in Shansi province, and his name is Liu Ch'ü-chai. He is some fifty years old and is extremely proficient at treating infectious disorders. I could send someone to invite him to come and diagnose my colleague's disorder."

"I deeply appreciate my colleague's concern," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing. "I will send someone myself to invite him."

When Ho Yung-shou had finished his tea, he said, "You must take it easy and look after yourself, my colleague. With regard to business at the yamen, I will send someone to inform you of what is going on every day. There is no need for you to worry about it."

Hsi-men Ch'ing raised his hand in a gesture of gratitude and said, "I fear I am putting my colleague to a lot of trouble."

When Ho Yung-shou had taken his leave and gone out the door, Hsi-men Ch'ing dispatched Tai-an with a note, accompanied by one of Ho's servants, to go and invite Liu Ch'ü-chai to come examine him.

After taking his pulse and scrutinizing his genitalia, Liu Ch'ü-chai applied a medication to the area and also sealed up a decoction for him to take orally. Hsi-men Ch'ing rewarded him with a bolt of Hang-chou silk, and a tael of silver; but when he took the first cup of the decoction, it produced no visible effect.

That same day, unexpectedly, Cheng Ai-yüeh came to see Hsi-men Ch'ing in her sedan chair, bringing a box of squabs, and a box of stuffed pastries and cream puff pastries for him.

Upon coming in the door:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of her embroidered sash flying;

she kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing, saying, "I didn't know that you had fallen ill. Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh, fine pair that they are, didn't tell me about it and came ahead of me, so that I have been remiss in coming to see you. Please don't hold it against me."

"You're not remiss," responded Hsi-men Ch'ing, "and your mother has also gone to the trouble of purchasing gifts for me."

Cheng Ai-yüeh laughed, saying, "What do these paltry gifts amount to? You embarrass me no end."

She then went on to say, "Father, since you have lost weight to such an extent, you can supplement your daily diet with these things."

"It would be a good thing if he eats them," said Yüeh-niang. "He hasn't been eating much of anything. This morning, he only consumed a little congee and hasn't had anything else to eat. The doctor was just here to examine him."

"Mother," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "get a maidservant to boil one of these squabs until it is tender, and I will urge Father to eat some more congee with it. Venerable sir, it won't do for someone of your hefty build not to eat. The whole household depends on you for their support like a mountain of gold. What would they do without you?"

"He's suffering from a feeling of abdominal obstruction," said Yüeh-niang, "and can't get anything down."

"Father," said Cheng Ai-yüeh, "you should do as I say. Though you may not feel like eating or drinking anything from day to day, you've got to force yourself to consume something. What are you afraid of?"

Human beings have no roots to nourish them;

It is food and water that sustain our lives.

The fact is you've got to eat enough to maintain your stamina, or else your vitality will become even more exhausted."

Before long, the squab was boiled until it was tender, and Hsiao-yü brought it in together with some congee. The congee was made with polished nonglutinous rice flavored with sweet squash and eggplant julienne and marinated with ten spices. Cheng Ai-yüeh then jumped onto the k'ang holding the bowl of congee in her hand and knelt down beside Hsi-men Ch'ing, feeding him one mouthful at a time. Although he did the best he could, he was only able to get down half a bowl of congee and two chopstick's worth of squab, before he shook his head and refused to eat any more.

Cheng Ai-yüeh said, "On the one hand, because he knows it's therapeutic, and on the other hand, because I urged him to do so, he has had a little something to eat."

"Father has not been eating that much," said Yü-hsiao, "but today, thanks to your urging, he has eaten more than usual."

Yüeh-niang treated Cheng Ai-yüeh to a serving of tea. That evening she also entertained her with food and wine and rewarded her with five mace of silver before sending her home.

As she was about to leave, Cheng Ai-yüeh kowtowed to Hsi-men Ch'ing once again, saying, "Father, be patient and do your best to recuperate for a few days. I will come back to see you again."

That night, Hsi-men Ch'ing took a second dose of the medicine prescribed by Liu Chü-chai, but his whole body started to ache and he could not help groaning with pain all night long. During the fifth watch, his swollen scrotum burst open, releasing a pool of fresh blood, and chancres appeared on his turtle head that exuded a yellow fluid incessantly. Before he knew it, Hsi-men Ch'ing fell into a faint and blacked out.

Yüeh-niang and the other members of the household were thrown into a panic and came to keep vigil over him. When they saw that the medication was not having the desired effect, they decided to send for Dame Liu to come to the summerhouse in the front compound to light candles in the shape of human figurines, and perform a shamanistic dance on Hsi-men Ch'ing's behalf. They also intended to send a page boy to the home of Commandant Chou Hsiu to inquire if Immortal Wu was there, and to invite him to come and assess Hsi-men Ch'ing's situation, since he had predicted, when he told his fortune, that during this year he would suffer from:

The calamity of spitting blood, and discharging pus, and

The affliction of desiccated bones and emaciated frame.³⁸

Pen the Fourth said, "There is no need to ask after him at the home of His Honor Chou Hsiu. At present, he has set up a fortune-telling shop in front of the Temple of the Tutelary God outside the city gate, where he dispenses medical advice and sells fortunes. When people come to him for help, he is not out to make a profit but goes forthwith to diagnose their troubles."

Upon hearing this, Yüeh-niang immediately sent Ch'in-t'ung to summon Immortal Wu.

When he came into the room and looked at Hsi-men Ch'ing, he saw that:

He no longer resembled his former self.

His frame was cadaverous and emaciated;

His diseased body was utterly enervated;³⁹ and a kerchief was tied around his head as he lay there on his sickbed.

After first taking his pulse, he said, "Sir, you are suffering from the results of:

Excessive indulgence in drunkenness and lust;⁴⁰

Your reserve of semen is completely depleted.

The pathogenic fire of your generative organ,

Is choking the conduit leading to your heart.

The disease has penetrated your vital organs,⁴¹

And is no longer possible to treat medically.

There is a poem of eight lines that is relevant to your case, which I will recite for you.

When you engage in sex while drunk and sated,⁴²
lusting after female beauty,
Your vital energy and your blood vessels will imperceptibly be worn away.
Your semen will leak, your urine contain blood,
and you will emit milky muck;
Just as a lamp goes out when its oil is spent,
your store of semen will dry up.
In the past your only regret was that occasions for gratification were too few;
But now, on the contrary, it has come to pass that your maladies are too many.
The jade pinnacle will collapse all by itself,⁴³ without anyone else's help;
Even the famous physician, Pien Ch'ieh of Lu,⁴⁴ would be unable to save you.

When Yüeh-niang realized that Immortal Wu would not be able to cure him, she said, "Since you cannot prescribe any medication to improve his condition, would you be willing to predict his fate?"

Immortal Wu then:

Calculated on the joints of his fingers,

in order to ascertain the eight characters that determined Hsi-men Ch'ing's horoscope, and said, "He was born in the year of the tiger, in a ping-yin year, during a wu-shen month, on a jen-wu day, during the ping-ch'en time period. In this wu-hsü year of his horoscope he should be thirty-two years old. He is currently in the third of his 'decennial periods of fate' that is designated by the combination kuei-hai. The elements fire and earth in his horoscope constitute his 'injurer of the official,' and the element earth that corresponds to the stem wu in the combination for the current year will overcome the element water that corresponds to the stem jen, so that the combination for the current year will be in conflict with that for the day of his birth. The first month of this year is also a wu-yin month. Thus the three occurrences of the stem wu in the combinations for the month of his birth, the current year, and the current month, will conflict with the branch ch'en in the combination for the time period of his birth. How can he hope to withstand this? Though he has enjoyed both wealth and good fortune thus far, his longevity cannot be preserved. I will render a judgment in four lines of verse, though it may be hard to take.

When one's fate is crossed by an unlucky star
it is sure to be unpropitious;
The body is feeble, the baleful spirit strong,
and sure to portend catastrophe.
If the time and day indicate an encounter with the genuine ill-boding Year God;
Even should one be a god or an immortal, one would have to knit one's brows."⁴⁵

Yüeh-niang said, "If the prospects for him do not look good, could you calculate the correlations between the five phases, the twenty-eight lunar mansions, and their corresponding animals that govern his fate to see what they portend?"

Immortal Wu proceeded to chart the implications of the animals associated with the stem-branch combinations in his horoscope and said:

The heart-moon-fox mansion and the horn-wood-flood dragon, Deep under the crimson bed-curtains⁴⁶ cannot be reconciled.
One constantly sends jade dew flying from the moon palace;
The other, beneath the moon, tries to seize the golden trophy.
When excited, he is transformed into a real fighting cock;
Even on the brink of death, he longs for an overripe peach.
Neither celestial deities nor earthly spirits can save him;
The Master of the Demon Gorge⁴⁷ himself would labor in vain."

Yüeh-niang said, "If the prognostication from his horoscopic animals is not propitious, would you interpret a dream for me?"

"Describe it to me," said Immortal Wu, "and I will interpret it for you."

Yüeh-niang said, "I dreamt of a spacious structure on the verge of collapse, of a body covered with a red garment, of the breaking of a green jade hairpin, and the smashing of a caltrop-patterned mirror."

"Pray do not take offense at what I have to say," responded Immortal Wu, "but the spacious structure on the verge of collapse portends a calamity for your husband. The body covered with a red garment portends that you will be wearing mourning clothes. The breaking of the green jade hairpin portends a splitting up of you and your sister wives. The smashing of the caltrop-patterned mirror portends the immanent separation of you and your husband. This dream is also not propitious, not propitious.”

“Is there anything you can do to alleviate the situation, sir?” asked Yüeh-niang.

Immortal Wu responded:

“The White Tiger is blocking the road ahead,
Death Knell and Condoler are wreaking havoc,⁴⁸
Gods and immortals are not able to cure him,
The ill-boding Year God cannot be withstood.
The Creator has determined the outcome;
Neither gods nor spirits can modify it.”⁴⁹

When Yüeh-niang realized that there was no saving star in his horoscope, she presented Immortal Wu with a bolt of fabric to thank him for his services and sent him on his way. But no more of this. Truly:

In consulting the yin and yang forces in the hexagrams,
One should neglect mere trivialities, paying them no heed.
If you devote your life to good works,
Heaven will reward you;
If you refrain from deceiving Heaven,
mishaps will not occur.⁵⁰

When Yüeh-niang saw that though:

The gods were besought and diviners consulted,
the results of these prognostications were all:

Ominous and inauspicious, her heart was filled with consternation. That evening, she burnt incense in the courtyard and swore an oath before Heaven that if her husband should recover, she would make three annual pilgrimages to the peak of Mount T'ai in T'ai-an subprefecture, in order to burn incense and present a robe to Pi-hsia Yüan-chün, the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds.⁵¹ Meng Yü-lou also promised that she would pay obeisance to the dipper on the seventh, seventeenth, and twenty-seventh of each month. Only P'an Chin-lien and Li Chiao-erh failed to make any vows on his behalf.

Meanwhile, Hsi-men Ch'ing felt that his body was becoming more and more torpid, and he intermittently lost consciousness. During these episodes, he saw Hua Tzu-hsü and Wu the Elder standing in front of him, demanding retribution for the harm he had done them. He was reluctant to tell anyone about this but merely saw to it that he was not left alone.

On one occasion, observing that Yüeh-niang was not present, he took hold of P'an Chin-lien with one hand, feeling that he could not bear to relinquish her, and, letting his eyes brim over with tears, said to her, “My darling, after I die, I hope that you and your sister wives will keep vigil over my spirit tablet, and not go your separate ways.”

Chin-lien also, feeling that:

Her anguish could not be overcome, said, “Brother, my only fear is that I will not be tolerated.”

“Wait until the First Lady comes in,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “I will speak to her about it.”

Before long, Wu Yüeh-niang came in, and seeing that the eyes of the two of them were red with weeping, said, “Brother, if you have something to say, tell me about it, as befits the fact that you and I have shared the experience of:

Being husband and wife all this time.”⁵²

When Hsi-men Ch'ing heard this, he became so choked up he had difficulty uttering a sound, but finally said, “I realize that I am unlikely to recover, but there are a few words that I would like to bequeath to you. After I die, if you give birth to:

A single boy or half a girl,
you and your sister wives ought to devote yourselves to raising it, and continue to live together, rather than going your separate ways and thereby incurring the contempt of the community.”

Pointing to Chin-lien, he went on to say, “As for Sister Six here, you should make allowances for what she did in the past.”

When he had finished speaking, the pearly tears rolled down Yüeh-niang's peach-colored face, as she commenced to cry out loud, giving herself over to boundless sorrow.

“Don't cry,” said Hsi-men Ch'ing. “Listen to my injunction.”

There is a song to the tune “Stopping the Horse to Listen” that expresses what he had to say:

“My worthy wife,
I have a heartfelt wish to impart to you:
Wife,
Whether the child you are carrying is male or female,
After it is born, raise it
to adulthood,
So it can take charge of my estate.

Follow the example of the former martyrs
by remaining chaste,
One wife and four concubines looking out for each other;
Thus being able to maintain each others'
reputations.
Though I am dead beneath the Nine Springs,⁵³
I will be able to close my mouth and eyes."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she replied to the same tune:

"Thank you my husband,
For sharing your dying wishes with me.
Husband,
Though I fall into the category of womenfolk,
I adhere to the four virtues and three obediences,⁵⁴
Appropriate to husband and wife.
Throughout my life I have chosen not to act ambiguously.⁵⁵
I will remain chaste, and refuse to sully my husband's name.
We will tread the same road in life
and in death.⁵⁶
Only a single saddle for a single horse;⁵⁷
There is no need for you to admonish me."⁵⁸

When he had finished exhorting Wu Yüeh-niang, Hsi-men Ch'ing also summoned Ch'en Ching-chi into his presence and said, "Son-in-law, as the saying goes:

If you have raised a son, rely on your son;

If you lack a son, rely on your son-in-law.

As my son-in-law you are the equivalent of a son to me. If I should end up:

High as the hills or deep as the sea, after escorting me to my grave, whatever you do, endeavor to:

Keep the whole household of one mind,⁵⁹ and support your mother-in-law and her sister wives as they live out their lives, without doing anything to arouse the derision of others."

He then went on to instruct him, saying, "The satin piece goods store has a capital worth 50,000 taels of silver, but part of the capital and interest belongs to our kinsman Ch'iao Hung and should be returned to him. Have Manager Fu Ming sell off the stock, one batch at a time, and then close the shop. The knitting and sewing supplies store being managed by Pen the Fourth has a capital worth 6,500 taels of silver, and the silk goods store being managed by Brother-in-law Wu the Second a capital worth 5,000 taels. After selling off the stock, the proceeds should be brought home. As for that contract to supply antiquarian relics to the court that Li the Third has been pursuing, there is no need for us to participate any further. Have Ying the Second find someone else to invest in the scheme. Li the Third and Huang the Fourth still owe us the 500 taels of capital that they borrowed, not to mention the 150 taels of interest that they owe us. If you succeed in collecting these debts, you can use the money to pay for my funeral expenses. You and Manager Fu Ming can continue to operate the two shops in the front of our property. The pawnshop has an operating capital of 20,000 taels, and the pharmaceutical shop one of 5,000 taels. Han Tao-kuo and Lai-pao have 4,000 taels worth of merchandise on their boat in Sung-chiang. As soon as the waterways are open to navigation again, you should go down to meet their boat and bring the cargo back home to be sold. The silver realized by the sale can be used to provide the living expenses for your mother-in-law and the rest of the family. School Official Liu still owes me 340 taels; Assistant Magistrate Hua Ho-lu owes me 50 taels; and Hsü the Fourth's shop outside the city gate still owes me 340 taels of capital and interest. The contracts for these debts are all in my possession, and someone should be sent as soon as possible to press for their collection. In the future, you might as well sell the property across the street and the house on Lion Street as well, since I fear that your mother-in-law and company will be unable to manage them."

When Hsi-men Ch'ing had finished speaking, he broke into tears, accompanied by loud weeping and wailing.

"Father," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "I understand all of your injunctions."

In a little while, Manager Fu Ming, Manager Kan Jun, Brother-in-law Wu the Second, Pen the Fourth, and Ts'ui Pen all came in together to see him, and to ask after his health.

Hsi-men Ch'ing gave each of them his instructions, and they said to him, "Venerable sir, you should relax. Everything will be all right."

Many other people came to ask after his health that day, and upon seeing how serious his condition was, they all departed with a sigh.

Two days passed by, during which Yüeh-niang naively hoped that Hsi-men Ch'ing would recover. Who could have known that:

His fate had already been determined, and he was destined to die in the thirty-third year of his life. On the twenty-first day of the first month, during the fifth watch:

His ministerial fire inflamed his body,⁶⁰

Transforming itself into interior wind.

After panting like an ox for some time, during the period from 9:00 to 11:00 that morning:

Alas and alack,

He stopped breathing and died.

Truly:

So long as one has three inches of breath,

one uses it a thousand ways;

But when the messenger of death shows up,

everything comes to an end.⁶¹

A poet of yore has left us some words of admonition that put this very well:

Humans should try to accumulate good deeds,
Rather than striving to accumulate wealth.
Accumulating good makes one a better person,
Accumulating money only invites catastrophe.
Though Shih Ch'ung was wealthy in his time,
It did not save him from being put to death.
Teng T'ung died suffering from starvation,
What good did the Copper Mountains do him?⁶²
Today is not to be compared to the past,
Peoples' minds are completely befuddled.
They say that accumulating wealth is right,
And deride the idiocy of accumulating good.
How many of those who possess great wealth,
Confront death without so much as a coffin?

It so happens that when Hsi-men Ch'ing died a coffin had not yet been prepared for him. This threw Wu Yüeh-niang into such consternation that she called her brother Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth into her presence, opened a trunk from which she extracted four silver ingots weighing fifty taels apiece, and directed the two of them to see to purchasing a set of coffin boards.

She had hardly sent them on their way when Yüeh-niang was suddenly beset with a pain in her belly, staggered into her room, fell down on the bed, and lost consciousness, becoming:

Oblivious to human affairs.

Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, and Sun Hsüeh-o were all in the next room engaged, hugger-mugger, in putting a T'ang-style cap on Hsi-men Ch'ing's head, and getting him properly dressed in his burial clothes.

All of a sudden, they heard Hsiao-yü come in, and say, "Mother has fallen down onto her bed."

This threw them into such consternation that Meng Yü-lou and Li Chiao-erh went over immediately to see what was happening. They found Yüeh-niang holding her hand on the pain in her belly and realized that she was about to give birth.

Meng Yü-lou told Li Chiao-erh to tend to Yüeh-niang while she went out and dispatched a page boy to go as quickly as possible to summon Midwife Ts'ai. Li Chiao-erh also sent Yü-hsiao to the front compound to summon Ju-i. By the time Meng Yü-lou returned to Yüeh-niang's room, Li Chiao-erh had disappeared. It so happens that Li Chiao-erh, taking advantage of Yüeh-niang's unconscious state, had noticed that the trunk was open and had surreptitiously taken out five silver ingots worth fifty taels apiece and carried them off to her quarters.

Returning with a bunch of absorbent grass paper in her hand, she ran into Meng Yü-lou and said, "I didn't find any grass paper in her room, so I went to my quarters to fetch some."

Meng Yü-lou did not pay much attention to this but devoted herself to tending to Yüeh-niang, and preparing the commode for her. She saw that Yüeh-niang's pain was gradually becoming more intense. No sooner did Midwife Ts'ai arrive than Yüeh-niang gave birth to a child, while in the other room, it was only after they had finished dressing Hsi-men Ch'ing in his burial clothes that he breathed his last breath. At this, the members of the entire household, high and low, started to cry out loud in full voice.

Meanwhile Midwife Ts'ai wrapped the baby in swaddling clothes, cut the umbilical cord, decocted a "heart stabilizing potion," fed it to Yüeh-niang, and then helped her into a sitting position on the heated k'ang.

Wu Yüeh-niang Loses Her Husband but Gives Birth to a Son

Yüeh-niang gave Midwife Ts'ai three taels of silver, but she complained that it was too little, saying, "When that other boy was born I received more than this. You could, at the very least, give me the same amount as before, especially since this boy was born to you as the First Lady of the household."

"The situations are not comparable," said Yüeh-niang. "At that time, Father was still here presiding over the household, but now Father has passed away. You had better make the best of it, and take what you are offered. If you come back for the third-day lustration ceremony, I will give you another tael of silver then."

"I would rather have an outfit of clothing," said Midwife Ts'ai, before expressing her thanks and taking her leave.

When Yüeh-niang became more aware of her surroundings, she noticed that the trunk was wide open and took Yü-hsiao to task, saying, "You lousy little stinker! I may have been unconscious, but you seem to have been unconscious too. The trunk has been lying wide open with all these people about. Why didn't you remind me to lock it?"

"I thought that you had locked the trunk," said Yü-hsiao, "so I didn't bother to check it."

So saying, she got the lock and proceeded to snap it in place.

When Meng Yü-lou saw how suspicious Yüeh-niang seemed to be, she chose not to stay in the room but went outside and remarked to Chin-lien, "What a character our elder sister turns out to be. On the very day of her husband's death, she starts acting defensively toward the rest of us."

She did not realize that Li Chiao-erh had already stolen five silver ingots worth fifty taels apiece and carted them off to her quarters.

That day, Brother-in-law Wu the Second and Pen the Fourth went to the home of Prefectural Judge Shang Liu-t'ang, from whom they purchased a set of coffin boards, and hired carpenters to fit them together to form a coffin. The page boys carried Hsi-men Ch'ing's body out to the large reception hall and proceeded to lay him out appropriately. Yin-yang Master Hsü was also invited to come and interpret his divinatory texts.

Before long, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai also came. Wu the Second and the other managers were all in the front reception hall, where they were busy taking down the lanterns, rolling up the picture scrolls, covering the body with a paper shroud, and putting votive incense lamps, tables, and mats in place, while Lai-an was deputed to strike the chime.

After calculating the time on his fingers, Yin-yang Master Hsü said, "He expired at 8:00 in the morning, and no member of the household will be adversely affected by his baleful spirit."

He then consulted with Yüeh-niang and said, "The encoffining ceremony should take place on the third day after his death, the ground breaking for his tomb should take place on the sixteenth of the second month, and the burial ceremony on the twentieth, a day or so after the fourth weekly commemoration."

After Yin-yang Master Hsü had been entertained and seen on his way, servants were dispatched to various places to inform people of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, and to hand over his seal of office to Ho Yung-shou, while the members of the household devoted themselves to preparing mourning garments for visitors and putting up temporary structures for the funeral observances, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

On the third day, Buddhist monks were engaged to recite sutras for the salvation of the deceased and carry paper money outside to be burned, while the members of the entire household, high and low:

Donned hempen garments and put on mourning apparel.

Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, garbed in untrimmed sackcloth and leaning on a mourning staff, as prescribed for the son of the deceased, bowed to the guests in front of the spirit tablet. Yüeh-niang was not yet able to emerge from her lying-in room, but Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou entertained the female visitors, while P'an Chin-lien took charge of the storeroom and accepted the offertory tables that people presented. Sun Hsüeh-o superintended the servants' wives in the kitchen as they prepared tea and refreshments for the visitors; Manager Fu Ming together with Brother-in-law Wu the Second took charge of the accounts; Ts'ui Pen was placed in charge of monitoring the expenses incurred by providing the guests with mourning wear; Lai-hsing was made responsible for supplying the kitchen; and Brother-in-law Wu K'ai and Manager Kan Jun entertained the male guests.

Midwife Ts'ai came back to conduct the third-day lustration ceremony, and Yüeh-niang presented her with an outfit of silk clothing before sending her on her way. She decided to name her newborn child Hsiao-ko, or Filial Son, and, as custom demanded, sent celebratory noodles to their relatives and neighbors in honor of the occasion.

The neighbors who lived in the vicinity all remarked, "His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing's principal wife has borne him a posthumous son, and this son was delivered on the same day and at the same time that he breathed his last. Such a thing is:

Rarely to be seen in this world.⁶³

It is as weird and strange as can be."

We will say no more at this juncture about how bewildered they all were by this event.

To resume our story, when Ying Po-chüeh heard that Hsi-men Ch'ing had died, he came to offer his condolences and wept tears over it for some time.

The brothers-in-law Wu K'ai and Wu the Second were in the summerhouse, looking on as an artist painted a portrait of Hsi-men Ch'ing, when Ying Po-chüeh came in, greeted them with a bow, and said, "How regrettable! I never dreamed that Brother would pass away this way."

He then asked if Yüeh-niang could come out so that he could pay her his respects, but Wu K'ai replied, "My younger sister is unable to leave her lying-in room for the present. It so happens, thus and so, that she has given birth to a boy on the very day of her husband's death."

Ying Po-chüeh expressed astonishment, saying:

"Can such things be?

Oh well. Oh well. At least Brother will have a male heir, so there will be someone to take charge of the property."

Later on, Ch'en Ching-chi came in, attired in heavy mourning, and kowtowed to Ying Po-chüeh.

Ying Po-chüeh said to him, "Son-in-law! Son-in-law! You are certainly being put to the test. Your father-in-law has died, and your mothers-in-law will be like stagnant water, without any source of livelihood. You must be careful how you deal with the affairs of the household. If problems arise, you must not act on your own, but seek the advice of the two brothers-in-law here. Though it may be impolitic for me to say so, you are still quite young, and not too experienced in handling affairs."

"Brother Ying the Second," said Wu K'ai, "you shouldn't say such things. I have public responsibilities to attend to and have little free time. After all, his mother-in-law is here."

"Brother-in-law," responded Ying Po-chüeh, "though my sister-in-law is here, how can she be expected to take care of external affairs? It would be better if you could lend him your advice. It has always been the case that:

Without distaff relatives one cannot survive;

Without distaff relatives one cannot flourish.

One's mother's brothers are not to be compared with other people. You are a mainstay of the family, venerable sir. Who is there more important than you?"

He then went on to ask, "Has a date been set for the funeral procession?"

"The ground breaking for his tomb," said Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, "will take place on the sixteenth day of the second month, and the burial ceremony on the twentieth, shortly after the fourth weekly commemoration.”

Not long afterwards, Yin-yang Master Hsü arrived to perform the sacrificial announcements and preside over the encoffining ceremony. Hsi-men Ch'ing's body was then laid inside the coffin, the “longevity nails” were driven into the lid, and it was placed in position, with an inscribed funeral banner that read: Casket of Master Hsi-men, Imperially Commissioned Commandant for Military Strategy.

That day, Battalion Commander Ho Yung-shou came to convey his condolences. After he had finished bowing before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, Wu K'ai and Ying Po-chüeh kept him company as he drank a serving of tea. Ho Yung-shou asked what date had been set for the funeral procession and then gave orders that the entire contingent of orderlies and attendants that had been assigned to Hsi-men Ch'ing should remain on duty there, without exception. Only after the date of the funeral procession were they to return to their service at the yamen. He even appointed two underlings to take charge of them and promised that should any instances of disobedience be reported to him, he would see that the culprits were severely punished.

He also said to Wu K'ai, “Venerable brother-in-law, if any outsiders should delay paying their debts to the Hsi-men household, simply report it to me, and your pupil will see that the sums in question are recovered.”

After paying his condolences, he went to the yamen, prepared a report on the vacancy created by Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, and submitted it to the headquarters of the Embroidered Uniform Guard in the Eastern Capital.

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, one day, Lai-chüeh, Ch'un-hung, and Li the Third arrived at the provincial censor's yamen in Yen-chou prefecture and delivered the letter and the accompanying gift they had been entrusted with.

When Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien read Hsi-men Ch'ing's letter and realized that he was seeking to obtain the document authorizing the procurement of antiquarian relics, he said, “If you had only come a step earlier everything would have been all right, but yesterday I sent the authorization for this procurement down to the various prefectures.”

As he thought about it, and noticed that Hsi-men Ch'ing had sealed up ten ounces of gold leaf in the packet, he decided that it would be a pity to refuse and arranged to put up Ch'un-hung, Lai-chüeh, and Li the Third in the yamen, while he dispatched a courier with a validating tally to make haste to Tung-p'ing prefecture and bring back the authorization. When it arrived, he sealed it inside a letter which he entrusted to Ch'un-hung, together with a tael of silver to cover their traveling expenses, and they then set out to return to Ch'ing-ho district. The round trip took them ten days.

As they made their way into the city, they overheard people talking in the street and learned that His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing had died, that this was the third day after his death, and that a sutra recitation and commemorative rites were being conducted in his household.

When Li the Third heard this:

A crafty scheme arose in his mind,⁶⁴ and as they walked along the street, he suggested to Lai-chüeh and Ch'un-hung, “Let's hold back this authorization, saying that Sung Ch'iao-nien refused to give it to us, and go instead to offer it to Chang the Second on Main Street. If you refuse to go along with me, I'll give you ten taels of silver apiece as long as you promise to keep quiet about it when you get home, and not reveal anything.”

Lai-chüeh was tempted by the prospect of this windfall and agreed to the proposition, but Ch'un-hung was reluctant to go along with it and gave only an ambiguous answer.

When they arrived at the gate, they saw that paper money had been brought out to be burnt, that Buddhist monks were performing a ceremony, and that the number of relatives and friends who had come to express their condolences was so great they could hardly be counted. At this prospect, Li the Third parted company with the other two and went to his own home, while Lai-chüeh and Ch'un-hung sought out Wu K'ai and Ch'en Ching-chi and kowtowed to them.

When they were asked if they had succeeded in obtaining the authorization, and why Li the Third was not with them, Lai-chüeh said nothing, but Ch'un-hung took out Censor Sung Ch'iao-nien's letter and the enclosed authorization and handed them to Wu K'ai.

He then proceeded to explain how Li the Third had given each of them ten taels of silver on the road and proposed, thus and so, that they should conceal this fact, hold back the authorization, and join him in going to offer it to Chang the Second.

“How could I be so ungrateful as to:

Forget favor and break faith?”⁶⁵ exclaimed Ch'un-hung. “So I have respectfully made my way home.”

Wu K'ai went back to the rear compound and told Yüeh-niang what had happened, saying, “This youngster really possesses a sense of obligation. How could that rascal of a short-life Li the Third harbor such evil ideas immediately upon learning that my brother-in-law had died a few days ago?”

He then went on to explain the situation to Ying Po-chüeh, saying, “Li Chih and Huang the Fourth signed a loan contract with Hsi-men Ch'ing on which they are obligated to pay back 650 taels of silver in the way of principal and interest. We have been instructed by His Honor Ho Yung-shou to submit this loan contract to the yamen so he can proceed to recover the sum that is owed, and it can be used to cover my brother-in-law's funeral expenses. As a colleague of the deceased, he feels obliged to do him this favor.”

Ying Po-chüeh was thrown into consternation by this and said, “Li the Third certainly ought never to have done such a thing, but before you decide on anything, venerable brother-in-law, let me go and speak to him about it.”

Thereupon, he went straight to Li the Third's place and sent for Huang the Fourth so they could confer about it together.

“You should never have proffered silver to that page boy,” he said. “By so doing you have given him a handle to use against you.

Having failed to snare the fox,

You have only defiled yourself.

They now propose, thus and so, to submit your loan contract to the local office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission and sue you for the return of the money that you owe. As the saying goes:

Officials shield one another.⁶⁶

On top of which, as colleagues in the same office, they will have no reason not to pursue the matter. What likelihood is there that you could resist them? If you will take my advice, you should:

Thus and thus, and

So and so,

surreptitiously present twenty taels of silver to Wu K'ai. You can write it off as something you might have had to expend in Yen-chou prefecture. I have heard that their household is not interested any longer in pursuing this venture. If you can manage somehow to get them to relinquish this authorization, we can go and negotiate a deal with Chang the Second. The two of you should scrape up the sum of two hundred taels, less than that will not do, and also prepare an offertory table. On the one hand, you can present the latter as a sacrificial offering in memory of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing, and on the other hand, you can offer the money to them as a partial payment of your debt, and negotiate a new contract for the remainder, allowing you to repay it in installments out of whatever profits you accrue in the future. That way you can:

Kill two birds with one stone, and smooth things over without rupturing your relationship."

"What you say makes sense," said Huang the Fourth. "Brother Li the Third, you acted too precipitously."

Sure enough, that evening, Huang the Fourth and Ying Po-ch'ieh took twenty taels of silver and went to Wu K'ai's home, where they proceeded, thus and so, to negotiate for the authorization, saying, "Venerable brother-in-law, we rely on your support."

Wu K'ai had already heard his younger sister say that she was no longer interested in pursuing this venture. Moreover, when his black eyes caught sight of the shiny white silver, how could he bring himself to refuse? Therewith, he agreed to their proposition and accepted the silver.

The next day, Li Chih and Huang the Fourth prepared a portable table, replete with a pig's head and the three sacrificial animals, and two hundred taels of silver, and went to offer a sacrifice in Hsi-men Ch'ing's honor. Brother-in-law Wu K'ai had spoken to Yüeh-niang, who agreed to return the original loan contract and make out a new one for the sum of four hundred taels, forgiving them fifty taels of the original amount they owed, and allowing them to return the remainder in installments out of the proceeds of their business transactions. The document authorizing the local procurement of antiquarian relics for the court was also handed over to Ying Po-ch'ieh, who went with them to collaborate with Chang the Second in bidding for the contract. But no more of this. Truly:

Only when gold is subjected to smelting is its quality assessed;

Only when humans are tempted by riches are their hearts exposed.⁶⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The Creator does not demand too much from human beings;
Only urging them, in all things, to rein in their hearts.
Though you may wish to appropriate
the property of another,
There will be someone in your wake to do the same to you.⁶⁸

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

Chapter 80

CH'EN CHING-CHI RESORTS TO PILFERING JADE AND PURLOINING PERFUME;¹ LI CHIAO-ERH MAKES OFF WITH THE SILVER AND RETURNS TO THE BROTHEL

THERE IS A POEM that reads:

When temples collapse the resident monks are few;
When bridges fall down the crossers are not many.
When households are poor their servants are lazy;
When officials retire their inferiors scorn them.
When waters are shallow the fish will not remain;
When forests are scanty the birds will not roost.
The way of the world responds to cold and warmth;
Human prestige is thereby enhanced or diminished.²

These eight lines of verse refer to the fact that:

Warmth and coldness convey the way of the world;³

Human sentiments respond to failure and success.

This phenomenon is much to be regretted.

On the first of the seven weekly commemorations of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, Buddhist Superior Lang, the abbot of the Pao-en Temple, or Temple of Kindness Required, led a contingent of sixteen monks to come and perform a "land and water" mass for the salvation of the deceased. Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor came to attend the ceremony and secured the job of presiding over the services for the second weekly commemoration. The household of Ch'iao Hung also made a sacrificial contribution for the occasion. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Ying Po-chüeh got together with several friends who were present for the ceremony. The first of these was Ying Po-chüeh himself; the second was Hsieh Hsi-ta; the third was Hua Tzu-yu; the fourth was Chu Jih-nien; the fifth was Sun T'ien-hua; the sixth was Ch'ang Shih-chieh; and the seventh was Pai Lai-ch'iang.

When the seven of them had sat down together, Ying Po-chüeh addressed them, saying, "His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing is dead, and the second of the seven weekly commemorations of his death is at hand. In the course of our relationship with him, we have eaten off of him, made use of him, spent money of his, borrowed things from him, and sponged off him. Now that he is dead, we can hardly pretend not to acknowledge all this, or get away with:

Scattering sand in order to blind the eyes of those behind us.

When he comes before King Yama in the fifth court of the underworld he is unlikely to exonerate us. The best thing to do is for each of us to come up with one mace of silver, making seven mace in all. We can spend one mace and six candareens to purchase a portable table replete with flowers, five bowls of viands, and five saucers of fruits; one mace to purchase a portion of the three sacrificial animals; one mace and five candareens to purchase a flagon of wine; five candareens to purchase paper money for the use of the dead, incense, and candles; two mace to purchase a commemorative scroll and engage Licentiate Shui to compose a funeral eulogy; and one mace and two candareens to hire bearers to convey these purchases before His Honor's spirit tablet where we can present them as a sacrificial offering. We will actually come out ahead, since they will provide each of us with a length of mourning damask worth seven candareens, which we can take home and use to make skirt waists out of. Moreover, they are hardly likely to let us go home without feeding us a meal, and on the day of the burial ceremony we can not only eat our fill at the graveyard but also take home half a table's worth of food from the graveside tables to feed to our wives and children, thus saving them two or three day's worth of money for snacks. What do you think of this proposal?"

They responded with one voice, saying, "Brother, what you say makes sense."

Thereupon, they each contributed the proposed amount of silver and turned it over to Ying Po-chüeh to take care of procuring the sacrificial offerings, purchasing the commemorative scroll, and engaging Licentiate Shui, who resided outside the city wall, to compose a funeral eulogy for the occasion.

Licentiate Shui was well aware that Ying Po-chüeh and his cronies had chosen to ingratiate themselves with Hsi-men Ch'ing, with whom they had formed:

A cabal of petty men.⁴

He therefore chose to refer suggestively to this fact in the eulogy that he composed. This was duly inscribed on the commemorative scroll, which was taken by the seven of them, together with their sacrificial offerings, and displayed before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet. Ch'en Ching-chi, clad in his mourning garments, returned their salutations. With Ying Po-chüeh taking the lead, each of them proceeded to show their respects with an offering of incense. They were all too unsophisticated to grasp the hidden significance of the eulogy. After a libation of wine had been poured, the text of the eulogy was intoned out loud, and read as follows:

On this, the third day keng-yin, of the second month, the first day of which was wu-tzu, in the year wu-hsi, the first year of the Ch'ung-ho reign period, his devoted servants Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, Hua Tzu-yu, Chu Jih-nien, Sun T'ien-hua, Ch'ang Shih-chieh, and Pai Lai-ch'iang respectfully offer a pure libation along with other offertory foods in sacrifice before the spirit tablet of His Honor the late officer of the Embroidered Uniform Guard Hsi-men Ch'ing. During his life, the deceased was upright and unbending, possessed of a rigid and ramrodlike nature. He neither feared the weak nor succumbed to the hard. He was ever ready to share his water with those in need, or moisten them with his dew. In succoring those who were stripped bare, his purse was plentifully supplied. His bearing was manly, ever prepared to respond to stimulation, or succumb to temptation. He lived in the company of brocade trousers, and hid himself amid encircling waistbands. Though his body had eight bulges, he did not bother to scratch them; but when assailed by lice, it itched unbearably. We recipients of his largess have been content to hang around between his legs, joining him to sleep amid the "willows" in the quarter,⁵ and keeping him company during sprees in the bordellos. Ever engaged in sticking his neck out and horning in, he took pride in his ability to maintain even a prolonged conflict. Who could have foreseen that he would come down with an ailment from which he would never rise again?⁶ Now he has died with his legs stretched out straight, leaving behind a son like a turtledove dropping its egg. On whom are we to rely? We can no longer visit the camps of mist and flowers, or sponge off the bordellos with their peaked red walls.⁷ We can no longer feast with him while embracing soft jade, or ride with him to enjoy warm fragrance. We are left with nothing to do but hang our heads and stamp our feet, abandoned to dangle around lackadaisically. Now we present an oblation of milky muck, followed by a meager libation. Should the spirit of the deceased not be incognizant of our actions,⁸ may it deign to come and enjoy our offering. Pray come and partake thereof.⁹

When they had finished offering their sacrifice, Ch'en Ching-chi expressed his gratitude with an obeisance and invited them into the summerhouse for an ample repast, complete with the usual:

Three soups and five courses, after which, he saw them to the door.

That day, Auntie Li the Third, the madam of the Verdant Spring Bordello, upon hearing that Hsi-men Ch'ing had died:

Laid plans and hatched a scheme,
according to which she prepared an offertory table and dispatched Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh in their sedan chairs to offer paper money and express their condolences. Yüeh-niang did not come out to welcome them, but Li Chiao-erh and Meng Yü-lou entertained them in the master suite.

Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh took the opportunity to speak to Li Chiao-erh surreptitiously, saying, "Our mother says that the man is dead, and we denizens of the licensed quarter are not able to maintain our chastity. It has always been the case that:

Though you erect a thousand li marquee,

There is no party that does not come to an end.¹⁰

If you have any valuables in your hands, you should let Li Ming surreptitiously smuggle them back home for your future use. You mustn't be foolish. As the saying goes:

Though Yang-chou may be wonderful,

It's not a place you would choose to make your home.¹¹

No matter how long it may be, sooner or later you will have to leave this place."

Li Chiao-erh made a mental note of everything they said.

Who could have anticipated that on that day Han Tao-kuo's wife, Wang Liu-erh, also prepared an offertory table, dressed up in attractive mourning garments, took a sedan chair, and came to burn paper money to Hsi-men Ch'ing. After presenting her offerings before his spirit tablet, she stood there for what seemed like half a day, but nobody came out to welcome her. It so happens that during the first week after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, Wang Ching had been dismissed and sent back home. When the page boys saw that Wang Liu-erh had arrived, none of them dared to go inside and report it.

Lai-an, however:

Not understanding the true state of affairs, went back to Yüeh-niang's room and said to her, "Han Tao-kuo's wife Auntie Han has come to offer paper money in Father's honor, and she has been left standing there in the front compound for a long time. Your elder brother Wu K'ai sent me to tell you about it."

Wu Yüeh-niang, who still couldn't get over her resentment at what had happened, railed at him, saying, "You crazy louse of a slave! Get out of here. So that Auntie Han, or Auntie Cunt, has shown up, has she? That lousy dog-fucked man-baiting whore! Her shenanigans end up:

Destroying families and killing people;¹²

Impelling fathers south and sons north;¹³

Making husbands abscond and wives flee.¹⁴

How can she have the nerve to come offer her cunt's-worth of paper money?"

This tirade left Lai-an feeling that:

He hardly knew what to do.¹⁵

When he went back before the spirit tablet, and Brother-in-law Wu asked him if he had reported the situation in the rear compound or not, Lai-an merely pouted, without saying anything.

Only after being interrogated for what seemed like half a day did he respond, "Mother really cursed me out."¹⁶

Brother-in-law Wu promptly went back to the rear compound and said to Yüeh-niang, "Sister, how can you act that way? You should stop bandying words that way immediately. It has always been the case that:

People may be bad but civility is not bad.¹⁷

Her husband has a considerable amount of our capital in hand. How can you treat her that way?

A good reputation is not easily obtained.

You must stop carrying on this way. Even if you choose not to go out yourself, you could send the Second Lady or the Third Lady out to greet her, and see her off. That would do just as well. Why should you open yourself to criticism by acting this way?"

It was only when Yüeh-niang realized how censorious her brother was that she had nothing further to say on the subject.

Shortly thereafter, Meng Yü-lou went to welcome Wang Liu-erh with a bow and sat down with her in front of the spirit tablet. After drinking only one cup of tea, the woman felt uncomfortable about remaining any longer, said goodbye, got up, and departed. Truly:

Even if one could draw off all the water
of the West River,
It would hardly suffice to wash away
this day's shame.

Li Kuei-ch'ing, Li Kuei-chieh, and Wu Yin-erh were all sitting in the master suite at the time. Upon hearing Yüeh-niang abuse Han Tao-kuo's wife as every kind of whore, they couldn't help feeling implicated, since:

For every branch you chop down,
A hundred trees are threatened.

The two sisters did not feel comfortable remaining any longer and expressed a wish to go home before the sun set.

Yüeh-niang repeatedly urged the two of them to stay, saying, "This evening, our managers can keep you company while watching the puppet show. You can go home tomorrow."

She continued to urge them to stay for what seemed like half a day, but only Li Kuei-chieh and Wu Yin-erh agreed to remain after seeing off Li Kuei-ch'ing on her way home.

That evening, after the monks had left, sure enough, a good many neighbors, servants, and managers, including Ch'iao Hung, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Brother-in-law Wu the Second, Brother-in-law Shen, Hua Tzu-yu, Ying Po-chüeh, Hsieh Hsi-ta, and Ch'ang Shih-chieh, some twenty people or more, were assembled. A troupe of puppeteers had been hired for the occasion, and they put on their performance in the large temporary structure, where a feast had been prepared for the overnight wake. The piece they performed was the hsi-wen drama about the brothers Sun Jung and Sun Hua, entitled Sha-kou ch'üan-fu (The stratagem of killing a dog to admonish a husband).¹⁸

The female guests were gathered behind standing screens in the reception hall where Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet was located, in front of which a see-through blind had been suspended, and tables had been set up so they could enjoy the show. Li Ming and Wu Hui were engaged to wait upon them and stayed overnight in order to do so. Before long, after everybody had arrived, and the sacrifices had been completed, the candles in the temporary structure were lit, the guests took their seats, the overture of drum music began, and the performance of the hsi-wen drama commenced. It was the third watch before the performance was finished.

It so happens that since the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing not a day passed during which Ch'en Ching-chi failed to flirt with P'an Chin-lien. They either made eyes at each other in front of his spirit tablet, or joked with each other behind the screens.

At this point, taking advantage of the disorder as the guests were leaving, the women were returning to the rear compound, and the servants were clearing away the utensils, Chin-lien gave Ch'en Ching-chi's hand a squeeze while nobody was looking and said, "My son, today your mother will give you what you want. While Hsi-men Ta-chieh is in the rear compound, we can make use of your quarters for the purpose."

This was just what Ch'en Ching-chi had been waiting for, and he promptly went ahead of her to open the door to his quarters. The woman, concealing herself in the shadows, slipped inside behind him, and:

Without saying another word,¹⁹ unfastened her skirt, reclined face up on the k'ang, let:

Her pair of wild ducks fly to his shoulders, and invited Ch'en Ching-chi to commit adultery with her. Truly:

With lustful daring as big as the sky,
what is there to fear?
Amid mandarin duck curtains the clouds and rain:
a lifetime of passion.
Having been acquainted for two years,
They have succeeded in becoming mates.
After having been infatuated so long,
This fine day they have come together.
One of them gently wriggles her willowy waist;
The other makes haste to extend his jade stalk.
Into each other's ears they pour the passions evoked by clouds and rain;
On their pillows they swear to be as faithful as the hills and seas.
What with the oriole's abandon and the butterfly's pursuit,

Their turbulent love-making takes a myriad forms;

P'an Chin-lien Peddles Her Charms in Her Son-in-law's Bed

What with the tempestuous rainfall and the skittish clouds,
Her captivating maneuvers are infinite in number.
One of them, in a lowered voice,
Calls out "darling" incessantly;
The other, locked in an embrace,
Cannot help calling out "daddy."

Truly, it is the case that:

The hue of the willow has abruptly turned a bright new green;
The complexion of the blossom has not lost its previous red.²⁰

Before long, as soon as their bout of clouds and rain was over, the woman, fearing that someone might come in, hastily left the room and went back to the rear compound.

The next day, the young scamp, still savoring the sweet taste of his conquest, went to Chin-lien's quarters early in the morning and found that she was still in bed, not having gotten up yet.

Peeking through the latticework he saw the woman lying there with:

Her rosy countenance wrapped in the quilt;

Her powdered cheeks like fluted jadestone;

and said to her, "What a fine keeper of the storeroom you are, not to be up yet at this hour. Today, Kinsman Ch'iao Hung has come to make a sacrificial offering, and the First Lady has directed that the offertory tables presented yesterday by Li the Third and Huang the Fourth should be taken inside. You should get up immediately, and get the key for me."

The woman promptly told Ch'un-mei to fetch the key for him, and Ch'en Ching-chi sent Ch'un-mei to precede him upstairs and open the door. Meanwhile, the woman stuck her tongue out through the latticework, and the two of them sucked away at each other for a while. Truly, it is the case that:

The aroma of rouge pervades his mouth,

as he swallows her saliva;

Her sweet spittle transfuses his heart, drenching lungs and liver.

There is a song to the tune "Plucking the Cassia" that testifies to this:

It was annoying that the cries of the cuckoo penetrated the beaded blind.
Our hearts seemed stitched together;
Our mutual feelings were like glue.
But all I saw was her smiling face on which,
The hollow cheeks were sad,
The powdered eyebrows thin.
Her fingers were emaciated.
Her chignon was disheveled, hanging loose from its turquoise pins;
Her sleepy face was flushed, its jadelike pallor daubed with red.
Having tasted her sandalwood mouth,
The aroma still lingers on my lips.
I cannot help recalling the sweet taste.²¹

In a little while, after Ch'un-mei had opened the door to the storeroom on the second floor, Ch'en Ching-chi went back to the front compound to take care of moving the offertory tables.

Before long, the sacrificial offering presented by the Ch'iao Hung household was duly put in place. After Ch'iao Hung's wife, and Ch'iao Hung himself, along with a number of their relations, had finished presenting their sacrificial offering in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Brother-in-law Wu the Second, and Manager Kan Jun invited them into the temporary structure, where Li Ming and Wu Hui stood ready to play and sing for their entertainment.

That day, Cheng Ai-yüeh from the licensed quarter also came to offer paper money and express her condolences, and Yüeh-niang told Meng Yü-lou to provide her with a mourning skirt and girdle, and invite her to join the other female guests who were gathered in the rear compound.

When Cheng Ai-yüeh saw that Wu Yin-erh and Li Kuei-chieh were already there, she was annoyed at the two of them for not keeping her informed and said, "If I had known about Father's death, I would hardly have failed to come before this. A fine pair you are, not to have gotten together with me about it."

When she found that Yüeh-niang had given birth to a son, she said, "Mother, you have:

One cause for joy and one cause for sorrow.²²

It is too bad that Father passed away before his time, but now that you have an heir, you need not worry about the future."

Yüeh-niang saw that everyone was provided with mourning garb and kept them there until the evening, when the party broke up.

The third day of the second month was the time for Hsi-men Ch'ing's second weekly commemoration, and on that occasion Abbot Wu Tsung-che of the Taoist Temple of the Jade Emperor led a contingent of sixteen Taoist priests to recite scriptures and perform rites at his residence. On that day, Ho Yung-shou took the initiative in inviting Eunuch Director Liu, Eunuch Director Hsüeh, Commandant Chou Hsiu, Commander-General Ching Chung, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, and Commander Yün Li-shou, his fellow military officers, to join with him in offering a sacrifice in Hsi-men Ch'ing's honor. Yüeh-niang invited Ch'iao Hung, her elder brother Wu K'ai, and Ying Po-chüeh to keep them company and arranged for Li Ming and Wu Hui, the two boy musicians, to play and sing for them in the temporary structure, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

That evening, after the scripture recitations were concluded, and the spirit of the deceased had been bidden farewell, Yüeh-niang gave orders that Li P'ing-erh's spirit tablet and portrait should be taken outside and burned, and that her trunks of possessions should be carried into the master suite and stored there. She also decided that the wet nurse Ju-i and Ying-ch'un should be kept in the rear compound to work there, gave Hsiu-ch'un to Li Chiao-erh to serve in her quarters, and locked the door of Li P'ing-erh's former quarters. Alas! Truly:

The painted beams and carved rafters are not yet dry;

But the doting occupant is no longer to be seen inside.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Beneath the terrace of King Hsiang of Ch'u
the water flows on unhurried;
A single case of heartsickness is able to produce sorrow in two places.
The moon itself is completely oblivious of the changes in human affairs;
As, late at night, it continues to shine on the crest of the plastered wall.²³

At this time, every day, Li Ming, on the pretext of helping out in the coffin chamber, surreptitiously urged Li Chiao-erh to secretly hand over her valuables to him so he could smuggle them out and take them back to the brothel. After each trip, he would return in order to continue helping out, staying away from home for two or three nights. He succeeded thereby in pulling the wool over Yüeh-niang's eyes, and no one dared to put a stop to it because her brother, Wu the Second, had been engaging in hanky-panky with Li Chiao-erh.

On the ninth day of the second month, the scripture recitation for the third weekly commemoration of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death was performed, and Yüeh-niang emerged from her lying-in room. No monks came to recite scriptures for the fourth weekly commemoration, and on the twenty-sixth day of the month, Ch'en Ching-chi went to take care of the ground breaking for the tomb and then returned home. The funeral procession took place on the twentieth day of the month and involved a considerable number of burial objects and papier-mâché funerary fabrications, as well as people who came to escort the casket, but the crowd was not nearly as large as it had been for Li P'ing-erh's funeral procession.

When the coffin was ready to be carried outside, Ch'en Ching-chi prepared to perform the role of filial son by smashing an earthenware crock to signal that the procession was about to begin, and accompanying the casket on foot, keeping one hand upon it. Buddhist Superior Lang, the abbot of the Pao-en Temple, was invited to preside over the ceremony of raising the coffin. Sitting in his sedan chair, in an elevated position, he recited a few lines of eulogy about Hsi-men Ch'ing's life that put it very well.

In solemn commemoration of the spirit of the late Commandant for Military Strategy in the Embroidered Uniform Guard, His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing. For humans living in this world,

The flash of lightning is quickly extinguished;
The spark from a flint is difficult to sustain.
Fallen blossoms are not fated to return to the tree; Flowing water is not destined to return to its source.
Though living in painted hall and brocade room,
When your life is over, it is like a windblown lamp;
Though you enjoy supreme rank and lofty office,
When your time is up, they resemble nothing but dreams.
Yellow gold and white jade,
Are merely prerequisites for disaster;
Red powder and light furs,
Are but the expenses of mundane labor.
Wives and children cannot ensure a lifetime of happiness;
The darkness of the grave entails
a myriad forms of grief.
One fine day, while sleeping on your pillow,
You'll end up underneath the Yellow Springs.
An empty epitaph will proclaim your specious fame;
The yellow earth will entomb
your fragile bones.
Your hundred acres of fields and gardens,
Will only create dissension among your sons and daughters;
Your thousand trunks of satin and brocade,
Will not furnish you an inch of thread

after your death.²⁴
When we expire like wind or fire, neither the old nor the young are spared;
When the hills and streams are eroded away, what heroes will there be?²⁵
It is bitter! Bitter! Bitter!
The breath is transformed into a clear breeze,
the dust returns to earth;
Once your three inches of breath are finished,²⁶
they will go and not return;
The head is altered and the face replaced an infinite number of times.

As the poem says:

In this life the hardest thing to bear is the coming of death;
Every one of us, on approaching the end,
is frantically disturbed.
The elements earth, water, fire, and wind²⁷
mutually assail us;
Our spirits and our ethereal and material souls all fly away.
While still alive, we do not know how to seek the road to life;
After our death, who knows what will be our final destination?
Every last thing that we possess, we are unable to take with us;
Without so much as a stitch of clothing²⁸
we must face King Yama.

When Buddhist Superior Lang had finished reciting the eulogy, Ch'en Ching-chi smashed the earthenware crock in which the paper money had been burned, and the casket was raised and carried on its way. The members of the household, both high and low, as well as the relatives, dressed in mourning garb, all wept until:

Their cries shook the heavens.

Wu Yüeh-niang sat in the sedan chair designated for the conveyance of the soul of the departed right behind the casket, while the female guests followed in the wake of the procession as it made its way to the family graveyard five li outside the South Gate for the interment. Ch'en Ching-chi had prepared a gift of a bolt of silk for Commander Yün Li-shou and asked him to perform the ceremony of dotting the spirit tablet. Yin-yang Master Hsü presided over the interment, and the relatives in their mourning garb participated by each throwing a spadeful of earth into the tomb. Unfortunately, the offertory tables produced at the graveside were not many in number, consisting only of those presented by Brother-in-law Wu K'ai, Ch'iao Hung, Ho Yung-shou, Brother-in-law Shen, Brother-in-law Han, and the five or six managers of Hsi-men Ch'ing's business enterprises. Abbot Wu Tsung-che also left twelve Taoist acolytes behind to preside over the return of the spirit tablet, which was placed in a position of honor in the parlor of the master suite. After the tablet had been set in place, and Yin-yang Master Hsü had performed a ritual purification, the crowd of relatives departed, and Wu Yüeh-niang and her fellow wives kept vigil beside his spirit tablet as an expression of their filiality.

A day or so later, after they had returned from the ceremony of revisiting the grave, Wu Yüeh-niang sent all the orderlies and adjutants who had been assigned to serve Hsi-men Ch'ing back to the yamen.

On the occasion of the fifth weekly commemoration of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, Yüeh-niang invited Nun Hsüeh, Nun Wang, and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery, along with twelve nuns, to recite sutras, and perform a litany of repentance, in order to release Hsi-men Ch'ing's soul from purgatory and allow it to be reborn in Heaven. Sister-in-law Wu and Wu Shun-ch'en's wife, Third sister Cheng, both came to keep her company.

It so happens that on the day of the burial ceremony, Li Kuei-ch'ing and Li Kuei-chieh, while at the graveside, had secretively spoken to Li Chiao-erh, thus and so, saying, "Mother says that you ought to consider the fact that since you no longer have anything of value in your hands, there is no reason for you to remain any longer in his household. You have no sons or daughters, so what is there to keep you there? She suggests that you initiate a quarrel that will give you an excuse for breaking clear of the place. The other day, Brother Ying the Second came and reported that His Honor Chang the Second who lives on Main Street is willing to spend five hundred taels of silver to acquire you as his Second Lady and let you take charge of his household. If you go there, you can get a new start in life, whereas if you remain faithful to his memory until you grow old and die, what will you gain by that? After all, as denizens of the licensed quarter we are accustomed to:

Abandoning the old to welcome the new,
and seeking advantage by:

Playing up to the rich and successful.²⁹

We can hardly afford to waste our time."

Li Chiao-erh made a mental note of everything they said and resolved that after the fifth weekly commemoration of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, she would:

Let the wind fan the flames,

And take the easiest course.³⁰

Who could have anticipated that P'an Chin-lien would tell Sun Hsüeh-o, "On the day of the burial ceremony, while we were at the graveside, I saw Li Chiao-erh engaged in private conversation with Brother-in-law Wu the Second in one of the small chambers in the garden. And Ch'un-mei, with her own eyes, also saw Li Chiao-erh, behind the screen in the coffin chamber, hand over a package of goods to Li Ming, who stuffed it into his waist and took it home with him."

When Yüeh-niang got word of this, she called her brother, Wu the Second, onto the carpet and told him off, sending him back to the shop to take care of the business, and refusing him permission to enter the rear compound in the future. She also ordered P'ing-an, who was in charge of the gate, not to let Li Ming in anymore. At this, the former prostitute, Li Chiao-erh:

Her discomfiture turning into anger, felt that she had found just the pretext she was looking for. One day, because Yüeh-niang was drinking tea with Sister-in-law Wu in the master suite and had invited Meng Yü-lou but not invited her, she got into:

A vituperative altercation, with Yüeh-niang, pounding on the base of Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, weeping and wailing, and yelling and screaming. While in her quarters, at the third watch in the middle of the night, she threatened to hang herself, and when her maidservant reported this to Yüeh-niang, she panicked. After consulting with Sister-in-law Wu, Yüeh-niang summoned Auntie Li the Third, the madam of the Li Family Establishment, to negotiate about sending her back to the bordello.

Auntie Li the Third, who was apprehensive that she might be forced to leave all her clothes and jewelry behind, interjected a few words, saying, "This kinswoman of mine, while here, has been forced to:

Humble herself and experience humiliation,³¹

Taking the blame for the faults of others.

If you insist on severing the relationship, hard as it may be for her, you ought to offer her the sum of several tens of taels of silver to compensate her for her embarrassment."

Wu K'ai, as the occupant of an official post, was reluctant to express an opinion on the matter, one way or the other, but after negotiating for what seemed like half a day, he suggested that Yüeh-niang should let her keep all the clothing, jewelry, luggage, bedding, and other accessories from her quarters, and send her on her way, but not permit her to take the maidservants Yüan-hsiao and Hsiu-ch'un with her.

Li Chiao-erh really wanted to retain the two maidservants, but Yüeh-niang adamantly refused to allow this, saying, "You must only want to procure them in order to make prostitutes out of them."

This accusation threw the procuress into such consternation that she did not dare utter another word on the subject, but put on an ingratiating smile and said farewell to Yüeh-niang, while Li Chiao-erh got into a sedan chair and was borne off to the bordello.

Gentle reader take note: The singing girls in the licensed quarter make their living by flaunting their beauty, and depend for their livelihood on rouge and powder. In the morning, they take on Dashing Chang, and in the evening they engage Wastrel Li. They let fathers in the front door, while opening the rear door for their sons.

Li Chiao-erh Steals the Silver and Returns to the Brothel

Abandoning the old to welcome the new,
 Their eyes open at the sight of money.³²
 This is a self-evident principle.

Before they are taken into your home, they pester you incessantly, allowing you to burn incense upon them and cutting off locks of hair, threatening to commit suicide and pleading for wedlock. But once they are taken into your home and allowed to marry out of their profession, no matter what efforts you may make to:

Play up to them a thousand ways, or Ensnare them with a myriad wiles,
 You cannot control the monkeys of their minds or the horses of their wills.

If they do not choose to fatten themselves at your expense while you are still alive, they will find a pretext for deserting your household once you are dead. Sooner or later, they will revert to:

Eating congee out of their old pot.³³

Truly:

If a serpent is confined in a tube,

its sinuosity will remain;³⁴
If a bird is released from its cage, it will resume its flight.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

It is regrettable that the "misty willows"
are so very inconstant;
In their nuptial chambers they entertain new grooms every night.
Their jadelike wrists pillow the heads of thousands of patrons;
Their single daubs of ruby lips are tasted
by a myriad customers.
Though they are given to assuming a host of voluptuous attitudes;
Their congenial hearts and feelings are utterly untrustworthy.
No matter how adept you may think yourself to be at controlling them;
There is no way of guaranteeing they won't long for their former ways.³⁵

After sending Li Chiao-erh on her way, Yüeh-niang couldn't help weeping, and the others present did their best to comfort her. "Sister," said P'an Chin-lien, "forget it. Don't let it disturb you so. As the saying goes:

When a man marries a whore it is like keeping a sea eagle:
Without access to the water, it longs for the Eastern Sea.

She is merely returning to her former profession. There is no reason for you to be so disturbed by it today."

Just as the household was in a state of perturbation, P'ing-an suddenly came in and announced, "His Honor the salt-control censor Ts'ai Yün is here, sitting in the reception hall. I told him that Father had died, and he asked how long ago it happened. I told him that he had died of an illness on the twenty-first day of the first month, and that the seventh weekly commemoration of his death had already taken place. He asked whether there was a spirit tablet, or not, and I told him there was one, and that it was set up in the rear compound. He asked if he could pay his respects to it, and I have come to tell you about it."

"Get our son-in-law to go out and welcome him," directed Yüeh-niang.

Before long, Ch'en Ching-chi, attired in his mourning clothes, went out to welcome Censor Ts'ai Yün, and sometime later, after the appropriate preparations had been made, invited him back to the rear compound where he paid his respects to Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet.

Yüeh-niang, attired in heavy mourning, came out to bow to him in return, but without exchanging so much as a word with her, he merely said, "Lady, pray return to your chamber."

He then went on to say to Ch'en Ching-chi, "In the past I have often put your household to the trouble of entertaining me, and now that my tour of duty has expired and I am about to return to the capital, I have come to express my gratitude to him. Who could have anticipated that he would already have passed away?"

He then went on to ask, "What illness did he die of?"

"It was an ailment produced by phlegm-fire," replied Ch'en Ching-chi.

"How regrettable! How regrettable!" said Censor Ts'ai Yün.

He then summoned his attendants to bring out two bolts of Hang-chou silk, a pair of velvet socks, four preserved whitefish, and four jars of candied sweetmeats, saying, "May these paltry gifts serve, for lack of anything better, as sacrificial offerings for the dead."

He also brought out a packet containing fifty taels of silver, saying, "This is a sum that His Honor was generous enough to lend me in the past. Now that I have been able to draw upon my official salary, I am returning it as a mark of our abiding friendship. Tell your servant to take it inside."

"Your Honor is being overly conscientious," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, and Yüeh-niang said, "Will Your Honor please take a seat in the front reception hall?"

"There is no need for me to stay any longer," replied Censor Ts'ai Yün. "But if you will offer me some tea, I will drink a cup, that's all."

The attendants promptly brought in a serving of tea, and after drinking it, Censor Ts'ai Yün nonchalantly stood up, got into his sedan chair, and went his way.

Upon receiving these fifty taels of silver, Yüeh-niang felt happy at heart on the one hand, but somewhat stricken on the other. She remembered how, on former occasions, when high officials of this kind visited they would never have been allowed to leave after such scanty entertainment but would have been invited to stay and drink for who knows how long. But now that Hsi-men Ch'ing had died:

With his legs stretched out straight, though she still possessed his property, it was obvious that there was no one left to properly entertain visitors. Truly:

When men form friendships, it is like enjoying the breeze and the moonlight;

When Heaven unfurls a landscape,³⁶ it exposes one to its rivers and mountains.³⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Behind gently closed double doors, the spring days seem long;
For whom does she toss and turn as she resents time's passing?
How winsome are her incomparable glances like autumn ripples;
As she yearns in silence for her lover, shedding lines of tears.³⁸

The story goes that as soon as Ying Po-chüeh learned that Li Chiao-erh had returned to the bordello, he reported the fact to Chang the Second, who went and spent five taels of silver to spend the night with her. It so happens that Chang the Second was one year younger than Hsi-men Ch'ing, was born in the year of the hare, and was thirty-one years old. Li Chiao-erh was thirty-three years old, but Auntie Li the Third, the madam of the bordello, reduced her age by six years, claiming that she was only twenty-seven, and induced Ying Po-chüeh to conceal the truth about it. Chang the Second consequently paid three hundred taels of silver to acquire her and took her home to be his Second Lady. Meanwhile, Sticky Chu and Blabbermouth Sun continued, as before, to inveigle Wang the Third into patronizing the Li Family Establishment and carrying on with Li Kuei-chieh. But no more of this.

Ying Po-chüeh, along with Li the Third and Huang the Fourth, borrowed five thousand taels of silver from Eunuch Director Hsü, while Chang the Second put up another five thousand taels, which enabled them to secure the contract from Tung-p'ing prefecture for the procurement of antiquarian relics. Every day, on their:

Large horses with jeweled saddles, they paraded through the licensed quarter. Upon the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, Chang the Second spent another thousand taels of silver to bribe the imperial relative, Military Affairs Commissioner Cheng Chü-chung, in the Eastern Capital to intervene with Chu Mien, the defender-in-chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, and have him appointed to the position of judicial commissioner left vacant by the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing. He also improved his property by purchasing a garden and putting up some new structures. Ying Po-chüeh did not let a day go by without frequenting his place and toadying up to him, and told him every last thing he knew about the affairs of the Hsi-men household, both great and small.

He said to him, "In his household there is the Fifth Lady, P'an Chin-lien, the sixth child in her generation, who is extremely attractive and as pretty as a picture. When it comes to poetry, lyrics, songs or rhapsodies; the works of the hundred schools; the various word games played by breaking characters down into their component parts; or backgammon and elephant chess; there is little she has not mastered. Moreover, she knows how to read, writes a good hand, and is adept at playing the balloon guitar. This year she is not more than twenty-nine years old and is cleverer than any singing girl."

His speech had the effect of lighting a fire in Chang the Second's heart, and he could hardly wait to get his hands on her.

"Was she not the wife of that Wu the Elder who made his living peddling steamed wheat cakes?" he asked.

"That's the one," replied Ying Po-chüeh. "It has been five or six years by now since Hsi-men Ch'ing took her into his household, but I don't know whether she is thinking of remarrying, or not."

"Could I trouble you to inquire on my behalf?" said Chang the Second. "If she is willing to remarry, come tell me about it, and I will arrange to marry her."

"There is someone beholden to me who is working as a servant in that household," said Ying Po-chüeh. "His name is Lai-chüeh, and I will speak to him about it. If there is any indication that she is thinking of remarrying, I will let you know. If you are lucky enough to succeed in marrying her and taking her into your household, she would be superior to any singing girl. Originally, while Hsi-men Ch'ing was still alive, he went to great lengths in order to acquire her. As a general rule:

Everything has its rightful owner,³⁹

so there is no telling how it will turn out, but it would be a most propitious union. Now that you are possessed of such influence and prestige, if you should fail to obtain this beautiful mate, to:

Share in your glory and luxury,⁴⁰ all your wealth and distinction would be in vain. I will get Lai-chüeh to surreptitiously inquire on your behalf. If there should be the slightest indication of her willingness to remarry, I will employ my:

Honeyed words and plausible speeches,

To awaken her libidinal propensities.

If you are willing to spend several hundred taels of silver, you can bring her into your household and enjoy her to your heart's content."

Gentle reader take note: Such profligate hangers-on are nothing but:

Petty people seeking personal advantage.⁴¹

On seeing other persons to be influential and wealthy, in order to secure food and clothing for themselves they will do everything in their power to play up to them, praising their merit and eulogizing their virtue. If they should be spendthrifts, they will extol them for being:

Open-handed with their wealth and chivalrous by nature,⁴²

Heroic exemplars of magnanimity.⁴³

Shrugging their shoulders and smiling ingratiatingly,⁴⁴

Offering their children and surrendering their wives,⁴⁵

There is no length to which they will not go.

But, no sooner do they see that:

Their forecourts have become deserted,⁴⁶

than they start to:

Belittle them both openly and covertly,

Accusing them of dealing irresponsibly;

saying that they are unwilling to:

Found families and establish livelihoods;⁴⁷

That their ancestors must have been evil,

To have produced such unworthy offspring.

Despite the profound kindness they have received in the past, they treat them as though they were strangers on the road. Originally, Hsi-men Ch'ing had been so close to Ying Po-chüeh that they were:

Like glue and like lacquer, more intimate with each other than brothers. Hardly a day passed during which he failed to sponge off him, wear something of his, or benefit from his largess; but soon after his death, while his body was still warm, he committed a series of unrightful acts. Truly:

In painting a tiger, you can paint the skin,

but you can't paint the bones;

In knowing people, you can know their faces,

but you can't know their hearts.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In former years their friendship for each other was like gold or orchids;

He did everything he could to toady up to him, leaving no stone unturned.

But today, no sooner is Hsi-men Ch'ing's body safely buried in the grave,

Than he does his best to induce his concubines to sleep with someone else.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,

Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

HAN TAO-KUO TAKES ADVANTAGE OF A CHANCE TO APPROPRIATE THE GOODS; T'ANG LAI-PAO DEFRAUDS HIS MASTER AND DISREGARDS HIS BENEVOLENCE

All things are determined by Heaven,¹ there is no point in seeking to alter them;²
The Lord of Heaven's control of just retribution is both clear and inescapable.
Those who give rein to their lascivious thoughts and defile the wives of others;
Will suffer the ingratitude of subordinates who betray them and steal their goods.
Not to mention the fact that after one is dead others will be up to their tricks;
It has ever been true that when one loses power one's servants will be ungrateful.
It is deplorable that Hsi-men Ch'ing should have accumulated such unfavorable karma;
That he enabled unscrupulous scoundrels to enjoy his wealth for half their lifetimes.

THE STORY GOES that after Hsi-men Ch'ing had entrusted Han Tao-kuo and Lai-pao with four thousand taels of silver and sent them to the Chiang-nan region to purchase goods, they proceeded along the way:

Imbibing the wind and resting by water.³

Stopping by night and traveling by day, until they arrived in Yang-chou, where they sought out the home of Miao Ch'ing in order to secure accommodations. When Miao Ch'ing read Hsi-men Ch'ing's handwritten note and remembered how he had done him:

The favor of saving his life, he did everything in his power to entertain the two of them, enabling them to spend their days:

Scanning the flowers and inspecting the willows,

Drinking wine and seeking to gratify themselves.⁴

One day, early in the winter:

The frigid clouds were austere,

The crying geese were desolate,

The trees were shedding leaves,⁵

The landscape had turned bleak,

Homesickness was insurmountable.⁶

Thereupon, the two of them exerted themselves to visit one place after another, spending their remaining resources to purchase piece goods, and storing them in Miao Ch'ing's home preparatory to their departure.

Prior to this, Han Tao-kuo engaged the services of a singing girl named Wang Yü-chih from the Old Quarter in Yang-chou, whom he had patronized in the past, and Lai-pao engaged the services of the younger sister of Lin Ts'ai-hung, named Lin Hsiao-hung, to help them entertain the Yang-chou salt merchant Wang Ssu-feng and Miao Ch'ing on a daylong excursion to Pao-ying Lake, which was some distance from Yang-chou.

When they arrived back in the licensed quarter, it turned out to be the birthday of the madam of Wang Yü-chih's establishment, and Han Tao-kuo invited them all to a party to celebrate Auntie Wang the First's birthday. For this purpose, he sent his young employee Hu Hsiu to purchase wine and comestibles for the occasion, and also to invite the traveling merchants Wang Tung-ch'iao and Ch'ien Ch'ing-ch'uan to join them. Who could have anticipated that the two of them, along with Wang Ssu-feng, duly showed up, but Hu Hsiu did not return until sunset.

Han Tao-kuo, who was already somewhat inebriated, took him to task, saying, "Who knows where this rascal has been guzzling wine, only to show up now? He is reeking with alcohol, and our guests have already been here for what seems like half a day. Who knows where you have come from, but you can be sure I'll reckon with you tomorrow."

Hu Hsiu looked askance at him and left the room, muttering as he went, "You have some nerve to take me to task when at home your wife is:

Lying down with spread legs to solicit trade,
and you are here:

Clambering on top in order to drop your load.

Your master back at home is patronizing your wife and fucking the life out of her, which is the only reason he has entrusted capital to you to do business out of town. Meanwhile, you are enjoying yourself here while your wife is suffering who knows what at home. It's only because no one has exposed your true state of affairs that you are still able to play the role of a decent human being."

He said all this in the presence of Wang Yü-chih's madam, who took him outside and admonished him, saying, "Master Hu, you are drunk. You'd better go into your room and sleep it off."

Hu Hsiu, however:

Making all kinds of threatening noises, refused to go into his room.

Who could have anticipated that Han Tao-kuo, who was engaged in entertaining his guests, formally garbed in a white satin robe cut like that of a Taoist priest, over an undergown of green wool, felt shoes, and woolen socks, should have overheard the way in which Hu Hsiu was:

Letting off his hot stinking farts of protest,⁷ and become enraged.

Striding outside, he gave him two swift kicks and cursed him, saying, "You lousy uncouth slave! As long as I can afford to pay you five cash a day, I will have no trouble finding a replacement. You can get out of here immediately."

But Hu Hsiu refused to leave; standing in the courtyard and raising his voice, he said, "What right have you to drive me out? I haven't been remiss in handling the accounts, while you are patronizing whores, yet you want to get rid of me. Just see if I don't report what you've been up to when I get home."

Lai-pao endeavored to pacify Han Tao-kuo and pulled Hu Hsiu aside, saying to him, "Dog bone that you are, you're altogether too hard-nosed when you're drunk."

"Uncle Pao," Hu Hsiu responded, "Don't you interfere. What have I had to drink? Let me have it out with him."

But Lai-pao persisted in pushing him into his room and putting him to bed. Truly:

Wine does not befuddle people, they befuddle themselves.

Beauty does not delude people, they delude themselves.⁸

Lai-pao succeeded in getting Hu Hsiu back to his room and putting him to sleep. But no more of this.

Han Tao-kuo was apprehensive lest the traveling merchants he was entertaining would laugh at him, so he and Lai-pao returned to the party where:

Drinking vessels and game tallies lay helter-skelter, and proceeded to offer wine to his guests and help them to amuse themselves. The three singing girls, the two sisters Lin Ts'ai-hung and Lin Hsiao-hung, along with Wang Yü-chih:

Played their instruments and sang and danced,
as the company enjoyed themselves:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade,
Gaming at forfeits and playing at guess-fingers,
until the third watch before the party broke up.

The next day, Han Tao-kuo wanted to give Hu Hsiu a beating, but Hu Hsiu protested, saying, "I don't remember a thing about it."

Lai-pao and Miao Ch'ing:

Resorting to both appeals and threats,⁹ succeeded in persuading him to desist.

To make a long story short, one day, when they had finished making their purchases of piece goods and had packed them up and loaded them onto their boat, Miao Ch'ing presented them with some parting gifts, and a copy of their accounts, and saw the two of them off, together with Hu Hsiu. Wang Yü-chih, along with Lin Ts'ai-hung and her sister, also saw fit to serve them with drinks at a farewell party on the dock. They set out on the tenth day of the first month, but of the events of their trip there is nothing to tell.¹⁰

One day, as they approached the Lin-ch'ing customs station, Han Tao-kuo was standing on the prow of the boat when he happened to see a neighbor of his named Yen the Fourth sitting on the deck of a boat that was coming downstream toward him on the way to pick up an official in Lin-ch'ing.

Upon catching sight of Han Tao-kuo, he raised his hand in greeting and shouted to him, "Han Tao-kuo, your master passed away during the first month."

By the time he finished speaking, his boat, which was moving fast, had shot past him.

When Han Tao-kuo heard these words, he kept the information to himself, keeping Lai-pao in the dark by not telling him about it.

It so happened that at that time the provinces of Honan and Shantung were suffering from a severe drought. The land was scorched for thousands of li, the cultivated fields and mulberry groves were unproductive, and the price of cotton goods had become temporarily inflated to the point that a bolt of cotton fabric cost a third more than its normal price.

The local merchants from the countryside were compelled to take their money with them and travel as far as the docks at Lin-ch'ing in order to buy directly from the itinerant merchants.

Han Tao-kuo consulted with Lai-pao, saying, "The piece goods on our boat are worth something over four thousand taels. At present, since the going price for such merchandise has gone up by one-third, we might as well sell off half our cargo. That would facilitate our payment of the duty at the customs station, and were we to wait until we get home to sell the goods, we would not do any better. Not to sell when the market is favorable would really be deplorable."

"Although what you say may be true enough," said Lai-pao, "I fear that if we proceed with the sale, when we arrive home it may elicit the disapproval of our master who is the owner of the goods. What would we do then?"

"If the master should object," responded Han Tao-kuo, "I will take responsibility for it."

Since Lai-pao was unable to dissuade him, they proceeded to sell off a thousand taels worth of piece goods on the dock.

At this point, Han Tao-kuo said, "Lai-pao, why don't you and Hu Hsiu remain on the boat to take care of paying the duty, while I and my young servant Wang Han pack the thousand taels into saddlebags and go home by the overland route in order to tell our master about the situation."

"When you get home," said Lai-pao, "whatever you do, get our master to send a letter to His Honor Ch'ien Lung-yeh at the customs house asking him to reduce the transit duty on our cargo and let our boat through before the others."

Han Tao-kuo nodded in assent and, together with his young servant Wang Han, proceeded to pack their saddlebags and set out for Ch'ing-ho district. But no more of this.

One day, they entered the city through the protective wall outside the South Gate just as:

The sun was beginning its gradual descent.

Who could have anticipated that on the street they happened to encounter Chang An, the caretaker of Hsi-men Ch'ing's ancestral graveyard, who was propelling a pushcart full of wine, rice, and food boxes on his way out the South Gate.

When he caught sight of Han Tao-kuo, he called out, "Uncle Han, you have returned home."

Han Tao-kuo noticed that he was wearing mourning and asked him the reason for it, to which he replied, "His Honor has passed away, and tomorrow, the ninth day of the third month, is the day of the seventh weekly commemoration of his death. The First Lady has asked me to transport this load of wine, rice, and food boxes to the graveyard in preparation for the ceremony of burning paper money there tomorrow."

When Han Tao-kuo heard this, he remarked, "How regrettable! How regrettable! To be sure:

The mouths of the pedestrians on the road

are like memorial tablets.

The story is not untrue."¹¹

As he whipped up his donkey and proceeded into the city, it was already getting dark. Behold:

The teeming crossroads are all ablaze with

the light of burning lanterns;

The Temple of the Nine Stars is enhanced by fragrant mist and tolling bells.

The wheel of the bright moon is suspended

above the sparse woodlands;

A handful of scattered stars¹² serves to light up the azure firmament.

Within the camps of the Six Imperial Armies,

The wailing of painted bugles frequently resounds;

On the upper floors of the five drum towers,

Water drips in the bronze tanks of the clepsydras.

On all four sides the evening fog,

Darkly encompasses the dancing pavilions and singing platforms;¹³

In the three markets a cloak of mist,

Faintly enshrouds the green gauze windows

and vermilion gates.¹⁴

Pair by pair, the strolling beauties

return to their boudoirs;

One by one, the young scholars close

the blinds in their studies.¹⁵

As Han Tao-kuo entered the crossroads of the city he debated with himself whether or not to go, as he had originally intended, straight to the house of Hsi-men Ch'ing. But since he had learned that Hsi-men Ch'ing was already dead, and it was also late in the day, he decided, instead, to go to his own home to spend the night and consult with his wife before going to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place the next day. Thereupon, he and Wang Han, whipped up their donkeys and proceeded straight to their house on Lion Street. The two of them dismounted their donkeys, dismissed the bearers that had come with them, and called for the door to be opened, after which Wang Han proceeded to carry their luggage and saddlebags inside.

When the maidservant caught sight of them, she reported to Wang Liu-erh, saying, "Father has come home."

The woman welcomed him inside, where he paid obeisance to the Buddha and the spirit tablets of his ancestors, brushed the dust from the journey off his clothes, and saw to the disposition of the saddlebags and luggage in the parlor. Wang Liu-erh helped him off with his outer garments, and saw him into a seat, while the maid provided him with a serving of tea.

Han Tao-kuo first told her about the events of his journey and then went on to say, "I ran into Brother Yen the Fourth along the way, who told me that the master has died; and just now, as I arrived at the city wall, I also ran into Chang An, the caretaker of the master's ancestral graveyard, who was propelling a pushcart loaded with wine and rice on his way to the graveyard. He told me that tomorrow is the day for the seventh weekly commemoration of his death. So the report turns out to be true. He seemed well enough when I left, so tell me, how did he happen to die?"

Wang Liu-erh said:

"Weather is characterized by unexpected storms;

Man is subject to unpredictable vicissitudes.

Who can be sure that nothing will happen to him?"

Han Tao-kuo then proceeded to open up the saddlebags, which contained clothing and other valuables that he had purchased while in Chiang-nan, and emptied the two pouches containing the thousand taels of silver. One sealed packet at a time, he dumped them on the surface of the k'ang, and when he opened them, they were seen to contain nothing but glistening "snowflake" silver.

Turning to his wife, he said, "These are the thousand taels of silver that I realized by selling off part of the cargo on the road. In addition to which, there are two packets containing a hundred taels that I made for myself on the side. It's already late today, but I can deliver them to his place tomorrow morning."

He then went on to ask his wife, "After I had left, did he continue to patronize you or not?"

"While he was still alive," she said, "everything was all right. But are you really planning to deliver this silver to his place?"

"That's just what I want to discuss with you," Han Tao-kuo responded. "How would it be if we kept some of it for ourselves, and sent the other half to his place?"

"Phooey!" his wife exclaimed. "What a simpleton you are! It's time to stop being so foolish. Now that he's already dead, and no one from here is still over there, what further connection do we have with him? Rather than delivering half of the silver to his place and running the risk of their raising a ruckus over the whereabouts of the rest, it would be better to be:

Once ruthless, ruthless to the end, and use this thousand taels of silver to hire mules for ourselves and abscond to our daughter's place in the Eastern Capital with it. There's no reason to worry that our kinsman's place in the grand preceptor's mansion will be unable to accommodate us."

"That would require us to abandon this house of ours," said Han Tao-kuo. "It won't be possible to dispose of it on such short notice. How about that?"

"What a feckless creature you are!" retorted his wife. "Why don't we get your younger brother Han the Second to move in, and leave him with some silver to look after the place? Then, if anyone from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household comes looking for you, he can tell them that our daughter in the Eastern Capital has sent for the two of us. They would hardly have the:

Seven heads and eight galls, to come looking for us in the grand preceptor's mansion. And even if they did, we would have no reason to be afraid of them."

"But I have always been favorably treated by His Honor," said Han Tao-kuo. "To exhibit such a change of heart would constitute a violation of Heavenly principle."

"It has always been the case that:

To abide by Heavenly principle is to face starvation," responded his wife. "Given the way he has taken advantage of me in the past, for us to make use of these few taels of his silver is hardly wrong. I remember how, when his body was lying in state in the coffin chamber, I prepared an offertory table, replete with the meat of the three sacrificial animals, and went with the best of intentions to burn paper money on his behalf. But his principal wife, that undutiful whore, refused to come out and greet me for what seemed like half a day, while she kept to her room insulting me egregiously, and putting me in a predicament in which I could neither leave, on the one hand, nor sit down, on the other. Later his third wife came out and offered to sit down with me, but I refused to stay and came home in my sedan chair. When I think of that situation, it seems only right that I should spend a few taels of his silver."

This single conversation had the effect of reducing Han Tao-kuo to silence. That evening the two of them settled on their plan. The next day, at the fifth watch, they summoned Han Tao-kuo's younger brother, Han the Second, arranged with him, thus and so, to look after their house, and provided him with ten or twenty taels of silver to cover his expenses.

This Trickster Han expressed himself to be:

Willing a thousand times if not ten thousand times, saying, "Elder brother and sister-in-law, go your way. You can leave everything to me."

Han Tao-kuo decided to take his young servant Wang Han and the two maidservants with them to the Eastern Capital and proceeded to hire two large carts, onto which they loaded their trunks and other valuables. After waiting until daybreak, they went out the West Gate of the city and headed for the Eastern Capital. Truly:

Breaking to pieces the jade cage,
the phoenix flies away;
Smashing apart the metal padlock,
the dragon breaks free.

We will say no more at this point about how Han Tao-kuo and his wife set out for the Eastern Capital, but return to the story of Wu Yüeh-niang.

The next day, she took her son, Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, along with Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, the wet nurse Ju-i, and her son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, and set out for their ancestral graveyard to burn paper money on behalf of Hsi-men Ch'ing. While they were there, the caretaker Chang An told Yüeh-niang how he had run into Han Tao-kuo the day before.

On hearing this, Yüeh-niang remarked, "If he is back, why hasn't he reported in at our place? No doubt he will do so today."

After burning the paper money at his grave site, and sitting there for a short time, they headed back home, and she sent Ch'en Ching-chi to Han Tao-kuo's house to ask him where he had left the boat.

The first time he knocked at the gate there was no response, but the second time, Han the Second came out and said, "My niece in the Eastern Capital has summoned my elder brother and my sister-in-law to come visit her. I don't know where the boat is located."

When Ch'en Ching-chi reported this to Yüeh-niang, she was not able to let it go at that and sent Ch'en Ching-chi on a donkey to ride along the side of the canal and try to locate the boat. Three days later, he arrived at the dock in Lin-ch'ing and found Lai-pao on the boat.

Lai-pao asked, "Hasn't Han Tao-kuo arrived yet? He set out for home ahead of me with a thousand taels of silver."

"Who has seen anything of him?" responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "Chang An encountered him on his way into the city, and the next day, after leaving the graveyard, the First Lady sent me to ask after him. It seems that the two of them have absconded to the Eastern Capital, taking their possessions and the silver with them. At present, Father is dead, and the seventh weekly commemoration of his death has been concluded, but the First Lady is unable to let it go at that and sent me out to look for the boat."

Han Tao-kuo Appropriates the Goods and Flees Far Away

As for Lai-pao, though:

From his mouth no word was uttered,

In his heart he thought to himself,

“That god-damned creature! It turns out he was deceiving me into the bargain. No wonder he sold off a thousand taels worth of goods along the way. He was up to his nefarious schemes. Truly:

Though our faces may be only inches apart,

Our hearts are separated by a thousand li.”

At this juncture, Lai-pao, on learning that Hsi-men Ch'ing was already dead, decided to take the same course as Han Tao-kuo. He therefore proceeded to entice the young scamp Ch'en Ching-chi into drinking with him in the various entertainment places on the dock and enjoying himself with the courtesans there. Meanwhile, he surreptitiously removed eight hundred taels worth of merchandise from the boat and arranged to store it under seal in a local inn.

One day, after the customs duty had been paid and the boat had been allowed to proceed through the barrier to the port on the New Canal, the remainder of the cargo was transhipped and loaded into carts to be transported to Ch'ing-ho district, where it was duly unloaded into an anteroom on the eastern side of the courtyard. At that time, after Hsi-men Ch'ing's death, the silk floss store on Lion Street had been closed, and Kan Jun and Ts'ui Pen had sold off the remaining merchandise in the silk goods store across the street from the Hsi-men residence, turned the proceeds over to Yüeh-niang, and returned to their homes. The house there was also sold, and only the pawnshop and the pharmaceutical shop at the front of the Hsi-men residence remained open, under the management of Ch'en Ching-chi and Fu Ming.

Lai-pao's wife Hui-hsiang had a four-year-old son named Seng-pao, and Han Tao-kuo's wife Wang Liu-erh had a niece who was three years old. The two families had betrothed them to each other by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of their blouses¹⁶ without Yüeh-niang knowing anything about it.

When Lai-pao had finished unloading the merchandise, he put the blame for the missing silver entirely on Han Tao-kuo, saying, "He first sold off two thousand taels worth of goods and then set out ahead of me to take them home."

Yüeh-niang repeatedly urged him to go to the Eastern Capital and question Han Tao-kuo about the whereabouts of the silver, but he adamantly refused, saying, "I can't do something like that. Who could presume to force his way into the grand preceptor's mansion, and:

Devote himself to stirring up trouble, without running the risk of retaliation? You would do better to recite the Buddha's name, rather than:
Inviting lice onto your own head to scratch."

"But kinsman Chai Ch'ien is beholden to us for arranging his match with Han Tao-kuo's daughter," protested Yüeh-niang. "Surely he would be inclined to respond favorably to us."

"His daughter is now the favorite in his household," said Lai-pao, "and she is far more likely to side with her own parents than with us. We would do well to keep this matter to ourselves. If word of it should leak out, it would not redound to our credit. As for these few taels of silver, the best thing to do would be simply to write them off and forget about it."

Yüeh-niang, consequently, urged him to get together with the potential purchasers and dispose of the remaining piece goods to them. When he did so, Yüeh-niang had Ch'en Ching-chi take charge of the scales and bargaining, but the buyers rejected the proposed prices, took their money, and left.

Lai-pao then said to Ch'en Ching-chi, "Son-in-law, you don't yet understand the vicissitudes of trade, but I have considerable experience traveling on the rivers and lakes and understand how the markets work.

It is better to sell at a loss,
Than it is to forfeit the sale.

Now that these goods are here, we might as well settle for whatever price we can get for them. If you insist on:

Pulling your bow all the way taut,
You risk the loss of your customer, and only show that you don't know how to conduct business. I'm not being pretentious, but you're still young, and:

Don't perceive the way things work.¹⁷

I'm not sticking my elbow into other people's business, but it seems to me that the best we can do is to sell off the goods and make an end of it."

Upon hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi, in a fit of pique, simply decided to wash his hands of the matter. Lai-pao, accordingly, without waiting for instructions from Yüeh-niang, reached over and grabbed the abacus out of his hands, called back the customers, and sold off the remaining goods for something over two thousand taels of silver. He then handed the proceeds, one packet at a time, to Ch'en Ching-chi to turn over to Yüeh-niang and saw to the removal of the merchandise from the premises.

Yüeh-niang offered to reward him with twenty or thirty taels of silver for his household expenses, but he ostentatiously refused to accept it, saying, "You had better keep it for yourself ma'am. Now that your husband is dead, you are like stagnant water, without any source of livelihood. What reason is there to dispose of your property this way? Keep it for yourself. I really don't need it."

One night, when Lai-pao had been outside drinking himself into a stupor, he walked into Yüeh-niang's room, leaned on the bedrail of the k'ang, and addressed her, saying, "Ma'am, you have lost your husband while still in the springtime of your youth and are left alone with no one to care for but your infant son. Do you not feel lonely?"

Yüeh-niang said not a word in response to this overture.

One day, a letter arrived from Majordomo Chai Ch'ien in the Eastern Capital, indicating that he had learned of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death. He also said that Han Tao-kuo had informed him that there were four attractive young women left in the household who were adept at playing musical instruments and singing, and he offered to purchase them for whatever price might be asked so they could be transported to the Eastern Capital to wait upon the grand preceptor's elderly wife.

This letter reduced Yüeh-niang to a state of panic, and she summoned Lai-pao to consult with him about whether he thought it would be better to comply with this request or not.

When Lai-pao came into her room, he did not address her with appropriate respect but said, "You are only a woman, and don't understand how things stand. To fail to comply with this request would be to invite disaster. This is all due to the heedlessness of your dead husband, who was given to showing off his munificence. Whenever he invited people over for a drink he would call out the household musicians to entertain them, a fact that could not but become widely known. It is hardly surprising that Han Tao-kuo's daughter, in the course of waiting upon the elderly wife of the grand preceptor in her mansion, should mention it to her. The situation is just as I said it was the other day. And now, sure enough, this problem has come up. If you don't agree to his request, he'll have the prefectural or district yamen send people to demand them by name. By that time it will be too late for you to do anything but hand them over to him with both hands. The best thing to do at present, without having to surrender all four of them, is to compromise by sending off two of them, as a means of saving your face.”

Yüeh-niang pondered this suggestion for some time and decided that Lan-hsiang from Meng Yü-lou's quarters and Ch'un-mei from P'an Chin-lien's quarters could not be spared, and that Hsiu-ch'un, who was looking after Hsiao-ko, also could not be dispensed with. But when she asked Yü-hsiao and Ying-ch'un from her own quarters, they expressed a willingness to go. Consequently, she had Lai-pao hire a pair of vehicles to accommodate the two maidservants and accompany them to the grand preceptor's mansion in the Eastern Capital. What she could not have anticipated was that the rascal Lai-pao would seize the opportunity to rape the two girls en route.

One day, when they arrived in the Eastern Capital and met with Han Tao-kuo and his wife, Lai-pao filled them in on everything that had happened first and last.

Han Tao-kuo thanked Lai-pao, saying, “If my kinsman had not looked after our interests by dissuading them from pursuing us, even though we have nothing to fear, they might well have sent someone to the Eastern Capital to seek us out.”

When Chai Ch'ien saw that the two girls, Ying-ch'un and Yü-hsiao, were both attractive young women, one of whom was adept at playing the psaltery, and the other at playing the samisen, and that they were only sixteen or seventeen years old, he had them move into the mansion in order to wait on the grand preceptor's elderly wife and agreed to pay for them with two ingots of silver worth fifty taels apiece. Lai-pao pocketed one of these ingots for himself and turned only one of them over to Yüeh-niang when he arrived home.

Lai-pao Cheats His Master and Ignores His Benevolence

He also endeavored to intimidate Yüeh-niang, saying, "If I had not agreed to accompany them, not even this ingot of silver would have been forthcoming. You don't have any idea of what wealth and distinction Han Tao-kuo and his wife are enjoying in the grand preceptor's mansion. They are housed in a dwelling of their own where they have:

Slaves and maidservants at their beck and call, and

Are always waited on by five or three servants.

Majordomo Chai Ch'ien addresses Han Tao-kuo as Your Honor, and their daughter, Han Ai-chieh, goes into the mansion every day to wait on the grand preceptor's elderly wife:

Not straying by so much as an inch from her side.¹⁸

Whatever she asks for, she receives tenfold;

She is free to eat anything that she chooses,

And dress in whatever outfits she may prefer.¹⁹

At present, she has also learned how to write characters and do arithmetic, demonstrating that:

Good fortune serves to stimulate the intelligence.

She has grown up to be:

Large and tall in stature,²⁰

With an alluring demeanor.

When she came out to see me the other day, she was adorned as resplendently as:

A tree of jade in a forest of alabaster.

She is as clever as can be and insisted on addressing me as Uncle Pao. Now that these two household musicians of ours are there, they will be dependent on her for their needles and thread."

When he had finished speaking, Yüeh-niang felt as though:

Her gratitude knew no bounds, and provided wine and delicacies for his consumption. She also offered him some silver, but he refused it as before, and she ended up rewarding him with a bolt of satin fabric for his wife, Hui-hsiang, to make a dress out of. But no more of this.

One day, Lai-pao, together with his wife's younger brother, Liu Ts'ang, went to the dock at Lin-ch'ing and sold off the piece goods that he had stored there in the inn for the sum of eight hundred taels of silver. With these proceeds he secretly bought a house for himself, some distance from the Hsi-men home, to the right side of Liu Ts'ang's residence, where he opened a general store and also used the premises to convene conclaves and tea gatherings every day. His wife Hui-hsiang, whenever she felt so inclined, took to asking Yüeh-niang for time off in order to visit her mother's family and would then go to their new house, where she would change her head ornaments and clothing, put on a pearl headband, and thus:

Studded with gold and decked with silver, proceed to the home of Wang Liu-erh's sister-in-law, Sow Wang, to discuss the marriage alliance between the children in their families and exchange favors. After going to see Sow Wang's daughter, she would ride back to their new home in a sedan chair, change back into her everyday clothes, and return to the Hsi-men residence, without Yüeh-niang's knowing anything about it.

The rascal Lai-pao would often get himself drunk and then go right into Yüeh-niang's room, where he would engage her in:

Suggestive and flirtatious conversation.

This happened at least two or three times. If Yüeh-niang had not been the virtuous and honorable person that she was, she might well have succumbed to temptation and allowed herself to be seduced by his overtures.

Some of the household servants and gardeners also mentioned in Yüeh-niang's presence the fact that Lai-pao's wife, Hui-hsiang, had been seen to venture abroad in order to arrange the betrothal of her son, Seng-pao, to Sow Wang's daughter, Wang Liu-erh's niece, and had been:

Studded with gold and decked with silver,

While attended by three or five servants, for the occasion. P'an Chin-lien also reported this to Yüeh-niang a number of times, but Yüeh-niang did not believe it. When Hui-hsiang heard about this, she proceeded to kick up a storm in the kitchen:

Cursing the high and the low alike.

Lai-pao, thereupon:

Puffing himself up and playing the fool, resorted to boasting about himself to the other servants, saying, "The rest of you can stay at home and engage in your bedtime gossip if you like. But it was I who took the trouble to brave the waters and bring all this silver and merchandise safely home. Had it not been for me, Han Tao-kuo, that:

Old ox with his rapacious snout, would have made off to the Eastern Capital with the whole bundle.

With no more than a squeak,

it might well have:

Sunk softly into the water.

But so far, I have not received so much as a word of gratitude and have even been falsely accused of purloining the master's money. Truly:

He who donates his flesh is not acknowledged,
He who furnishes incense is not acknowledged.

It has always been the case that:

To defer when you differ,
Is to give up the dipper."

His wife, Hui-hsiang, continued the diatribe, saying, "That lousy backbiting whore! She may claim that the two of us have purloined a large sum of money, and that I've been running around:

While attended by three or five servants, attempting to arrange the betrothal of our son. The fact is that I merely went out to borrow some clothes and a few hair ornaments from my elder sister, but she alleges that I used money purloined from the master to buy them. She's just trying to get rid of the two of us, but it doesn't matter. Even if we are forced to leave:

Heaven will hardly prohibit a starving crow from eating grass.

I'm going to rinse my eyes, the better to keep track of the lot of you whorish slaves, incarcerated as you are in the Hsi-men Ch'ing household."

When Yüeh-niang saw the way in which she was:

Cursing the high and the low alike, seeking pretexts for quarreling with people, and threatening to hang herself, as well as the way in which her husband had, at least two or three times, approached her indecorously when no one else was about, she became so angry she scarcely knew what to do with herself and felt compelled to expel the two of them from the household. Consequently, Lai-pao, as cool as you please, proceeded to open up a piece goods store together with his brother-in-law and offer a variety of fine fabrics for sale, convening conclaves and forging connections on a daily basis. But no more of this. Truly:

When prestige is lost, slaves abuse their master,
When the times are bad, ghosts manipulate people.²¹

There is a poem that testifies to this:

I would implore the people of this world,²²
Never to conduct yourselves dishonorably.
To act dishonorably is to deceive Heaven,
Don't assume that Heaven will not see it.²³
Heaven is situated right above your head,
It sees precisely and cannot be deceived.

P'AN CHIN-LIEN MAKES AN ASSIGNATION ON A MOONLIT NIGHT; CH'EN CHING-CHI ENJOYS TWO BEAUTIES IN A PAINTED BOWER

To the tune "Partridge Sky"

She remembers that time in the studio
when they had just met;
The clouds and rain they enjoyed together were known to only a few.
When evening came, the phoenix and his mate alighted on adjacent pillows; Left untrimmed, the silver lamp shed only a half light.

Thinking of the past,
Her fragrant soul deluded;
Tonight she is all too happy to enjoy the pleasures of connubial bliss.
Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes,
their pleasure knows no bounds.
From this time on, surely, the pair of them will never be separated.¹

THE STORY GOES that ever since P'an Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi had made out in his antechamber while Hsi-men Ch'ing was lying in state nearby, the two of them, on a daily basis, still savoring the sweet taste of their encounter:

Felt the chill of love by day,
And the heat of ardor at dusk.

Either:

Leaning on shoulders and engaging in badinage, or:

Sitting together and delighting in flirtation, they pestered each other incessantly and carried on without any restraint whatever. If there were other people about so they could not communicate verbally, they would write their thoughts on strips of paper and drop them on the floor for each other to pick up.

When you have a message, transmit it to me;
If I have a message, I'll impart it to you.

One day, during the fourth month, P'an Chin-lien took out a handkerchief shot with silver thread that she customarily held in her sleeve and wrapped it around a jade-colored gauze drawn-work sachet in which she had placed benzoin, lysimachia, rose petals, and a lock of her hair, as well as some pine and cypress cones, and on the two sides of which she had stitched an inscription of eight characters that read:

The pine and the cypress are evergreen,²
Her human countenance is like a flower.

When she had finished preparing this keepsake, she intended to give it to Ch'en Ching-chi, but he did not happen to be in the anteroom where he lived just then, so she dropped it inside through the window. Later on, when Ch'en Ching-chi opened the door and went in, he saw the bulging sealed packet and opened it to find the handkerchief and the sachet, as well as a piece of paper on which there was inscribed a lyric to the tune "Mistletoe," which read as follows:

I'm making you a gift of this silver-threaded handkerchief and this sachet.
In so doing, I have also cut off a lock of my black tresses for you.
I hope you will carry these pine and cypress cones with you at all times.
As my tears drip, I am putting in writing my loving thoughts for you.
Late this evening, when the lantern light shines on my lonely shadow, Don't let me down as I wait for you under the rose-leaved raspberry trellis.

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the lyric was proposing a secret assignation under the rose-leaved raspberry trellis, he immediately sealed up a gold-flecked fan of speckled bamboo,³ on which he had also written a lyric in reply to hers, tucked it into his sleeve, and headed into the garden. Who could have anticipated that Yüeh-niang happened to be visiting in Chin-lien's quarters at the time.

No sooner did Ch'en Ching-chi, who was quite unaware of the situation, enter the postern gate than he called out, "Is my beloved at home, or not?"

Chin-lien recognized the sound of his voice and, fearing lest Yüeh-niang might also have heard it, and the cat be let out of the bag, hastily strode out, lifting the portiere aside, and seeing that it was he, waved him away with her hand, saying, "I wondered who it was, and it turns out to be our son-in-law, looking for his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh. She was here a little while ago, but she has gone into the garden with the others to pick flowers."

When Ch'en Ching-chi realized that Yüeh-niang was there, he surreptitiously handed his package to her to put in her sleeve and went away.

Yüeh-niang asked, "What did our son-in-law come here for?"

To which Chin-lien replied, "He came looking for his wife, and I told him that she had gone into the garden."

She thereby managed to pull the wool over Yüeh-niang's eyes. Not long after this, Yüeh-niang got up and went back to the rear compound.

When Chin-lien pulled the package out of her sleeve and opened it, she saw that it contained a fan made of speckled bamboo and white gauze, on which was depicted a scene of green cattails beside a flowing stream, and that it was inscribed with a lyric to the tune "The Water Nymphs" that read as follows:

The speckled bamboo and white gauze create a free and easy feeling;
The green cattails are skillfully depicted.
The gold sequins and silver threads are truly enchanting,
Making it fit only for an enchanting person.
To fend off the heat of summer it will create a gentle breeze;
But when people are about, it should ever be kept in your sleeve.
When no one else is there, you can idly wave it to and fro;
But don't ever let it fall into the hands of any vulgar person.

Once the woman had perused this lyric, that evening, when the moon began to rise, she provided wine for her maidservants Ch'un-mei and Ch'iu-chü to drink and shut them into the side room with the k'ang to spend the night. She then saw to it that in her own room:

The green gauze window was half open,

While crimson candles blazed on high.

After preparing the bedding and pillows, she proceeded to:

Light incense and wash her private parts, after which, she went outside to stand by herself under the banksia rose arbor and wait for Ch'en Ching-chi to appear for their evening assignation.

To resume our story, that night Yüeh-niang had invited Hsi-men Ta-chieh to go back to the rear compound in order to listen to Nun Wang recite a precious scroll, so the only other person in the room was the maidservant Yüan-hsiao.

Ch'en Ching-chi confidentially offered her a handkerchief and enjoined her to look after the place, saying, "I am going to the quarters of the Fifth Lady, who has asked me to play a board game with her. If your mistress should come in while I am gone, come and get me immediately."

Yüan-hsiao assented to this, thus enabling Ch'en Ching-chi to venture into the garden, where:

The moonglow was filtered by the flowers,⁴

Producing contrasting lights and shadows.

When he arrived under the rose-leaved raspberry trellis, gazing into the distance, he caught sight of the woman, who had:

Removed her headdress, and Half-coiled her raven locks.

Above, she wore a blouse of pale lavender silk; below, she wore a skirt decorated with turquoise figures; and her feet were adorned with wave-tripping silk stockings, as she approached him from under the banksia rose arbor. Ch'en Ching-chi suddenly jumped out from his position under the rose-leaved raspberry trellis and embraced the woman with both arms, which gave her quite a start.

"Phooey!" the woman exclaimed. "You little short-life! You gave me quite a start by suddenly jumping out that way. Luckily, it may be all right for you to embrace me; but would you have the nerve to embrace anyone else that way?"

Ch'en Ching-chi, who was half inebriated, laughed and said, "Of course, I knew it was you. But even if I had embraced Hung-niang by mistake,⁵ what difference would it make?"

The two of them, thereupon:

Hugging and embracing each other, held hands as they went into her room, which was ablaze with lamps and candles and contained a table laden with wine and appetizers. After seeing that the postern gate was securely locked, they:

Sat down shoulder to shoulder,
and fell to drinking together.

The woman then asked, "When you came out, did Hsi-men Ta-chieh know anything about it?"

"She is back in the rear compound listening to the recitation of a precious scroll," explained Ch'en Ching-chi. "I arranged for Yüan-hsiao to come get me if anything should come up, and I told her I would be here playing a board game with you."

The two of them indulged in amusing themselves and drinking together for some time. As the saying goes:

Romantic affairs are consummated over tea, and Wine is the go-between of lust.

Before they knew it, they:

Felt the effects of the Bamboo Leaf wine, and Peach blossoms bloomed upon their cheeks.
As one set about kissing with his lips,
The other rubbed her cheek against his.

After snuffing out the lamps, they:

Got into bed and engaged with each other.

The woman embraced Ch'en Ching-chi, and Ch'en Ching-chi fondled the woman, upon which she sang a song to the tune "The Sixth Lady from West of the River":

Upon coming in the door, he begins to cuddle me on his lap,
And I respond by turning down
the brocaded coverlet.
My handsome lover makes love to me in the strangest ways.
Ch'a!
He lifts my legs on high,
Legs on high.
And knocks the fret over my raven locks completely awry.⁶

Ch'en Ching-chi responded by singing a song to the same tune:

The two of us feel an affinity that binds us together.
Don't abandon me so that I will have to sleep by myself.
We have sworn a thousand times to be as faithful as the hills and seas.
Ch'a!
If we are inconstant, Heaven will observe it,
Heaven will observe it.
You're in the springtime of your life, and I'm a youth.⁷

The two of them had barely finished their game of clouds and rain when they heard Yüan-hsiao calling to them from outside the gate, "Hsi-men Ta-chieh has come back to her quarters."

This threw Ch'en Ching-chi into such consternation that he hastily pulled on his clothes and went out the door. Truly:

Though distracted bees and wanton butterflies are sometimes to be seen; Once they fly into the pear blossoms
they disappear from view.

It so happens that of the three rooms on the upper floor of Chin-lien's quarters, the middle room was dedicated to the worship of Buddhist images, while the rooms to either side were used for the storage of pharmaceutical supplies and spices. From this time on, the two of them were inseparable.

Passion pervaded their breasts;
Their mutual love was like glue.

Not a day passed without their getting together.

One day turned out to be one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen.

That morning, P'an Chin-lien, after performing her toilet and getting dressed, went upstairs to burn incense before the image of the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin. Unexpectedly, Ch'en Ching-chi happened to come upstairs at the same time, with keys in hand, to open the storerooms and get some pharmaceutical supplies and spices. When the two of them ran into each other, the woman desisted from the burning of incense, and, seeing that there was no one else about, the two of them embraced and fell to kissing and sucking each other's tongues.

One of them said, "You're my darling, Fifth Lady."

The other exclaimed, "You're the love of my life."

She then went on to say, "Since there is no one else about, we might as well get down to business right here."
So saying, she proceeded to strip off her clothing, lay down on a broad bench, and let:

Her pair of wild ducks fly to his shoulders.
As the root of his organ half penetrated her,
They felt inseparably attached to each other.

There is a song that puns on the names of drugs to the tune "The Water Nymphs" that testifies to this:

Angelica, pinellia, and arnebia roots enhance the pleasures of intercourse; Finding him as tasty as betel nuts, she engages in incest with her son-in-law.
His dangling member, sunk in her vagina, is as potent as henbane or castor bean.
As his clove-shaped spike massages the two sides of her receptacle,
She feels benumbed as though with cannabis,
and swoons completely away.
As her silvery vaginal secretions pour out,
like a gush of liquid mercury,
With the shrill stridulation of a red cicada,
she expresses the excitement,
She feels in her two labia, as rubicund as mandarin orange peels.⁸

As always:

Without coincidences there would be no stories.

While the two of them were just in the thick of things, Ch'un-mei unexpectedly came upstairs with a box in hand to get some tea leaves. When she came into view, they were taken by surprise and became so flustered they hardly knew what to do with themselves. Ch'un-mei, not wishing to embarrass them, hastily turned around and started down the stairs. Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into such consternation that he could hardly get into his underwear, while Chin-lien was putting on her skirt.

The woman then called after Ch'un-mei, saying, "My good sister, come back upstairs. I have something to say to you."
Ch'un-mei, thereupon, reascended the stairs.

"My good sister," Chin-lien said to her, "our son-in-law is not an outsider. Let me explain the situation to you. As for the two of us:

Our feelings and thoughts are one,
We can never agree to be separated.

But, whatever you do, you must not reveal this to anyone, but keep it to yourself."

"Mother," responded Ch'un-mei, "how can you say such a thing? Having served you for all these years, how could I be unaware of your feelings, or reveal them to anyone else?"

"If you are actually willing to cover up for us," the woman said, "while our son-in-law is still here, you will have to come over and go to bed with him before I'll believe you. If you should refuse, it will show that you have no regard for us."

Ch'un-mei was so embarrassed by this proposal that her face turned alternately red and white, but she felt compelled to agree. Unfastening her beige skirt and loosening her pant strings, she lay down faceup on the bench and let the young scamp have his way with her. Can such things be? Truly:

Both of these two iridescent pearls are without price;
Yet one lover gets to drill his way into each of them.

There is a song to the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers" that testifies to this:

Guilefully admitting her intimacy with her son-in-law,
She lets him engage in intercourse with his mother-in-law.
The affectation of human feelings entails devilish deceit.
Feigning to heed the ritual proper to brothers and sisters,
They secretly engage in the doings of swallows and orioles.
The two of them can only serve as blatant examples of this.⁹

On this occasion, as soon as Ch'en Ching-chi had finished his performance, Ch'un-mei collected the tea leaves and departed. From this time on, P'an Chin-lien and Ch'un-mei forged an alliance with each other and arranged secret assignments with the young scamp on more than one occasion, while keeping Ch'iu-chü in the dark. The woman listened to whatever Ch'un-mei had to say and presented her with some of her favorite articles of clothing and jewelry in order to secure her loyalty.

Ch'en Ching-chi Enjoys One Beauty and Makes Out with Two

On the first day of the sixth month, Chin-lien's mother, Old Mrs. P'an, died of sickness and old age. When someone came to report this, Wu Yüeh-niang purchased an offertory table, replete with the meat of the three sacrificial animals and paper money for the use of the dead and sent Chin-lien to go outside the city gate with them, riding in a sedan chair, to participate in the obsequies and present the sacrificial offerings.

The day after she returned, which was the third day of the sixth month, Chin-lien got up early and went to Yüeh-niang's room, where she spent what seemed like half a day telling her about it. After taking her leave, as she skirted the wall of the courtyard in which the large reception hall was located, upon feeling an urgent need to urinate, she hitched up her skirt and squatted down to relieve herself.

It so happens that after the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing there were few visitors any longer, so the ceremonial gate behind the large reception hall was normally kept closed. Ch'en Ching-chi, who resided in the anteroom on the east side of the courtyard, had just gotten up, when he suddenly heard the rustling noise made by someone urinating under the pomegranate tree on the other side of the wall.

Upon peeking surreptitiously out the window and realizing, to his surprise, who it was, he exclaimed, "Who is it that is uncouth enough to relieve herself here? You'd better hitch up your clothes or you'll get your skirt wet."

The woman promptly fastened up her skirt, moved over beside the window, and remarked, "So you're still at home and haven't even gotten up yet, have you? You're certainly taking it easy. Is Hsi-men Ta-chieh here too?"

"She's still in the rear compound," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "We didn't get to sleep until the third watch last night. The

First Lady dragged us back there to listen to a recitation of the Hung-lo pao-chüan, or The Precious Scroll on the Red Silk Curtain,¹⁰ and I had to sit up listening to it so late that I very nearly:

Came down with a crick in the back.

It was all I could do to crawl out of bed this morning."

"You inveterate louse!" Chin-lien responded. "Don't try to fool me with those lies of yours. Since when did you go back to the master suite to listen to the recitation of a precious scroll while I was away from home yesterday? The maidservants tell me that you went to eat in Meng Yü-lou's quarters yesterday."

"Luckily Hsi-men Ta-chieh can bear witness on my behalf," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "We were both there in the master suite. Since when did I venture into anyone else's quarters?"

As they bandied words with each other, the young scamp stood on the k'ang, manipulated his organ until it rose up as hard and straight as a stick, and stuck it out through the window.

When the woman saw what he was up to, she laughed heartily and affected to take him to task, saying, "You crazy louse of an incorrigible short-life! By suddenly letting your old fellow out that way, you've given me quite a start. You'd better pull it back inside at once, before I'm tempted, for better or for worse, to jab it with a needle and give you the shock of pain that you deserve."

"Venerable lady," Ching-chi responded with a laugh, "if you don't like the looks of it, you might as well stick it into a safe place, which would also be doing me a favor."

The woman continued to rail at him, saying:

"You're such a practiced old hand, aren't you, you crazy jailbird!"

So saying, she groped out a miniature brass mirror that she carried at her waist, set it on the windowsill, and pretended to look into the mirror in order to redo her makeup, while actually engulfing his organ with her ruby lips and sucking away at it. She continued to suck at it until the young man felt that:

The tip of his magic rhinoceros horn¹¹ was being anointed;

While his heart melted with a panoply of lustful feelings.

Truly:

Past mistress of the intimate arts,

she caters to her lover's whim;

How quick she is, and diligent,

to "play the purple flute."

It so happens that the woman resorted to this subterfuge so that if anyone caught sight of her, they would think that she was looking into the mirror while redoing her makeup and would not realize what she was really up to.

Her depravity was manifest,

Completely devoid of shame.

Just as she was engaged in sucking away for all she was worth, the sound of someone's footsteps was heard, and the woman promptly put the mirror away and stepped to one side, while Ch'en Ching-chi withdrew his organ.

It turned out to be the servant Lai-an, who walked over and said, "Manager Fu Ming out front is inviting you to go join him for lunch."

"Tell him to go ahead and eat," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "I'll come as soon as I've finished combing my hair."

As soon as Lai-an had left the scene, the woman whispered to Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "Don't go out anywhere tonight, but stay in your quarters and wait till I send Ch'un-mei after you. There's something I want to say to you."

Ch'en Ching-chi replied:

"I respectfully accept the invitation."

When she had finished speaking, the woman returned to her quarters.

When Ch'en Ching-chi had finished his morning ablutions, he went out to the shop to take care of business, as usual. But no more of this.

It was not too long after this that the daylight began to fade. That night:

The moon was dark, the stars barely visible, and the weather was extremely hot. The woman told Ch'un-mei to heat water so she could bathe in her room and trim her toenails, after which she should prepare her bedding, drive away the mosquitoes, let down the gauze mosquito netting, and light some incense in a little burner.

"Mother," said Ch'un-mei, "you may not be aware of it, but today marks the beginning of the three ten-day periods of the hot season. Wouldn't you like to have some impatiens blossoms with which to dye your fingernails? I can go find some for you."

"Go ahead and look for some then," the woman said.

"The only place there are any," said Ch'un-mei, "is in the large courtyard. I'll go pick a few for you. You should tell Ch'iu-chü to get out the mortar and pestle and pulverize some garlic cloves for the purpose."¹²

The woman proceeded to:

Whisper into her ear in a low voice, as she instructed Ch'un-mei, saying, "You must go by the anteroom where he lives and invite him to come visit me tonight. I have something to say to him.”

When Ch'un-mei departed on her errand, the woman remained in her room where, by the time she had finished bathing her fragrant flesh and trimming her toenails, some time had passed. Ch'un-mei finally showed up with several impatiens blossoms, and Ch'iu-chü was put to work pulverizing them with the garlic cloves until it was nearly midnight. The woman also gave her several goblets of wine to drink and then sent her off to sleep in the kitchen. When the woman had dyed the nails of her ten slender fingers under the lamplight, she told Ch'un-mei to take a wide bench out into the courtyard and supply it with a cool bamboo bed mat along with a pillow and bedding, so she could cool herself off.

By this time, the night watches were nearly over. Behold:

Within red gates there is no sound;
The asterism “Jade Rope” hangs low.¹³
The stars of the Herd Boy and the Weaving Maid,
Are isolated on the two banks of the milky way.

Suddenly, one becomes aware of:

A whiff of floral fragrance, and
The glow of a few fireflies.

The woman, while:

Wielding a silken fan in her hand,

was:

Lying on her pillow as she waited.

Ch'un-mei had left the postern gate closed but unlocked. Truly:

Waiting by moonlight in the western chamber,
Welcoming the breeze, the door is half ajar.
As the flower shadows move outside the wall,
She anticipates the appearance of her lover.¹⁴

It so happens that Ch'en Ching-chi had agreed in advance that he would shake the branches of the woody hibiscus tree as a signal of his arrival, so when the woman saw the wavering of the flowery branches, she knew that he had come. When she had signaled her presence in the courtyard with a cough, he pushed open the gate and came in.

The two of them:

Sat down shoulder to shoulder,

and the woman asked, “Who was in your quarters when you left?”

“Hsi-men Ta-chieh has not come out from the rear compound today,” Ch'en Ching-chi replied. “I have already arranged for Yüan-hsiao to keep watch in our quarters and come to get me if anything should happen.”

He then went on to ask, “Has Ch'iu-chü gone to sleep yet?”

“She is already fast asleep,” the woman replied.

When they had finished speaking:

Hugging and embracing each other,

the two of them proceeded to:

Strip their bodies completely naked,¹⁵ and Engage each other on pillow and mat;
Unable to overcome their excitement.

Behold, to the tune “Song of the South”:

In lascivious excitement the two are united.
Embracing each other's fragrant shoulders,
they rub their cheeks together.
With his hand he fondles her fragrant breasts,
as soft as cotton.
How truly amazing it is!
Lifting up her feet, she takes off her embroidered slippers,
And snuggles her jade body into her lover's bosom.
As she sticks out her clove-shaped tongue,¹⁶
he opens his mouth.
When the tossing and tumbling mating phoenixes finish with the clouds and rain,
She enjoins her talented lover, “Tomorrow, whatever you do, try to come a little earlier.”¹⁷

When they had finished their game of clouds and rain, the woman got out five taels worth of loose silver and gave it to Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, “My mother, Old Mrs. P'an from outside the city gate, has died. A coffin was provided for her by your father-in-law while he was still alive. The First Lady sent me to take part in the third-day encoffining ceremony and burn paper money on her behalf. Tomorrow is the date for her burial ceremony, but the First Lady won't let me go, on the grounds that while we are still in mourning for Father it is not right for us to appear at public gatherings. I'm giving these five taels of silver to you in the hope that early tomorrow morning you will agree to go outside the city gate and help with the funeral arrangements for my mother, Old Mrs. P'an, reward her coffin bearers, and see that she is properly buried. If you consent to do so, it will be just as though I were doing it myself.”

Ch'en Ching-chi accepted the silver with one hand and said, “That’s no problem. If you assign such a task to me:

Once one has acceded to someone’s request,

It is imperative to see the job through to the end.

I’ll go out the gate as early as possible tomorrow morning, and when my mission is accomplished I’ll come back and report to you.”

When he had finished speaking, fearing that Hsi-men Ta-chieh might come home during his absence, he promptly returned to the antechamber in which they lived. Of the events of that evening there is nothing more to relate.

The next day, he returned from his mission around lunchtime and found that Chin-lien had just gotten up and was still in her room combing her hair. Ch'en Ching-chi came inside to report to her and gave her two sprigs of jasmine blossoms that he had plucked on the grounds of the Chao-hua ssu, or Temple of Glorious Transformation, outside the gate for her to wear.

“Has the coffin been duly buried?” the woman asked.

“How could I have failed to see that the venerable lady’s:

Yellow gold is stored in the coffer?”

replied Ch'en Ching-chi. “Before coming home to report to you, I still had two taels and six or seven mace of silver in hand, which I gave to your adopted sister to take care of her daily expenses. She asked me to extend her greetings to you with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand
expressions of gratitude.”

When the woman learned that her mother had been buried in her grave, she shed a few tears and then instructed Ch'un-mei, saying, “Put the jasmine blossoms in a bowl of water, and bring some tea for our brother-in-law to drink.”

Before long, two boxes of steamed-shortcake pastries and four saucers of appetizers were brought out. When Ch'en Ching-chi had enjoyed these refreshments, he went back out to the front compound. From that time on, the woman and the young scamp:

Became closer by the day.¹⁸

One morning, during the seventh month, the woman said to him, “Don’t go out anywhere today, but stay in your quarters, so I can come to you there and we can have some fun together.”

Ch'en Ching-chi assented to this. Unexpectedly, however, he was invited by Ts’ui Pen and a number of his friends to join them in an all-day excursion outside the city walls. When he came home, he was quite drunk, and no sooner did he collapse onto his bed than he fell fast asleep and became oblivious to:

Heaven above and earth below.

At dusk, Chin-lien suddenly appeared in his quarters and saw that he was stretched out asleep on the bed. Forgoing any attempt at a greeting, she tried unsuccessfully to shake him awake and realized that he must have been out drinking somewhere. Who could have anticipated that:

Strange as it may seem,

when the woman groped into his sleeve, she hooked out a gold-plated hairpin in the shape of a lotus petal with two rows of characters engraved on it that said:

The horse with the golden bridle neighs amidst the fragrant verdure;
The visitor to the jade tower is drunk at apricot blossom time.

When she held it up to the light to examine it, she realized that it belonged to Meng Yü-lou and thought to herself, “How did this happen to end up in his sleeve? He must have been engaged in hanky-panky with Meng Yü-lou. Otherwise, how could her hairpin have ended up in his sleeve? No wonder that short-life has treated me at times as though he were:

Bereft of thought or feeling.

If I don’t leave a few words for him, he won’t even know that I’ve been here. I’ll inscribe a quatrain on the wall as a message to him and interrogate him about it the next time I see him.”

Thereupon, she took up a brush and wrote out a quatrain on the wall that read:

On her solitary excursion to his studio, she is unable to awaken him;
Which means the Goddess has descended from Witch’s Mountain in vain.
It would appear that King Hsiang of Ch’u has become devoid of feelings;¹⁹ To so betray their morning after morning and evening after evening love.

After inscribing her composition, the woman returned to her quarters.

To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi had slept for some time, the effects of the wine wore off, and he woke up.

As he got up and lit a lamp, he suddenly recalled, “The woman was going to come meet me here for a tryst, but I have let her down by getting drunk.”

On turning around, he caught sight of the four lines of poetry on the wall and noticed that the ink with which they were written was still wet. Upon reading the poem, he realized that the woman had come as promised but had been obliged to return empty-handed; and that he had allowed the gift of a romantic assignation to slip through his fingers. The thought of this filled him with no end of remorse.

"The night watches are just beginning by now," he thought to himself. "Moreover, Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Yüan-hsiao are still in the rear compound and haven't come out yet. If I go over to her place, the postern gate is likely to be locked."

He headed there and shook the branches of the woody hibiscus tree to signal his arrival but heard no response from within. By mounting onto the T'ai-hu rockery, he succeeded in climbing over the whitewashed wall.

The woman, upon finding her lover to be drunk and fast asleep, had returned to her quarters in a fit of high dudgeon, feeling deeply depressed, and gone to sleep herself, after sprawling across her bed without bothering to undress. She did not anticipate that, in the middle of the night, he would come climbing over the wall. On seeing that the courtyard was deserted, and assuming that the maidservants must be asleep, he proceeded with:

Skulking step and lurking gait, to make his way to the door of her room, which he found to be closed but unlocked. When he slipped inside, he observed by the light of the moon shining through the window that the woman was lying sprawled on the bed, all by herself, with her face to the wall.

He whispered "My darling" to her several times, but she did not respond.

"Don't hold it against me," he went on to say, "but today Ts'ui Pen and a bunch of his friends invited me to join them in an excursion to the estate at Wu-li Yüan outside the city gate to enjoy practicing archery together. By the time I got home, I was drunk and was unaware that you had visited me. I am guilty of failing to keep our agreed upon assignation. Forgive me. Forgive me."

The woman still failed to respond to his plea.

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that she would not respond, he fell to his knees in a state of panic and pled with her, over and over again.

At this, the woman suddenly turned over and slapped his face with the back of her hand, as she railed at him, saying, "You lousy incorrigible fickle short-life! Keep it quiet or the maidservants will hear you. I know that you have someone else in your sights and no longer have a place for me in your heart. But where did you actually go off to today?"

"I was really dragged off by Ts'ui Pen to practice archery outside the city gate," replied Ch'en Ching-chi. "He managed to get me so drunk that I fell asleep on my return and failed to keep my date with you. Don't hold it against me. I saw the poem that you left on the wall and understand that you are annoyed with me."

"You crazy incorrigible trickster!" the woman retorted. "Stop shooting your mouth off that way, and shut up. Your tricks are as slippery as balls of mud. I won't let you get away with it. If it was really Ts'ui Pen who gave you too much to drink today, so that you came home drunk, how did this hairpin happen to end up in your sleeve?"

"That's something I picked up the other day in the garden," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "It was only two or three days ago."

"You're still ready to:

Outwit the spirits and confound the ghosts, are you?" the woman exclaimed. "What garden did you pick it up in? You'd have to pick up another one just like it for me to take you seriously. This pin is one that Meng the Third, that pockmarked whore, wears in her hair. My identification of it is:

As certain as certain can be.

It even has her name engraved on it, yet you think you can pull the wool over my eyes. No wonder, the other day when I was away from home, she is said to have invited you into her quarters for a meal. The truth is you've been:

Playing at sevens and eights, with her. When I taxed you with it, you refused to acknowledge anything. But if you haven't been engaged in hanky-panky with her, how did this pin of hers end up in your hands? You must have been revealing things about me to her. No wonder she smiled at me the way she did the other day. What you told her about me must have lain behind it. From now on:

You be yourself, and I'll be myself.

Just as the mung bean loses its color when peeled:

You can get lost."

Thereupon, Ch'en Ching-chi became so disturbed that he began:

Swearing by the gods and uttering oaths,

as he wept, saying, "If I've had:

So much as a thread's worth of commerce, with her, I hereby invoke the numinous powers of the God of the Eastern Peak and the God of Walls and Moats, who will see that I do not live to the age of thirty; that I am afflicted with:

Boils as big as bowls, and Three to five years of jaundice;

and such thirst that:

When I want soup, there will be none to be had;

When I want water, there will be none to be had."

The woman still refused to believe him and said, "You lousy nincompoop! Swearing such oaths, as though you were suffering from a toothache! It's a wonder you're not ashamed of yourself."

The two of them continued to go at it for some time until, observing that it was late at night, they saw no alternative but to divest themselves of their clothes and lie down next to each other on the bed. The woman made a point of turning over with her back to him and venting her spite by refusing to pay him any attention. Allowing him to plead, "Sister this, and sister that," her only response was to reach back and scratch his face with her hand, which so unnerved Ch'en Ching-chi that he felt he had to suppress his anger without uttering a sound. They squandered the remainder of the night without his being able even to blunder his way into her cunt. When the day dawned, fearing that the maidservants would get up, he felt compelled to climb over the wall as before and return to his quarters in the front compound. There is a song to the tune "Helping the Drunkard Back Home" that testifies to this:

P'an Chin-lien Reveals an Ardent Heart but Cold Demeanor

My mouth rubs against the oily fret on the top of her head;
Her back is pressed against the skin of my chest and belly.
I am not able to nuzzle her fragrant cheeks to left and right;²⁰
But can only breath into the hollows in the back of her neck.
All night long I cannot catch even a glimpse of her face,

But can only contemplate the back of her ivory comb.²¹

Gentle reader take note: Subsequently, Chin-lien returned this hairpin to Ch'en Ching-chi; and later still, after Meng Yü-lou had married Li Kung-pi and moved to Yen-chou prefecture, Ch'en Ching-chi produced this pin as evidence for the claim that Meng Yü-lou was his elder sister, in the endeavor to consummate a surreptitious affair with her. Who could have anticipated that Meng Yü-lou would not only evade this trick of his but coerce Ch'en Ching-chi into suffering the calamity of incarceration. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it. Truly:

The three luminaries cast shadows, but who can catch them:
The ten thousand things have no roots, they just arise of themselves.

CH'IU-CHÜ, HARBORING RESENTMENT, REVEALS A CLANDESTINE AFFAIR; CH'UN-MEI TRANSMITS A NOTE TO FACILITATE A LOVERS' RENDEZVOUS

It is laughable, but Hsi-men Ch'ing's perception leaves much to be desired;
This fact encourages his peach and plum blossoms to smile in the spring breeze.
Under his layers of embroidered quilts
there sleeps a rogue;
With three meals of delicacies a day
he nurtures a tiger.
Enamored of her person, his son-in-law
covets his concubine;
Attracted by his wealth, he is prepared to do his father-in-law in.
And there is yet another privilege worthy of consideration;
Traversing rooms and entering chambers
he can dally as he likes.¹

THE STORY GOES that when P'an Chin-lien saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had climbed over the wall and departed at the crack of dawn, she felt regret over the way she had treated him.

The next day was the fifteenth day of the seventh month, and Wu Yüeh-niang rode in her sedan chair to the Ksitigarbha Nunnery where Nun Hsüeh resided in order to burn a coffer of paper money on Hsi-men Ch'ing's behalf in celebration of the Ullambana Festival.² Chin-lien and the others escorted Yüeh-niang to the front gate and then returned inside. Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all went back to the rear compound, but Chin-lien lagged behind and, on reaching the ceremonial gate to the front courtyard, ran into Ch'en Ching-chi, who had gone up to the second floor of Li P'ing-erh's quarters to fetch some articles of clothing that had been pawned and was on his way out with the package in hand.

Chin-lien called him to a halt and questioned him, saying, "Although I criticized you with a few words last night, how come you jumped up and left in such a huff this morning? Are you really trying to break off your relationship with me?"

"How can you say such things?" retorted Ch'en Ching-chi. "Who got any sleep last night anyway? You gave me such a hard time all night as to nearly do me in. Just take a look at the scratch marks you left on my face."

"You lousy short-life!" the woman swore back at him. "If you haven't been engaged in hanky-panky with her:

The thief suffers from a sense of guilt.

Why did you run out on me that way for no good reason?"

Ch'en Ching-chi reached into his sleeve and pulled out a slip of paper. When the woman unfolded it and took a look, it turned out to be inscribed with a song to the tune "Mistletoe" that read as follows:

On the slightest pretext, she starts to abuse me;
Even going so far as to scratch
at my face.
I humble myself and experience humiliation
in a thousand ways,
But whatever I say, she wants to call it quits with me.
The word "quit" is enough to make me feel consternation at heart.
"My cunning loved one, you are being both ungrateful and unjust."³
When your eyebrows have lost their color, who will repaint them for you?"⁴

When Chin-lien had finished reading this, she laughed, saying, "If you are really innocent, come to my place tonight and I will interrogate you further."

"You gave me such a hard time," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "that I didn't get a wink of sleep all night. I will have to catch up on my sleep during the daylight hours."

"If you fail to show up," said Chin-lien, "I'll hold you to account."

When she had finished speaking, the woman returned to her room while Ch'en Ching-chi took the pawned articles of clothing back to the shop and continued to conduct business for a while, after which he returned to his quarters, sprawled out on the bed, and went to sleep. He could hardly wait for night to fall so he could go over to Chin-lien's quarters. Unexpectedly, however, by twilight the sky grew dark, and outside the window the pitter-patter of falling raindrops became audible. Truly:

The rustling sound in the courtyard⁵ is made by evening rain;
The drip of raindrops upon plantain leaves seems never-ending.

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the rain was falling heavily, he said to himself, "What unobliging weather. Just when she has asked me to come resolve things with her today, it has unexpectedly begun to rain. How depressing and debilitating."

Thereupon, he commenced:

Waiting for long periods as well as short, for the rain to end, but it did not stop and continued to fall with a swishing sound until the night watches began, so copiously that the water poured off the eaves. The young man could not wait any longer for the rain to stop, so he wrapped himself in a madder red blanket. Wu Yüeh-niang was at home at the time, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh and Yüan-hsiao were in the rear compound and had not come back out yet. Thereupon, he locked the door to his quarters, went into the garden in the pouring rain through the postern gate on the west side of the front courtyard, and gave a push to the gate into Chin-lien's quarters.

The woman, who was certain that he would show up that evening, had already instructed Ch'un-mei to befuddle Ch'iu-chü with several goblets of wine and go sleep with her in the room with the k'ang. For this reason, she had left the gate closed but unlocked. When Ch'en Ching-chi pushed at the gate and saw that it was ajar, he slipped inside and went straight into the woman's bedroom, where he saw that:

The gauze window was half open,
Silver candles were burning high, while the table was spread with wine and delicacies, and Golden goblets were filled to the brim.

When the two of them had sat down:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh,
the woman asked him, "If you have not been carrying on with Meng Yü-lou, how did this hairpin fall into your hands?"

"It was something that I picked up in the garden under the rose-leaved raspberry trellis the other day," Ch'en Ching-chi replied. "If I am not telling the truth:

May I suffer death and annihilation."

"As long as you are innocent," the woman said, "I'll give this pin back to you to put in your hair. I don't want to confiscate anything of yours. But you must be sure to keep whatever pins, sachets, handkerchiefs, and keepsakes that I have given you safe and sound. If you lose track of a single one of them I'll take you to task."

The two of them drank wine and played board games together until the first watch before they:

Got into bed and prepared to sleep.

They then:

Tumbled and tossed like male and female phoenixes, and kept at it for fully half the night. The woman took all of the arts of the bedchamber that she had formerly practiced with Hsi-men Ch'ing and tried them out on her lover during a single night.

To resume our story, during the night, from her position in the adjacent room, Ch'iu-chü overheard what sounded like a male voice speaking but did not know who it was. When the cock crowed at dawn the next morning, she got up to urinate and suddenly heard the sound of the door being opened in the adjoining room. In the hazy moonlight, it had not yet stopped raining. On looking through the window, she saw someone draped in a red blanket on his way out the door.

"That looks like Ch'en Ching-chi," she said to herself. "So it turns out that he's been sleeping with my mistress, night after night. She is forever protesting her own virtue in front of other people, while all the time she's been carrying on an affair with her son-in-law."

That day, she went straight back to the kitchen in the rear compound and told Hsiao-yü, thus and so, all about what she had seen.

She did not anticipate that Hsiao-yü, who was on friendly terms with Ch'un-mei, would go tell her about it, saying, "That Ch'iu-chü from your place says that your mistress is carrying on an affair with her son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi. Yesterday, he spent the whole night in her room, and he only left this morning. His wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Yüan-hsiao did not spend the night in the front compound."

When Ch'un-mei returned to Chin-lien's quarters, she told her all about it, word for word, and concluded, "If you don't give that slave a few strokes of the rod, but allow her to carry on this way with her:

Deceitful mouth and duplicitous tongue, you might as well be giving her the license to do you in."

On hearing this, Chin-lien became enraged, summoned Ch'iu-chü into her presence, and made her kneel down before her, saying, "I told you to boil up some congee, but you only managed to break the pot. I dare say:

The hole in your bottom's so big:

Your mind has dropped out, or something of the sort. Since I haven't beaten this slave for several days, her bones have begun to itch."

Thereupon, taking up a rod, she gave her thirty cruel strokes on the back with all her strength until she:

Howled like a stuck pig,

and the skin on her body was broken.

At this point, Ch'un-mei came over and said, "Mother, these few strokes that you've given her will do no more than scratch her where she itches. You ought to strip her naked, call in a page boy to give her twenty or thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo, and see if that will induce any fear in her. To merely touch her up with these few strokes, as if you were playing with a monkey, is:

Hardly enough to discolor the water.

Brazen as she is, do you really think she's afraid of you? As a slave, it is her duty to see that:

Words spoken inside do not get out, and Words spoken outside do not get in.

To let her get away with such things is to nurture a talebearer in your own household."

"Who said anything anyway?" Ch'iu-chü protested.

"Still shooting off your mouth are you?" the woman said. "You home-breaking master-betraying slave! Don't you say another word."

With these imprecations she impelled Ch'iu-chü to flee back to the kitchen. Truly:

When a mosquito gets slapped with a fan,

It is for hurting people with its mouth.⁶

One day, on the occasion of the Mid-Autumn Festival on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, Chin-lien secretly invited Ch'en Ching-chi to enjoy the moon and drink wine with her that evening, and join with Ch'un-mei in playing the board game called Turtle Pachisi with each other. That night, in the desire to get more rest, they overslept and had not yet gotten up by the time for their morning repast, thereby opening themselves to the risk of exposure. They did not anticipate that Ch'iu-chü would see what they were up to and promptly go back to the door of the master suite in the rear compound to tell Yüeh-niang about it. It so happened that she was engaged in combing her hair at the moment, and Hsiao-yü was standing in attendance by the door.

Ch'iu-chü drew her aside and told her, "Last night, our son-in-law, thus and so, once again spent the night in my mistress's room, and right now he hasn't even gotten up yet. The other day, when I informed you what they were up to, my mistress gave me a beating; but today I saw the evidence clearly with my own eyes. I am not traducing her. Ask your mistress to go over there quickly and see the situation for herself."

Hsiao-yü reviled her in response, saying, "You:

Open-eyed and brazen-faced, slave! You're just trying to do your mistress in once again. My mistress is combing her hair. You'd better get out of here."

Yüeh-niang overheard them and asked, "What are you talking about?"

Hsiao-yü:

Could not conceal the situation,

but only said, "The Fifth Lady has sent Ch'iu-chü to ask you to go have a word with her," without mentioning anything else.

When Yüeh-niang had finished combing her hair, she:

Lightly moved her lotus feet,

and showed up all of a sudden at the door of Chin-lien's quarters in the front compound. No sooner did Ch'un-mei catch sight of her than she rushed inside to inform Chin-lien of her arrival. Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi were still ensconced under the bedclothes and had not yet arisen. On hearing that Yüeh-niang had shown up, the two of them suffered quite a start and were thrown into such consternation that they were barely able to extricate themselves in time for Ch'en Ching-chi to conceal himself behind the frame of the bedstead, in the hope of hiding the situation by:

Ch'iu-chü Resentfully Discloses a Clandestine Affair

Drawing an embroidered quilt over it.

Chin-lien had Ch'un-mei place a low table on the bed and bring her a beaded floral ornament which she could pretend to be working on.

In no time at all, Yüeh-niang came into the room and sat down, saying, "Sister Six, since you still hadn't ventured out the door, I wondered what you were up to, but it turns out that you've been in your bedroom working on a beaded floral ornament."

Picking it up in her hand and examining it, she complimented her, saying, "Your handiwork is really skillful. You've created a sesame flower design in the center, and a pattern of lattice-shaped interlocking lozenges on either side, surrounded with a motif of 'honeybees rifling chrysanthemum blossoms.' You've also fitted the beads neatly together, one after the other, to create the motif of 'joined hearts.' It really looks attractive. In the future, I hope you'll make a similar piece for me to wear as a headband."

Only after the woman saw that the words Yüeh-niang addressed to her were friendly, did:

The little fawn in her heart cease its hopping, and she was able to order Ch'un-mei to pour some tea for her.

Soon afterwards, when Yüeh-niang had finished her tea and chatted for a while, she got up to go, saying, "Sister Six, as soon as you finish combing your hair, come back to the rear compound for a visit."

Chin-lien promised to come and saw Yüeh-niang out the door, after which she hurriedly urged Ch'en Ching-chi to get on his way and return to the front compound. Ch'un-mei and her mistress had both broken into a sweat over the situation.

"The First Lady doesn't ordinarily come to my quarters without any reason," the woman said to Ch'un-mei. "If she didn't have any pretext for doing so, why should she have come here so early in the morning today?"

"In all probability it was because of something this slave of ours said to her," replied Ch'un-mei.

In a little while, who should turn up but Hsiao-yü, who told them, thus and so, "Ch'iu-chü came back to the rear compound and claimed that our son-in-law has been here in your room:

Sleeping from morning to night,

And then from night to morning.

I gave her a piece of my mind, but she wouldn't budge. When my mistress asked what was going on, I didn't reveal anything but said that the Fifth Lady had sent Ch'iu-chü to invite her to come have a word with her. That's why she came, but you must keep this to yourself.

A great person does not deign to notice

the faults of petty persons.

But you had better be on your guard against that slave of yours."

Gentle reader take note: Although Yüeh-niang did not believe the tales that Ch'iu-chü had told, she was apprehensive lest Chin-lien, who was still:

A young and delicate lass, and who no longer had a husband, as time went on, might someday succumb to a momentary temptation. She feared that if word of this got out, it would lead gossipers to say, "Although Hsi-men Ch'ing was a person to be reckoned with during his lifetime, it did not take long after his death for the women in his household to end up:

All at sevens and eights."

"They may even suggest that this child of mine is:

Of questionable origin;⁷

with the result that, though:

Everything may remain sweet-smelling at home,

Our reputation will become malodorous abroad."⁸

In addition, out of affection for her stepdaughter, she told Hsi-men Tachieh not to venture outside the premises and had her move into Li Chiao-erh's vacant quarters, so that she and Ch'en Ching-chi could reside inside the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds. When it was the turn of Manager Fu Ming to go home, she arranged for Ch'en Ching-chi to take turns with him in staying overnight in the shop. She also ordained that when he had to come inside or go out in order to fetch articles of clothing or pharmaceutical supplies, he should be accompanied by Tai-an. All the doors were to be kept locked, and the maids and servants' wives were all prohibited from leaving the premises except on specific errands. Everything was to be strictly enforced.

As a result, the vibrant feelings that existed between P'an Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi were frustrated. Truly:

Pleasing relationships in this world are often interrupted;

The finest of prospects fail to last as long as people like.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

How can he ever visit the T'ien-t'ai Mountains in pursuit of immortal maidens?

The Three Isles of the Blest remain invisible, hidden amid the waves of the sea.

To vanish inside a nobleman's gates is to be
as unreachable as the ocean depths;

From this point on, one's lover might as well be a stranger along the highway.⁹

After P'an Chin-lien's clandestine affair had been exposed by Ch'iu-chü, although Yüeh-niang did not quite believe it, she saw to it that all the doors in the household were locked at night; that Hsi-men Ta-chieh moved into Li Chiao-erh's vacated quarters; and that whenever Ch'en Ching-chi had occasion to fetch pharmaceutical supplies or articles of clothing he would be accompanied by Tai-an or P'ing-an on the way in or out. As a result, the ardent feelings between the two of them were frustrated, and they were not able to get together for a month or more. Chin-lien found:

Each and every day increasingly insufferable,

Amid embroidered drapes upon a lonely pillow.

She could hardly endure:

The desolation of her painted chambers.

She couldn't help feeling affected by:

The eye alongside the wood, and

The heart beneath the field.¹⁰

She became:

Too indolent to rearrange her makeup;¹¹

Her intake of tea and food diminished;
The belt around her waist grew loose;¹² and
She started listlessly to wither away.

Every day:

All she wanted to do was to sleep, and
She could hardly keep her head up.¹³

Ch'un-mei approached her and said, "Mother, why is it that for the last few days you haven't gone back to the rear compound for a visit, or taken a stroll in the garden to relax yourself? Every day, you merely give vent to:

Long sighs as well as short.

Really, what's it all about?"

"You don't understand the intensity of the feelings between myself and our son-in-law," the woman replied.
There is a song to the tune "Wild Geese Alight" that testifies to this:

He and I are like a double-headed lotus blossom growing on the same stem,
Or the inseparable fish that swim in pairs,
having only one eye apiece.
On first meeting, we became as ardent as though glued together.
To be suddenly separated in this way is difficult to endure.
How strange can things get?
For the last couple of days, he has not come in to see me;
And the First Lady has taken to locking the gate.
Even the dog in the garden is acting queerly.
It's hard to guess why.
The maidservants are looking askance at me.
It is hard to bear.
This yearning for him is hard to eradicate.

"Mother," said Ch'un-mei, "you can relax. It's not a problem.

Even if the sky should be about to fall,

There are the four giants to hold it up.

Yesterday, the First Lady arranged to have the two nuns recite a precious scroll here this evening, so the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds will be locked early. Tonight, I'll claim that I have to go to the stable out front to get some straw with which to stuff a pillow, which will give me an opportunity to go summon him from the shop. If you will write a note to him and give it to me, whatever happens, I'll contrive to make it possible for our son-in-law to have a rendezvous with you. What do you think about it?"

"My good sister," the woman said, "if you are willing to take pity on me, and arrange for him to show up:

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never be able to forget it.¹⁴

When I recover from my indisposition, I'll make you a pair of shoes fully decorated with floral patterns."

"Mother," said Ch'un-mei, "how can you say such a thing? You and I are like one person. Moreover, Father is dead. In the days to come, no matter whether your circumstances improve or decline, I would like to share them with you, so that we can stay together."

"If you really feel that way," the woman said, "I could hardly ask for anything better."

The woman thereupon:

Lightly grasping the ivory tube, and Gently spreading the flowered paper,¹⁵ proceeded to write out a note and seal it securely.

That evening, the woman was initially in the rear compound with Yüeh-niang, when she pretended not to be feeling well as an excuse for disappearing like:

A golden cicada molting its skin.

Upon returning to the front compound, she remained idly in her quarters with nothing to do. Early in the evening, Yüeh-niang saw to it that the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds was closed, after the maids and servant wives had been allowed out, and then settled down to listen to the nuns recite their precious scroll.

Meanwhile, Chin-lien enjoined Ch'un-mei to deliver her note, saying, "My good sister, go and invite him to come here as soon as possible."

There is a song to the tune "The Sixth Lady from West of the River" that testifies to this:

Enjoining Ch'un-mei, she says,
"My good sister,
Be so good as to release your oceanic generosity.
This night is our only chance to get together.

Ch'a!
Step along as fast as you can,
As fast as you can.
Under my piles of embroidered quilts,
I await him here."¹⁶

Ch'un-mei said, "Wait until I get that slave Ch'iu-chü drunk with a few goblets of wine and lock her into the kitchen; after which, I'll make the excuse that I'm taking a basket to the stable out front in order to fetch some straw for stuffing a pillow, which will give me an opportunity to summon him."

Thereupon, she poured out two large bowls of wine, saw to it that Ch'iu-chü drank them, locked her in the kitchen, and went out the door with the woman's note in hand. There is a song to the tune "Wild Geese Alight" that testifies to this:

"I'm off to the stable on the pretext of fetching straw.
Once I get out front, I'll be able to summon him.
On my way back, I'll get the dog out of the way,
And see that the lock is left hanging on the door.
The goblets will be filled with wine;
The lamps by the bed will be covered.
The bed curtains will be warm in the spring night;
Ready for the mating of male and female phoenixes.
I will not let anybody know about it;
And will see that Ch'iu-chü is drunk.
When you see the waving of the flower shadows, you'll know that he has come.
This evening, I guarantee that the two of you will have a successful tryst."

Ch'un-mei went out to the front of the residence, filled a basket with straw, and then proceeded to the door of the pawnshop and called to be let in. At the time, Manager Fu Ming was not in the shop, having gone home for the night. Only Ch'en Ching-chi was there, having just sprawled out on the k'ang. On suddenly hearing that someone was calling at the door, he asked who it was.

Ch'un-mei responded by saying, "It's your mother from a former incarnation, the one of the Five Plague Spirits whose job it is to dispel lovesickness."¹⁷

When Ch'en Ching-chi opened the door and saw who it was, his face broke into a smile, and he laughed, saying, "So it's you, young lady. There's no one else here. Come inside and sit down."

On coming into the room, she noticed a candle burning on the table, and asked, "Where are the page boys?"

"Tai-an and P'ing-an are sleeping in the pharmaceutical shop," Ch'en Ching-chi replied. "I'm here all by myself. The one who is:

Enduring loneliness, and Suffering desolation, is none other than your humble servant."

"My mistress wishes me to convey her greetings to you," said Ch'un-mei, "saying, what a fine person you are, not to have come near her door for all these days, or paid a visit to our quarters. She claims you must have set your eyes on another target, and no longer care for the likes of us."

"How can she say such a thing?" Ch'en Ching-chi protested. "Ever since she was exposed to that idle gossip the other day, the First Lady has seen fit to:

Secure the doors and secure the gates, so that my movements have been restricted."

"All on your account," said Ch'un-mei, "during these last few days, my mistress has been as unhappy as can be. Every day she is:

Disconsolate and inconsolable,"¹⁸ doesn't feel like eating or drinking, and is far too distracted to work. Today, the First Lady asked her to stay in the rear compound and listen to the recitation of a precious scroll, but she refused and came back to her quarters. She is wholeheartedly obsessed with longing and begged me to deliver this note to you, in the hope that, whatever happens, you will come to her as soon as possible."

Ch'en Ching-chi accepted the note and noticed that it was carefully sealed. When he opened and read it, it turned out to be a song to the tune "Mistletoe" that read as follows:

This peach blossom face of mine,
All on your account, has become emaciated.
It is not because, pitying the flowers and loving the moon,¹⁹ I suffer from spring ennui;
But rather because, this spring's regrets are no less than those of earlier springs.²⁰
It is merely a case of my pearly tears having run dry,²¹ on account of my lovesickness.
What I regret is that, as the lamp shines on my embroidered bed curtains, I am alone.

Though I long to have him in my studio,
He is so far away the horizon is closer.²²

When Ch'en Ching-chi had read the text of this song, he bent his body and made a deep obeisance to Ch'un-mei, saying, "I have put you to a lot of trouble, a lot of trouble. I didn't know that she was suffering so. It is true that I have failed to visit the two of you. Pray, don't take it amiss. Don't take it amiss. You can go ahead. As soon as I get myself together, I'll come after you."

He then opened the door of the wardrobe and took out a white satin handkerchief, and a silver chatelaine with three pendant toothpicks, and gave them to her as a reward for her efforts. Thereupon, he embraced Ch'un-mei and laid her on the k'ang, after which the two of them fell to kissing and sucking each others' tongues, unable to contain their delight. Truly:

Failing to consummate his assignation
with Ts'ui Ying-ying;
He settled for a tryst with Hung-niang
to relieve his lust.

There is a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that testifies to this:

Her eyebrows lightly penciled,
her comb stuck askew;
She has no heart to continue doing her embroidery.
Deep within cloudy windows,
in misty chambers;
Quietly seated in her study she practices calligraphy.

Beautiful as can be,
Ever more lovely;
She is a goddess incarnate,
unknown to this world.
At first glance, one might say she resembles a plum blossom;
But on closer examination, the plum blossom is not her equal.²³

At the time, after the two of them had played with each other for a while, Ch'un-mei took the straw and returned to Chin-lien's quarters, where she told the woman, word for word, about what had happened, saying, "I summoned him, and he will be here momentarily. Upon reading that note of yours, he was as pleased as could be and bowed deeply to me, rewarding me with a handkerchief and a set of silver toothpicks."

"You go outside and take a look," the woman said. "He may be on his way in. Don't let the dog bite him."

"I've already put the dog out of the way," said Ch'un-mei.

It so happens that it was the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the eighth month at the time, just after the Mid-Autumn Festival, so the moon was shining brightly.

To resume our story, after Ch'en Ching-chi had gone over to the pharmaceutical shop next door and called on P'ing-an to come take his place, he took off for the garden so fast that his feet:

Beat out a festive paradiddle as he went.

Finding the front gate to the garden locked, he made his way in through the postern gate, headed straight for Chin-lien's quarters, and shook the branches of the woody hibiscus tree as a signal of his arrival. When Ch'un-mei saw the flowery branches moving on the other side of the wall, she promptly responded with a cough and told the woman he had come. Ch'en Ching-chi pushed open the gate, slipped inside, and proceeded straight to her room.

The woman greeted him at the door with a smile, saying, "A fine person you are, not to have visited me for so long!"

"I was concerned not to make trouble for either of us," he said, "so I chose to stay away for a few days. I didn't know that you were so unhappy about it.

I have been remiss about keeping in touch with you."²⁴

The woman said, "There is a song to the tune 'Four Variations' that testifies to this:

Simply because of some idle gossip,
You have let our love, as deep as the sea,
suddenly go awry.
For these several days, you have not even approached my door;
Keeping my heart on tenterhooks.
My tenderhearted lover,
How can you thus forsake me?"²⁵

The two of them sat down together, while Ch'un-mei secured the postern gate, set up a table in the room, and laid out an array of wine and delicacies on it. The woman and Ch'en Ching-chi sat down:

Shoulder to shoulder and thigh over thigh.

Ch'un-mei seated herself to one side and poured the wine.

With the raising of glasses and passing of cups,

Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,
they drank for a time, while the three of them set out the pieces for the game of Turtle Pachisi and proceeded to play it together. As they began to become inebriated, the woman, with:

Her captivating eyes all a blur,
Her raven locks somewhat askew, got out Hsi-men Ch'ing's bag of sexual implements, including the "Ladies Delight," the aphrodisiac called "The Quavery Voices of Amorous Beauties," the silver clasp, and the "Titillating Bell," a full complement of sexual aids, and instructed Ch'en Ching-chi in how to use them.

Under the gleam of lamplight, the woman then:

Stripped her body completely naked, and reclined faceup on a "Drunken Old Gentleman's" lounge chair. Ch'en Ching-chi also stripped himself so that not a stitch of silk remained on his body, above or below, sat down on a chair facing her, took up an album illustrating the twenty-four positions²⁶ for sexual intercourse, and set out to emulate the behaviors depicted.

The woman then said to Ch'un-mei, "You get behind our son-in-law and give him a push when he needs it. I'm afraid he's worn himself out."

Ch'un-mei actually went behind him and proceeded to push as Ch'en Ching-chi's organ penetrated the woman's vagina and he:

Moved back and forth, retracting and thrusting,²⁷
Producing a pleasurable sensation,
That was completely indescribable.²⁸

To resume our story, Ch'iu-chü slept in the kitchen at the rear of the premises until the middle of the night, when she got up to relieve herself. Finding herself unable to open the door into the courtyard because it was latched shut on the other side, she managed to reach around with her hand and detach the latch. Under the brightly shining moon, she proceeded with:

Skulking step and lurking gait,
to make her way up to the front window, where:

Moistening a hole in the paper,²⁹ with her saliva, she was able to look inside.

Within the room, illuminated by lamps and candles shining ever so brightly, she saw the three persons, all quite drunk and stark naked, carrying on for all they were worth. The three of them were clustered together, two of them going at it while seated on facing chairs, while Ch'un-mei stood behind Ch'en Ching-chi propelling him forward like a cart. Behold:

One of them shows total disregard for the status of her husband;
The other does not discriminate between above and below, exalted or humble.
One of them, panting for all he is worth,
Sounds like an ox snoring in the willow's shade.
The other, as her coy cries reverberate,
Resembles an oriole warbling among the flowers.
One of them, seated on his chair, shows off
the passions evoked by clouds and rain;

Ch'un-mei Transmits a Note to Facilitate a Lovers' Tryst

The other swears into her partner's ears to be as faithful as the hills and seas.
One of them, in her widow's chamber,
transforms it into a pleasure ground;
The other, before his mother-in-law,
turns things into a realm of lechery.
One of them takes all Hsi-men Ch'ing's sexual aids and bestows them on her son-in-law;
The other, emulating Han Shou's stealing of perfume,³⁰ conveys it all to his light of love.³¹

Truly:

Signing a compact never to be separated
during this lifetime;
They agree to be happily bound together
in the life to come.³²

At the time, all of this was clearly observed by Ch'iu-chü.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself,
“She still persists in protesting her own virtue in front of other people and intends to beat me, but today I have seen the truth of the matter with my own eyes. Tomorrow, I’ll report it to the First Lady, and she can hardly claim that I am falsely accusing them with my:

Deceitful mouth and duplicitous tongue.”

Thereupon, after spying on them until she might well have ejaculated:

“Is it not delightful?”

she returned to the kitchen and went to sleep.

The three of them kept at it until the third watch before finally going to sleep.

The next morning, before dawn, Ch’un-mei got up before the others and went to the kitchen, where she found the door to be ajar, and interrogated Ch’iu-chü about it.

“You might well ask,” responded Ch’iu-chü. “I had an urgent need to urinate and went outside to piss. I had to unlatch the door in order to get into the courtyard to relieve myself.”

“You preternatural slave!” said Ch’un-mei. “Why didn’t you use the chamber pot in the room?”

“I didn’t know there was a chamber pot in the room,” responded Ch’iu-chü.

The two of them continued to bicker there at the rear of the premises, while Ch’en Ching-chi got up at dawn and vanished into the front compound. Truly:

With two hands he tore open the road between life and death; Flopping over and leaping out through the gate to perdition.

Chin-lien subsequently asked Ch’un-mei, “What was that fuss out back about?”

Upon Ch’un-mei telling her, thus and so, how Ch’iu-chü had managed to open the door during the night, the woman was enraged and planned to give Ch’iu-chü a beating.

Ch’iu-chü, meanwhile, had gone back to the rear compound once again to report to Yüeh-niang about what she had seen, but Yüeh-niang responded with a shout and cursed her, saying, “You lousy slave, you’re just trying to do your mistress in! The other day, you came back here for no good reason and started:

Talebearing and embroidering on the facts, saying that your mistress was hiding our son-in-law, Ch’en Ching-chi, in her room, where they were:

Sleeping from morning to night,
And then from night to morning.

You urged me to go see for myself, but when I arrived your mistress was sitting in front of a bed table, stringing beads for a floral ornament, and Son-in-law Ch’en was nowhere to be seen. Later on, he came in from the front compound. You’re nothing but a slave who is bent on destroying her mistress. How could she have hidden a full-grown man in her room? Even a sugar figurine or a wooden doll would turn up, no matter where you concealed them. You can hardly suggest that she managed to secrete him in her cunt. If word of this should get out, those who know the truth of the matter will say that it was you slaves who did in your mistress; but those who don’t will say that in the past Hsi-men Ch’ing managed to subdue any number of women, but it did not take long after his death for the women of his household to end up:

All at sevens and eights.

They may even go so far as to question the paternity of this child of mine.”

Thereupon, she threatened Ch’iu-chü with a beating, but she was so intimidated that she fled back to the front compound:

Running as fast as though she had wings,³³ and no longer dared to report anything to the rear compound.

When Chin-lien heard that Yüeh-niang had expelled Ch’iu-chü from her presence, and refused to believe her allegations, she became even bolder than before and amused herself by composing a song for Ch’en Ching-chi’s benefit, to the tune “Red Embroidered Slippers,” that testified to her feelings:

When we meet to enjoy the clouds and rain, don’t let any word leak out.
As for idle gossip, it’s not worth paying more attention to than a fart.
What reason is there to be deterred by the securest lock or tightest knot?
Those who wield spades to unearth the facts will only hurt their wrists;
Those who seek to expose what we are up to will wear out their throats.
The ardor of our feelings for each other will only end up being enhanced.³⁴

When Hsi-men Ta-chieh heard about this episode, she privately interrogated Ch’en Ching-chi about it.

“How can you believe that delirious slave?” Ch’en Ching-chi responded. “Yesterday it was my turn to sleep overnight in the shop, so how could I have gone into the garden? Besides, the gate to the garden is kept locked all the time.”

“You lousy jailbird!” retorted Hsi-men Ta-chieh. “You had better stop shooting off your mouth. As for your doings:

 If the wind so much as stirs a blade of grass, and word of it comes to my ears, or causes Mother to criticize me, while you continue to carry on:

 As free as you please, you can give up any idea of continuing to share these quarters with me.”

Ch'en Ching-chi replied:

 “Gossip about pros and cons goes on all day;

 If you pay no heed to it, it will disappear.³⁵

No wonder talebearing slaves like her never come to a good end. It is clear that the First Lady doesn't take her seriously.”

“That's enough of that!” responded Hsi-men Ta-chieh. “As long as you're telling the truth, everything will be all right.”
Truly:

 Who could know that the heart of the young man is as flighty as a willow catkin,

 Or anticipate that the mind of his mistress is as capricious as tangled silk?

 If you want to know the outcome of these events,

 Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

WU YÜEH-NIANG CREATES A STIR IN THE TEMPLE OF IRIDESCENT CLOUDS; SUNG CHIANG UPRIGHTLY FREES HER FROM THE CH'ING-FENG STRONGHOLD

Winter and summer forever green, such phenomena are seldom seen in this world;
The marvelous transformations wrought by Heaven and Earth have created them.
Her virtuous example is not besmirched by the grime of the mundane world;
She is chastely resolved to abide by her oath to be united in the world below.
Her conspicuous rectitude has a numinous quality that is utterly incomparable;
The patience with which she bears her widowhood generates a lingering fragrance.
If the people of this world are curious about the secret of everlasting life;
The truth of the matter is that virtuous behavior is conducive to longevity.

THE STORY GOES that, one day, Wu Yüeh-niang invited her elder brother Wu K'ai to come and consult with her about her wish to make a pilgrimage to the summit of Mount T'ai in T'ai-an prefecture in order to burn incense in the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds.¹ When Hsi-men Ch'ing was on his last legs, she had sworn an oath to do so. Wu K'ai agreed to escort her on this mission and took care of procuring the incense, candles, paper money, and sacrificial offerings that she would need. Tai-an and Lai-an were also to accompany her, and donkeys were hired for them to ride.

Before taking her seat in her curtained sedan chair, she enjoined Meng Yü-lou, P'an Chin-lien, Sun Hsüeh-o, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh to look after the house and instructed the wet nurse Ju-i, and the maidservants, to look after Hsiao-ko.

She went on to say, "The ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds is to be locked early if there is no reason to do otherwise, and you are not to venture outside the premises. Ch'en Ching-chi also must be instructed not to go out, and to look after the front gate along with Manager Fu Ming. I will probably be able to return home by the end of the month."

On the morning of the fifteenth day of the ninth month, she burned paper money to convey her intentions to the gods, and that evening, after announcing her departure before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, shared a farewell drink with her fellow wives. She also turned the keys to the master suite and the storerooms over to Hsiao-yü and enjoined her to look after the premises carefully.

The next morning, she got up at the fifth watch and prepared to depart. The whole entourage led out the mounts they had hired, and her sister wives came out to the front gate to see her off.

It was late autumn, and the weather was cold and the days short. They traveled two stages each day, covering sixty or seventy li, and sought out village inns before dusk in order to spend the night, resuming their journey early the next morning. On their way:

The autumn clouds were austere,
The frigid geese were desolate,
The trees were shedding leaves,
The landscape had turned bleak,²
Their gloom was insurmountable.³

There is a poem that testifies to the way Yüeh-niang traversed the distant mountains and passes in order to fulfill the vow she had made on her husband's behalf:

For her entire life her determined fidelity will rival ice or frost;
Her little specimen of an immaculate heart⁴ is able to move Azure Heaven.⁵
For her husband's sake she promised to go as far as the sacred mountain; Along the thousand li of mountains and passes her name exudes fragrance.

To make a long story short, of the events of their trip there is nothing to tell. After traveling for several days, they arrived at T'ai-an prefecture and were able to contemplate Mount T'ai. In truth, it is:

The number one famous mountain under Heaven.⁶
Its coiling base is rooted in the earth;
Its peak rises into the heart of Heaven.⁷
It lies between the ancient states of Ch'i and Lu;
And emanates an atmosphere of precipitous majesty.

When Wu K'ai saw that it was getting late, he conducted them into an inn to spend the night.

The next morning, they got up early in order to begin their ascent and headed toward the Tai-yüeh Temple, or Temple of the Eastern Peak, which is located at the foot of the mountain.

Sacred rites were observed here dynasty after dynasty;
Feng and Shan Sacrifices were held here age after age.⁸

It was the premier temple in the realm. Behold:

The temple is located at the Eastern Peak,
The mountain that rules over the universe.
It is the most venerable of all mountains,
The presiding director of the myriad gods.
If you lean on a balustrade at the summit,
You can see as far as the River of Weak Water or the Isles of the Blest;⁹

If you climb the evergreens on the crest,
You will find yourself to be enveloped by the thick clouds and thin fog.

Towers and terraces soar aloft,¹⁰
As though ready for the gold raven to spread its wings and fly there;

Halls and galleries rise steeply,
As if prepared for the jade rabbit to leap aloft and come to visit.¹¹

The temple features carved rafters and painted beams,¹²
And is enhanced with azure tiles and vermilion eaves.¹³

The translucent latticework on phoenix gates brightens the yellow silk;
From the tortoiseshell-patterned embroidered drapes hang brocade tassels.

Gazed at from afar, the sacred images,
With their nine-tasseled crowns, show the eyes of Shun and the eyebrows of Yao;¹⁴ Seen close up, the aspects of the gods,
Dressed in dragon robes, display the shoulders of T'ang and the back of Yü.

The Lord of Destiny of the Nine Heavens,¹⁵ Is adorned with a hibiscus cap, enhancing his robe of crimson silk;

Ping-ling, Duke of Awesome Transcendence,¹⁶
Is clad in a yellow robe, set off by a girdle of Indigo Field jade.

To their left are arrayed officers wearing jade pins and pearl-studded shoes;¹⁷

To their right stand officials with purple sashes and golden seals of office.¹⁸

The whole edifice exhibits an air of gravity, Defended by three thousand armor-bearing generals;
The two corridors exude a martial atmosphere,
Protected by a hundred thousand ironclad soldiers.

Underneath the Hao-li Hill,¹⁹

The Assessor presides over the seventy-two bureaus of the underworld;

Within the White Mule Shrine,²⁰

The tutelary god regulates the twenty-four terms of the solar year.
 The iron-faced Defender-in-chief of the lakes of fire,
 Day after day, shows off his powers;
 The General of the Five Ways who rules life and death,
 Year after year, reveals his potency.
 The burning of sacred incense never ceases,
 As the celestial spirits on their flying steeds convey their vermilion texts;
 The sacrifices are celebrated on schedule,
 As both old and young express their hopes for the granting of good fortune.
 Within the Chia-ning Hall,
 Propitious clouds hover densely;
 Outside the Southern Gate, Auspicious vapors swirl around.²¹

Truly:

A myriad citizens come to worship in the Temple of Iridescent Clouds; Within the four seas, all pay homage to the God of the Eastern Peak.²²

Wu K'ai conducted Yüeh-niang to the Tai-yüeh Temple, where she proffered incense in the main hall and paid obeisance before the sacred image of the God of the Eastern Peak. A Taoist head priest stood beside her and intoned the text of her declaration. She then went on to burn paper money before the images in the two corridors and eat a vegetarian meal, after which, they embarked on the climb to the summit, ascending the forty-nine switchbacks, and:

Grabbing the vines and grasping the creepers,²³ to help them on their way up. The golden edifice of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds seemed to be suspended in space, shrouded in clouds and mist, forty-five li above the foot of the mountain. From its vantage point, one could look down upon the wind-blown clouds and thunderstorms below. Yüeh-niang and her entourage had set out from the Tai-yüeh Temple at 8:00 that morning, and after climbing the switchbacks and reaching the summit it was after 4:00 P.M. before they arrived at the Golden Edifice of the Goddess, which was adorned with a vermilion plaque, with the three characters Temple of Iridescent Clouds inscribed in gold. They entered the temple and paid obeisance to the gilded image of the goddess. What did it look like? Behold:

On her head is coiled a nine-dragon flying-phoenix coiffure;
 Her body is clad in a gown of red silk enhanced with golden threads.
 From her girdle of Indigo Field jade is suspended a lengthy flap;
 She lifts a white jade scepter between her variegated sleeves.
 Her face resembles a lotus blossom,²⁴
 Her natural-looking eyes and brows enhance her cloudy locks;
 Her lips are like gilded vermilion,
 Her euphoric demeanor embellishes her snow-white physique.
 She looks like the Queen Mother of the West feasting at the Jasper Pool;
 It is just as though Ch'ang-o has come down from her palace in the moon.
 The majestic quality of her immortal demeanor is impossible to depict;
 The dignified bearing of her figure would be difficult to delineate.²⁵

When Yüeh-niang had finished paying her obeisance to the image of the goddess, she noticed that the head priest of the temple was standing beside her. He looked to be about forty years old, was short in stature, and sported a three-forked beard, bright eyes, and white teeth. On his head he wore a Taoist cap, held in place with a pin, his body was clad in a crimson robe, and on his feet he wore a pair of shoes with cloud-patterned toes. Stepping forward, he proceeded, on her behalf, to intone the text of the declaration she had prepared in fulfillment of her vow, ignite the incense in a gilded brazier, and burn the paper money and imitation gold and silver ingots, after which, he told a young acolyte to accept the sacrificial offerings she had brought.

It so happens that this Taoist head priest was not the sort to abide by his lot. He was the principal disciple of Abbot Chin of the Tai-yüeh Temple at the foot of the mountain, and his name was Shih Po-ts'ai. He was an extreme example of:

The sort who are covetous of wealth and given to lust;
The kind who pander to the powerful and broker events.

In this area there was a character known as Year Star Yin, whose real name was Yin T'ien-hsi, who was the younger brother of the wife of Kao Lien, the prefect of T'ai-an. He was accustomed to leading a bunch of vagrants:

Sporting bows and flaunting arrows,
Along with their falcons and hounds, to engage in scrutinizing the hordes of female pilgrims from all quarters who were visiting the two temples, above and below. His reputation was such that no one dared to cross him. The Taoist priest Shih Po-ts'ai endeavored to curry favor with him by:

Disguising his iniquitous intent, and luring females into his abbot's quarters, where Yin T'ien-hsi was free to slake his lust on them in whatever way he liked.

When Shih Po-ts'ai saw that Yüeh-niang possessed:

An unusually attractive countenance, and was wearing a mourning cap, indicating that she must either be a woman from an official's family or a female member of a powerful household, and that she was accompanied by an elderly man with a gray beard, and two domestic page boys, he came forward and saluted them in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead, expressed his thanks for their offerings, and said, "Will you two benefactors not come into my abbot's quarters for a cup of tea?"

"Don't bother to trouble yourself," responded Wu K'ai. "We are about to go down the mountain."

"Even though you plan to descend the mountain," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "there is time enough yet."

In no time at all, he succeeded in persuading them to come into his abbot's quarters. The walls of the chamber were covered with snow-white plaster. At the head of the room stood a couch with a sesame flower design and willow-yellow brocaded curtains. Above an incense stand in a position of honor there was suspended a scroll painting that depicted the scene of Lü Tung-pin flirting with the courtesan White Peony.²⁶ To either side of it there hung scrolls with the two lines of a parallel couplet written in large characters of varying vividness that read:

Raising two sleeves swelled by a clear breeze
we posture like cranes; Facing a chamber suffused with bright moonlight
we expound the scriptures.

When Shih Po-ts'ai asked Wu K'ai his name, he replied, "My surname is Wu, and my given name is K'ai. This is my younger sister, née Wu, who has come to fulfill a vow that she made on behalf of her deceased husband. But we should not impose on your exalted establishment."

"Since the two of you are related," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "be good enough to sit down together in the seats of honor."

He then sat down himself in the position of host and directed his disciples Shou-ch'ing and Shou-li to serve the tea.

It so happens that he had two disciples, one of them named Kuo Shou-ch'ing and the other Kuo Shou-li, both of whom were fifteen years old and naturally endowed with good looks. They wore black satin Taoist caps on their heads, their topknots were held in place by red cords with two floating ribbons dangling behind, on their bodies they wore black silk Taoist robes, and their feet were clad in sandals and white socks. From their bodies:

A fragrant aroma assailed the senses.

When guests arrived, they were there to:

Serve tea or serve water,
Pour wine and serve food;

while at night, they were available for Shih Po-ts'ai to hump from behind like a carrier hugging a trunk, using them to:

Assuage his lust and gratify his hunger.

Although ostensibly they were the disciples of the head priest, in actuality they were nothing more than the master's concubines. And there is yet another feature that is hardly mentionable, which is that each of them, when they took down their trousers, had a large sanitary napkin strapped over his crotch to prevent the leakage of urine.

Gentle reader take note: All families with good boys and good girls should be sure never to deliver them to Buddhist monasteries or Taoist temples to leave the family and become monks or priests, Buddhist nuns or Taoist priestesses. Once exposed to those:

Male thieves and female whores, nine out of ten of them are likely to be victimized. There is a poem that testifies to this.

For what purpose are Taoist sanctuaries and Buddhist temples established?
The Taoists worship their Heavenly Worthies,

the Buddhists worship Buddha.
They are beautifully landscaped in order to give a false sense of purity;
Providing for visitors and welcoming guests
they engage in perverse doings.
Accountering their disciples with attractive clothes and handsome outfits;
They make use of wanton wine and leisured tea in ravishing female beauties.
How sad that the tenderly nurtured offspring of respectable families;
Should be entrusted to such monastics only to serve as their concubines.

Before long, the two disciples, Shou-ch'ing and Shou-li, set up a table in the room and laid out a vegetarian repast including mouth-watering sweetmeats, pastries, steamed and fried vegetarian dishes, and an assortment of other delicacies that filled the entire surface of the table. The first-class Sparrow Tongue tea, brewed with sweet water, was served in cups of white Ting-chou porcelain, with silver teaspoons in the shape of apricot leaves. When they finished their tea and the utensils had been cleared away, a selection of delicacies to go with the wine was served in:

Large platters and large bowls, consisting of chicken, goose, fish, duck, and other such nonvegetarian fare.
Pouring amber-colored wine,
Into chased silver goblets,
The wine flowed in golden ripples.²⁷

When the wine was served, Yüeh-niang wished to take her leave and called for Tai-an to come forward with a bolt of muslin and two taels of silver on a red lacquer tray and present them to Shih Po-ts'ai as an expression of their gratitude.

"We ought not to put your esteemed temple to so much trouble," said Wu K'ai. "These paltry gifts are merely an expression of our gratitude to Your Reverence. There is no need for you to offer us wine and food. It is growing late, and we must set out to descend the mountain."

This threw Shih Po-ts'ai into such consternation that he expressed no end of thanks, saying, "Untalented as I am, it is only thanks to the generous patronage of the Goddess that I am serving as the head priest of the Temple of the Iridescent Clouds here on the sacred peak, where I am dependent on the contributions received from the four quarters. Were I not to use these funds to entertain the donors from the four quarters, what should I use them for? And now, having offered merely these meager refreshments, I have put you to the trouble of presenting me with these generous gifts. You put me in a position in which it would be:

Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."

Only after repeatedly refusing to accept the proffered gifts did he finally direct his disciples to put them away.

Endeavoring to detain Yüeh-niang and Wu K'ai, he said, "Be so kind, whatever else you do, as to return to your seats for a little while, and imbibe three cups of wine. By so doing you would allow me to fully express my humble feelings."

When Wu K'ai saw how assiduously they were being pressed to stay, he felt obliged to sit down again with Yüeh-niang.

In no time at all, some heated delicacies were served, and Shih Po-ts'ai said to his disciples, "This wine is hardly worth drinking. Go and open that jug of lotus blossom wine with its penetrating fragrance that His Honor Prefect Hsü gave me the other day so we can share it with His Honor Wu."

Before long, his disciples brought in another heated flagon and poured out the warm wine, the first cup of which Shih Po-ts'ai offered to Yüeh-niang with both hands, but she refused to accept it.

"My younger sister is not accustomed to drinking wine," said Wu K'ai.

"My lady," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "You may encounter wind and frost along the way. Have a little. What harm can it do. Just drink a moderate amount."

So saying, he poured out half a cup for Yüeh-niang and another cup for Wu K'ai, saying, "Your Honor Wu, take a taste of this wine to see how you like it."

Wu K'ai drank a mouthful, and finding it to be:

Fragrant, sweet, and delicious,
With a robust and lingering flavor, said, "This is indeed a fine wine."

"I would not deceive you, venerable sir," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "but this wine was given to me by His Honor Prefect Hsü of Ch'ing-chou. His elderly lady, his daughter, and his son come to the Temple of the Eastern Peak every year to burn incense and sponsor a performance of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal.

Their relationship with me is extremely close.

Both his daughter and his son were brought here to undergo the ceremony of having religious names bestowed upon them under the aegis of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds. On seeing that I:

Possessed a placid disposition,
Was devoted to burning incense,
And was invariably trustworthy, they have shown me both respect and affection. In the past, half the resources of these two temples at the foot and the summit of the mountain have been subject to taxation, but in recent years, thanks to the benevolent patronage of His Honor Prefect Hsü, who has memorialized the throne to suspend these exactions, these resources are no longer taxed but are allowed to remain in the possession of the temples to be expended first of all on the worship of the goddess and secondly on the entertainment of incense-burning pilgrims from the four quarters."

While this parley was taking place in the abbot's quarters, down below, Tai-an, Lai-an, and the chair bearers who had brought them were provided with a place to sit down and were served soup, rice, and other snacks along with wine and meat in:

Large platters and large bowls,
until they had eaten their fill.

Gentle readers take note: Since Shih Po-ts'ai had concealed Yin T'ien-hsi on his premises and inveigled Yüeh-niang into his quarters with a view to giving him an opportunity to consummate a secret liaison with her, he could hardly fail to do whatever he could to play up to her.

After drinking several cups of wine, Wu K'ai saw that it was getting late and wanted to get up and go, but Shih Po-ts'ai said, "The sun is about to set, and it is already too late for you to make your descent of the mountain. If you are not unwilling to stay overnight in my quarters, it would be easier for you to go down the mountain tomorrow morning."

"It so happens that we have left some luggage in the inn," said Wu K'ai, "and I fear that our absence might give petty people an opportunity for mischief."

Shih Po-ts'ai laughed at this, saying, "There is no reason to worry about that. If anything untoward should occur, and it became known that you were on a pilgrimage to our temple, the inhabitants of the villages and inns would be scared to death. How do you suppose they would like it if the innkeepers were dragged into the prefectural yamen and given a taste of the squeezers to induce them to uncover the whereabouts of the culprits?"

Upon hearing this, Wu K'ai continued to sit in his place while Shih Po-ts'ai poured him another large goblet of wine. When Wu K'ai became aware how potent the wine was, he concealed it under his clothing, pretended to be drunk, and asked to be escorted to a bathroom, after which he expressed a desire to be given a tour of the temple sanctuary. Shih Po-ts'ai, accordingly, directed his disciple Kuo Shou-ch'ing to accompany him, gave him the keys needed to open the doors, and sent Wu K'ai off to explore the premises. Wu Yüeh-niang was physically exhausted and wanted to lie down on the bed for a nap. Shih Po-ts'ai responded by going outside to sit down and locking the door behind him.

This turned out to be one of those occasions on which,

Something was destined to happen.

No sooner had Yüeh-niang sprawled out on the bed than she suddenly heard the sound of a clatter as a man jumped out from inside the paper partition behind the bed. He had a pink complexion with a three-forked beard, was about thirty years old, wore a dark black hat on his head, and was dressed in a blouse and trousers of purple brocade.

Embracing Yüeh-niang with both arms, he said, "My name is Yin T'ien-hsi, and I am the younger brother of Prefect Kao Lien's wife. I have long heard that you are the spouse of a prominent official and are endowed with looks that entitle you to be called a national beauty. I have:

Thought about you for a long time,
And thirsted for a glimpse of you,
But have lacked a way to meet you.²⁸

Now that I have encountered your memorable person:

Such good fortune would suffice for three lives;
I will find it hard to forget either dead or alive."

So saying, he forced Yüeh-niang back down on the bed and proposed to take his pleasure with her.

Yüeh-niang was panic-stricken at this and called out in a loud voice:

"The world is at perfect peace;
The universe is shining bright."²⁹

How can you bring yourself to manhandle a decent person's wife this way?"

She attempted to make her escape, but Yin T'ien-hsi would not let her go and knelt down before her, saying, "My lady, pray be quiet, and favor me by complying with my urgent request."

Yüeh-niang responded to this by calling out for help, again and again, in an even more strident voice than before.

When Lai-an and Tai-an heard this, and recognized it to be Yüeh-niang's voice, they ran back to the sanctuary in a state of obvious agitation to look for Wu K'ai, calling out, "Brother-in-law, bestir yourself. Our mistress is in the abbot's quarters engaged in an altercation with someone."

Wu Yüeh-niang Shakes Up the Temple of Iridescent Clouds

Wu K'ai promptly made his way:

Covering two steps with every one,
back to the abbot's quarters and tried to push open the door but was unable to do so.

He heard Yüeh-niang shout out in a loud voice:

"The world is at perfect peace, what do you think you're doing trying to imprison a female pilgrim here?"

At this, Wu K'ai called out, "Sister, don't panic. I'm here."

So saying, he picked up a piece of rock and used it to smash open the door. When Yin T'ien-hsi realized that someone was on his way in, he promptly let go of Yüeh-niang and disappeared in a cloud of dust behind the bed. It so happens that Shih Po-ts'ai had set things up so that there were escape routes behind all the beds on the premises.

When Wu K'ai managed to smash open the door to the abbot's quarters, he asked Yüeh-niang, "Sister, did that rascal succeed in defiling you, or not?"

"He did not manage to defile me," said Yüeh-niang, "but the rascal got away from behind the bed."

Wu K'ai went out to look for Shih Po-ts'ai, but he had hidden himself away, merely sending his disciples out to deal with the situation. Wu K'ai was infuriated by these developments and ordered the servants who had accompanied him, including Tai-an and Lai-an, to smash up the doors, windows, and walls of the abbot's quarters. He then escorted Yüeh-niang outside the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds, where they got into their sedan chairs and set off to descend the mountain.

It was dusk when they started out, and it took half the night before they reached their inn at the foot of the mountain before dawn and told the innkeeper, thus and so, what had happened.

The innkeeper:

Repeatedly expressed his dismay,³⁰ saying, "You ought not to have done anything to disturb that Yin T'ien-hsi. He is the younger brother of the wife of the prefect of T'ai-an and is known as Year Star Yin. After you have gone, he will take out his resentment by making trouble for us innkeepers. He will never be willing to call it quits."

Wu K'ai responded by giving him a tael more than the charge for their lodgings, collected their luggage, and, escorting Yüeh-niang's sedan chair, set off as fast as they could go. Behind them, Yin T'ien-hsi, who was reluctant to let them get away, came down the mountain in hot pursuit, at the head of a bunch of twenty or thirty idlers, armed with broadswords and short sticks.

Meanwhile, Wu K'ai and his entourage:

Covering two stages in the time for one,³¹ arrived during the fourth watch at a hollow in the hills, where they saw a light glimmering in the distance. When they approached closer, they found that it was a cavern in the rock in which an old monk was reading a sutra by candlelight.

Wu K'ai addressed him, saying, "Master, we had gone to the summit to burn incense when we were driven away by some ruffians and forced to flee down the mountain.

In the murky darkness of the night,³²
we have arrived here after having:

Missed the track and lost our way.³³

Permit me to ask you, Master, what is the name of this place, and how can we get home from here?"

"You are on the eastern spur of Mount T'ai," the elderly monk responded, "and this cave is known as the Snow Stream Cave. I am called Ch'an Master Snow Cave, and my religious name is P'u-ching.³⁴ I have been engaged in religious practice here for twenty or thirty years. You have been fated to encounter me here, and you ought not to proceed any further tonight. There are innumerable:

Wild animals, tigers, and leopards,³⁵ on the lower slopes of the mountain. If you continue on your way early tomorrow morning, there is a highway leading straight to your home in Ch'ing-ho district."

"I fear those ruffians may still be pursuing us," said Wu K'ai.

P'u-ching took a look outside and said, "There is nothing to fear. Those ruffians, after coming halfway down the mountain, have already gone back where they came from."

He then asked Yüeh-niang her name, and Wu K'ai said, "This is my younger sister, the wife of Hsi-men Ch'ing. We came here in order to present incense on behalf of her deceased husband and have been fortunate enough to be rescued by you.

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

We will never dare to forget it."

Thereupon, they proceeded to spend the rest of the night in the cavern.

The next day, during the fifth watch, Yüeh-niang got out a bolt of muslin and offered it to the priest, but P'u-ching refused to accept it and said, "Instead of that, why don't you allow me to induct a son of yours into the religious life so he can serve me as a disciple. How would you feel about that?"

"My younger sister," said Wu K'ai, "has only a single son and expects him to succeed to the family inheritance. If she should bear another son, she might be willing to let him leave the family and become a disciple of yours."

"My son is still an infant," said Yüeh-niang, "and is less than a year old. He is scarcely ready for anything like that."

"All you need to do is promise him to me," said P'u-ching. "I have no need for him at present, but ten years from now I may ask you for him."

As for Yüeh-niang:

From her mouth no word was uttered,

Master P'u-ching Recruits an Acolyte in Snow Stream Cave

but she thought to herself, "Ten years from now, I can decide what to do then."

Consequently, she agreed to promise her son to P'u-ching.

Gentle reader take note: She should never have promised to let her son leave the family and enter the religious life as a disciple of the priest. Ten years later, when:

The empire was in a state of disorder,³⁶

Yüeh-niang took Hsiao-ko and fled to Honan province to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou, but she lost her way and encountered P'u-ching in the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where he spirited her son away into a life of Buddhist celibacy:

Taking the tonsure and becoming a priest.³⁷

Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

That day, Yüeh-niang and her entourage said good-bye to P'u-ching and proceeded on their way. After traveling all day, they came to a mountain that obstructed their path. This mountain was called Ch'ing-feng Mountain and presented a formidable appearance. Behold:

From all eight sides it appears towering;
From all four angles it looks precipitous.
Curious-looking pines adorn its summit with their coiled greens;

Branches of ancient trees are tangled amid their hanging vines.
 Waterfalls fly through the air, Assailing the senses with their chill³⁸ and causing hairs to stand on end;
 Cliffs descend straight down, Reflecting bright light into the eyes and awakening the dreaming soul.
 The gurgling of the streams is audible;
 The sound of the woodman's axe is heard.
 Peaks and summits rise up in profusion;
 The cries of the mountain birds are sad.
 Deer congregate in their swarming herds,³⁹
 Foxes connive together in their cliques; Traversing the brambles as they leap their way back and forth, Seeking their prey with howls as they run forward and backward.
 Standing on the grassy slopes,
 As far as the eye can see there are no travelers' inns;
 Traversing the mountain paths,
 On every side there are merely the graves of the dead.
 If this is not a place where Buddhist monks practice religion,
 It must be a lair from which outlaws commit their atrocities.⁴⁰

It so happens that this Ch'ing-feng Mountain had a stronghold called the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold located on it that housed three outlaw chieftains, one of whom was called the Brocade Tiger, Yen Shun; one of whom was called the Short-legged Tiger, Wang Ying; and one of whom was called the Palefaced Gentleman, Cheng T'ien-shou.⁴¹ They had a troop of five hundred followers serving under them who devoted themselves solely to:

Housebreaking and highway robbery,⁴²
 Setting fires and killing people, so that no one dared to interfere with them.

On this occasion, as Wu K'ai and his entourage, riding their donkeys and escorting Yüeh-niang's sedan chair, proceeded to make their way into the mountain, the sun had already set, and:

In the darkness of the night, there were no villages or roadside inns to be seen. Just as they were becoming apprehensive about the dangers of their situation, a horse-tripping rope was thrown out that snagged Wu K'ai's mount and tumbled him into a pit.

It so happens that the brigands at the foot of the mountain had seen Yüeh-niang's sedan chair and Wu K'ai's entourage coming up the mountain slope and reported it to the three outlaw chieftains, who dispatched a bunch of brigands to seize their luggage and escort them all up to their stronghold. At the time, the three outlaw chieftains were having a drink with Sung Chiang, the hero from Shantung whose cognomen was Opportune Rain, and who had taken refuge there after slaying the singing girl Yen P'o-hsi.⁴³ The three outlaw chieftains had invited him to stay at their stronghold for a few days.

When Sung Chiang saw that Yüeh-niang wore a mourning cap over her chignon, was clad in plain white mourning garments, and that:

Her deportment was upright and correct,
 And her countenance exquisitely shaped,⁴⁴

he concluded that:

She was surely not the spouse of an ordinary person,
 But must be the dependent of a well-to-do household.

He therefore proceeded to ask for her name.

At this, Yüeh-niang stepped forward, bowed to him, saying, "Many felicitations," and then addressed him with the words, "Your Highness, my maiden name is Wu, and I am the wife of the deceased Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing, for whom I am maintaining a chaste widowhood. When my husband became seriously ill, I swore an oath to come offer incense on his behalf at Mount T'ai; but when I was on the summit just a while ago I was assaulted by Yin T'ien-hsi, and we have been fleeing from him, all day and all night, in the attempt to make it safely home. How could we have anticipated that in the dark of night we would make the error of traversing the foot of this mountain of yours? We dare not expect to retrieve the saddlebags containing our luggage, but would plead with you to spare our lives. If we should succeed in returning safely home we will feel fortunate indeed.”

When Sung Chiang observed the sad and moving tone of Yüeh-niang’s words, he felt a degree of compassion for her and, bowing to Yen Shun, said, “This lady is the wife of an official who once presided over some colleagues of mine, and:

With whom I was slightly acquainted.⁴⁵

She came here in order to offer incense on behalf of her husband and, because she was pursued by Yin T’ien-hsi, made the mistake of trespassing on the precincts of this mountain of yours. She is a woman of courageous virtue. If you will only consent to let her go for my sake, it will allow her to preserve her integrity.”

To this plea Wang Ying responded, saying, “Brother, since I am so unfortunate as not to have a wife of my own, you should let me take her to serve as the matron of the stronghold.”⁴⁶

So saying, he directed his subordinates to seize Yüeh-niang and escorted her back to the interior of the stronghold.

At this, Sung Chiang turned to Yen Shun and Cheng T’ien-shou, saying, “Despite what I said, Brother Wang Ying is refusing to let me perform a good deed.”

“This brother of ours,” said Yen Shun, “is fine enough in most respects, but he is guilty of this one fault. Whenever he sees a woman possessed of feminine beauty, he lusts after her with fire in his eyes.”

Sung Chiang refused to drink any more wine and accompanied the other two to the interior of the stronghold, where they found Wang Ying in the act of embracing Yüeh-niang and attempting to take his pleasure with her.

Sung Chiang strode right up to Wang Ying and, seizing him with one hand, dragged him back to the front of the stronghold, saying, “Worthy Brother, if you wish to play the role of a hero, to exhaust the very marrow of your bones⁴⁷ in sexual indulgence is not the way to enhance your stature. If you wish to seek a wife, let me act as a go-between on your behalf, and I’ll secure a virtuous virgin for you, observing all the standard ritual practices, who will come and be your wife. What reason is there for you to lust after remarried goods?”

“Brother,” responded Wang Ying, “why not let me have my way, for better or for worse, in this matter?”

“That won’t do,” said Sung Chiang. “I, Sung Chiang, will certainly undertake to provide my worthy brother with a suitable bride in the future. The fact is that if you insist on taking this woman today, you will become a laughingstock to the denizens of the rivers and lakes. As for that rascal Yin T’ien-hsi, should I fail to be accepted by the bandit lair in Liang-shan Marsh, that will be that; but should I be accepted at Liang-shan, I will see to it that his treatment of this woman is avenged.”

Gentle reader take note: In later days, when Sung Chiang had arrived at Liang-shan and been chosen as the chieftain of the outlaw band there, because Yin T’ien-hsi tried to appropriate the garden of Ch’ai Huang-ch’eng, the Black Whirlwind Li K’uei was dispatched to deal with the situation and not only killed Yin T’ien-hsi but went on to wreak havoc at Kao-t’ang prefecture.⁴⁸ Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

On that day, when Yen Shun heard what Sung Chiang had to say, he did not even ask for Wang Ying’s consent but ordered the chair bearers to approach and carry Yüeh-niang down the mountain.

When Yüeh-niang saw that she was being set free, she stepped up to Sung Chiang and bowed in appreciation, saying, “Your Highness has done me:

The favor of saving my life.”

“Ai-ya!” exclaimed Sung Chiang. “I am not the ruler of this mountain stronghold but am merely a sojourner from Yün-ch’eng district. It is these three chieftains to whom you should pay your respects.”

When Yüeh-niang had finished paying her respects, with Wu K’ai escorting her, she left the mountain stronghold, got into her sedan chair, and proceeded past Ch’ing-feng Mountain along the highway to Ch’ing-ho district. Truly:

Breaking to pieces the jade cage,
the phoenix flies away;
Smashing apart the metal padlock,
the dragon breaks free.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In this world the heart of man alone
remains vile;
In all things demanding that Heaven
show him favor.⁴⁹
If the square inch of one’s heart is devoid of evil;
Even amid wolves and tigers⁵⁰ one can achieve success.⁵¹

WU YÜEH-NIANG SURPRISES CHIN-LIEN IN THE ACT OF ADULTERY; AUNTIE HSÜEH AGREES TO SELL CH'UN-MEI ON A MOONLIT NIGHT

The trouble of bringing up daughters is bound to be disillusioning;¹
To admit their husbands into the family is even more inappropriate.
They may address their in-laws as parents,
but without genuine feeling;
They may choose to play the part of sons,
but their acting is specious.
On entering your home they will complain of receiving inadequate love;
On leaving your household they are more likely than not to hate you.
If they feel that they are not receiving the treatment they deserve;
They can be counted upon to abuse their spouses at least once a day.

THE STORY goes that Wu K'ai escorted Yüeh-niang on her way back until the day that she arrived home. But no more of this.

To return to our story, ever since Yüeh-niang had left home, P'an Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi:

In both the front and rear compounds, carried on with each other at home as though engaged in:

The mating dance of a cock and a hen.

Not a single day elapsed without their getting together.

One day, Chin-lien noticed that:

Her eyebrows were drooping, and

Her waistline was expanding;

all day long she suffered from:

Lassitude and drowsiness, and

Had no desire to eat anything.

Calling Ch'en Ching-chi into her room, she said to him, "I've got something I need to tell you. For the last several days:

My eyelids are reluctant to open,

My midriff is gradually expanding,

My belly feels quivering motions,

I don't feel like eating anything, and

My body feels extremely lethargic.

While your father-in-law was still alive I asked Nun Hsüeh for a fertility potion containing the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that would enable me to conceive, but nothing ever came of it. Now that he is dead, even though I haven't been involved with you for very long, I am already pregnant. It was in the third month that I last menstruated, and it has been only six months since then, but I already have half a bulge in my belly. In the past I have been quick to criticize the faults of others, but now it looks as though I am likely to become a target of criticism. You'd better not remain:

Still asleep in dreamland, but take advantage of the fact that the First Lady is away from home to go procure an abortifacient of some kind for me so that I can dispose of this fetus and be able to appear in public without embarrassment. Otherwise, if I have no alternative but to give birth to some benighted creature, I might as well commit suicide, for I won't be able to:

Raise my head and look people in the eye."

On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi said, "We have all kinds of pharmaceutical ingredients in our shop, but I don't know which of them might serve as abortifacients, and I lack any recipe for their concoction. But you can relax. It's not a problem. That Dr. Hu who lives on Main Street is proficient at prescriptions, both great and small, palpation of the pulse, and the treatment of female disorders and has been called upon by our household in the past. I'll go and obtain a couple of prescriptions from him which you can take in order to abort the fetus."

"My good brother," the woman responded, "you'd better get a move on if you want to save my life."

Ch'en Ching-chi, thereupon, wrapped up three mace of silver and went straight to the gate of Dr. Hu's house and called to be let in. Dr. Hu was at home and came outside, where he greeted him with a bow.

Recognizing Ch'en Ching-chi as the son-in-law of the prominent official Hsi-men Ch'ing, he offered him a seat, saying, "I haven't seen you for some time. May I ask what brings you to my humble abode, and:

What it is you would have me do for you?"²

"There is nothing else I would trouble you with," said Ch'en Ching-chi as he withdrew the packet of silver from his sleeve and offered it to him. "This is to defray the cost of the drugs. If I might prevail upon you to prepare a prescription or two for me:

It would serve to affirm your goodwill."

"In my family's practice of medicine," responded Dr. Hu, "with regard to the preparation of complex prescriptions, palpation of the pulse, gynecology, pediatrics, internal or external medicine, the Chia-chien shih-san fang (Thirteen alterative prescriptions), the Shou-yü shen-fang, (Divine prescriptions for the realm of longevity), the Hai-shang fang (Overseas panaceas [from the Isles of the Blest]),³ and the various prescriptions for miscellaneous disorders, there is little that I have not mastered. I am also a specialist in the treatment of women both:

Before conception and postpartum.

Now blood is the fundamental element in female physiology. It is stored in the liver and flows out of the viscera, moving upward to form breast milk and moving downward to form menstrual emissions. It combines with semen to create the fetus. When a woman reaches her fourteenth year menstruation begins,⁴ her conception vessel begins to flow, and her menses start to occur at their monthly intervals, which are normally thirty days apart. If her blood and vital energy are out of harmony, there will be an imbalance between her yin and yang. If there is an excess of yang, her menses will occur earlier than usual. If there is an excess of yin, her menses will occur later than usual. It is the nature of blood that if it is hot it will flow, while if it is cold it will stagnate. Either an excess or a deficiency may induce disorder. Cold tends to produce white, and heat tends to produce red. When cold and heat are out of harmony, it is likely to result in red and white vaginal discharge. Generally speaking, when the blood and vital energy are appropriately balanced, the yin and the yang will be in harmonious accord; the semen and blood will converge with each other; and the fetus will be conceived in the uterus. The two pulses emanating from the heart and the kidneys can be palpated to monitor this development. Should the semen predominate, the fetus will be male. Should the blood predominate, the fetus will be female.

This is a self-evident principle.

In the early stages of pregnancy the most important thing is to tranquilize the fetus. Unless suffering from some other ailment, the pregnant mother should avoid taking any drugs or medications. After the ten months of pregnancy, when the time for parturition approaches, special care should be taken lest postpartum problems should develop. Beware! Beware!"

Ch'en Ching-chi laughed at this disquisition, saying, "I am not looking for a prescription to tranquilize the fetus, but for an abortifacient."

"Between Heaven and Earth,

Love of life is paramount," opined Dr. Hu. "Nine out of ten people only seek prescriptions that facilitate conception. How can you be looking for an abortifacient instead? I don't have any. I don't have any."

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that he was objecting to his request, he added another two mace of silver to the sum he was offering and said, "There is no reason for you to concern yourself about it. Individuals have their individual needs. The woman in question does not expect to have a safe delivery and consequently wishes to abort her fetus."

Dr. Hu accepted the silver, saying, "It doesn't matter. I'll give you the prescription for a potion known as the Safflower Clean-Sweeper. If she takes it, in the time it would take her to walk five li the fetus will be discharged."

There is a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that testifies to this:

Take Radix Achyranthis, Eriocher Sinensis, and Radix Euphorbiae,
As well as Magnetite, Radix Knoxiae, and Daphnes Genkwa Flos, Together with Cantharides, Hematite, and Sal Ammoniacum,
And dissolve them in a mixture of mercury and saltpeter.

Also add Semen Persicae, and Tetrapanax Papyriferus, Secretio Moschi, Adenophora Tetraphylla, and Campsis Grandiflora,
And decoct them all in strong vinegar to make the Safflower Potion.
You can be certain that the fetus of the child will be discharged.

Ch'en Ching-chi, accordingly, purchased two doses of the Safflower Clean-Sweeper, bade farewell to Dr. Hu, and turned them over to the woman on returning home, explaining to her, word for word, what the doctor had said. That evening, she decocted the Safflower Potion and proceeded to swallow it. Almost immediately her entire abdomen became filled with pain and, lying down on the k'ang, she had Ch'un-mei press and massage her belly. Who could have anticipated that:

Strange as it may seem,
in no time at all, when she sat down on the commode, the fetus was excreted. Claiming it to be only a menstrual discharge, she had Ch'iu-chü wrap it up in grass paper and discard it in the privy. The next day, when the workman came to empty the contents of the privy, he observed that it contained the plump white remains of a little male fetus.

As the saying goes:

Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate;

Bad deeds are quickly transmitted a thousand li.

Before many days had passed, the members of the entire household, both high and low, were all aware that Chin-lien had been carrying on an incestuous affair with her son-in-law and had aborted her illegitimate fetus.

One day, Wu Yüeh-niang arrived home after having been away for half a month on her journey to and from T'ai-an prefecture. It was already the tenth month when she came home, and the members of the entire household, high and low, came out to greet her, feeling:

Just as though she had fallen from Heaven.

Upon arriving home, Yüeh-niang first burned incense to the gods of Heaven and Earth and the Buddha and then paid obeisance before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, after which, she told Meng Yü-lou and her other sister wives, as well as the members of the household, high and low, all about what had happened to her at the temple on the summit of Mount T'ai and in the mountain stronghold. When she had finished, she couldn't help weeping profusely. When the members of the household, high and low, had finished paying their respects to her, Yüeh-niang saw that the wet nurse Ju-i had brought Hsiao-ko with her so that mother and son were reunited. After she had finished burning paper money and serving wine to entertain Wu K'ai before he left, that evening her sister wives provided a feast in Yüeh-niang's honor to welcome her home. But no more of this.

The next day, Yüeh-niang, having braved:

The wind and the frost on her journey, and been exposed to hardship and frightening events, found herself to be suffering from feelings of pain and lethargy throughout her body and continued to be indisposed for two or three days.

Meanwhile, Ch'iu-chü, having been exposed to:

An earful and a bellyful, of gossip about what Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi had been up to, decided to go to the master suite and tell Yüeh-niang how the two of them had conspired to abort an illegitimate fetus and dispose of it in the privy, and how it had been discovered by the workman who came to empty the privy and consequently become public knowledge.

Because of the way her mistress had beaten and abused her, she could not contain her resentment, but when she went to the door of the master suite, Hsiao-yü, once again, spat in her face, boxed her ears, and cursed her, saying, "You lousy tale-telling slave! Get out of here. My mistress has just returned from a long journey and is feeling so unwell that she has not even gotten up yet. Get out of here at once. The last thing she needs is to hear something to upset her."

This abusive reception caused Ch'iu-chü to:

Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel,

Nodding in assent and choosing to withdraw.⁵

One day it was one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

Ch'en Ching-chi came into Chin-lien's quarters to pick up some clothes that had been stored there by the pawnshop, and he and the woman proceeded to fall to it together in the Flower-viewing Tower on the second floor.

Ch'iu-chü took the opportunity to go back to the rear compound and summon Yüeh-niang to come see for herself what was going on, saying, "I have told you what they are up to at least two or three times, but you have not believed me. While you have been away the two of them have been getting together here at home:

Sleeping from morning to night,

And then from night to morning,

and now they have actually smuggled out an illegitimate fetus. She and Ch'un-mei have forged an alliance with each other, and today he and she are up to their evil shenanigans once again on the second floor. I have not been telling lies to you. You should come see for yourself as quickly as possible."

Yüeh-niang promptly set out for the front compound. The two of them were just in the thick of things and had not yet come downstairs.

Who could have anticipated that the parrot in a cage hanging under the eaves in Chin-lien's room was capable of speech and called out in a loud voice, "The First Lady is here."

Ch'un-mei, who was in the room at the time, heard this and came outside where she saw that it was Yüeh-niang. Before she could call the woman down from the upper floor, Ch'en Ching-chi, with the clothes he had come to fetch in hand, came downstairs and headed for the door.

Yüeh-niang took him strongly to task, saying, "My child, have you lost your memory? What have you come barging in here for:

As if you didn't know any better?"

"A customer is waiting in the shop," explained Ch'en Ching-chi, "and there was no one else available to come get his clothes for him."

"I left clear instructions," said Yüeh-niang, "that in that case you should send a page boy in to fetch things. What excuse could you have to invade a widow's quarters for no good reason:

As if you didn't know any better?

Such conduct is utterly shameless."

These accusations caused Ch'en Ching-chi to flee outside, as though:

Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,

There was no place for him to hide.

Meanwhile, the woman was so embarrassed that she did not venture to come downstairs for what seemed like half a day.

When she finally did come down, Yüeh-niang gave her a real dressing down, saying, "Sister Six, from now on you had better not continue to carry on so shamelessly. You and I are now widows, and our status is not what it was when we had a husband. Though:

Everything may remain sweet smelling at home,

Our reputation will become malodorous abroad.

Even basins and jugs have ears.

What sort of shenanigans have you been up to with this youngster:

As if you didn't know any better?

You have given our servants reason to make unspeakably obscene allegations about you behind your back. As the sayings go:

Wu Yüeh-niang Catches Chin-lien in the Act of Adultery

If a man is untrustworthy,
 He's as weak as untempered steel;
 If a woman is unfaithful,
 She's as pliable as sesame candy.
 If one is upright,
 One will achieve one's aims without giving orders;
 If one is not upright,
 Though one may give orders they will not be obeyed.⁶

If you were resolute and straightforward in your conduct, you would not give the servants any reason to criticize you behind your back. They have complained to me about you several times in the past, and I did not believe them. But today, I have seen what you are up to with my own eyes, and it is unspeakable. As I have admonished you today, you must form a resolution to protect our husband's good name in the future. Take my own case; while I was away on my incense-burning pilgrimage I was threatened with violence and coercion by those ruffians two or three times. If I had not been rigorous in protecting my honor, I might never have been able to make my way home."

When Chin-lien was subjected to this tirade of criticism from Yüeh-niang, she was so embarrassed that her face became a patchwork of red and white blotches, and she denied the charges a thousand times over, saying, "I was on the second floor burning incense, while our son-in-law Ch'en was in the storeroom nearby collecting his clothes. Whoever said so much as a word to him?"

At this juncture, Yüeh-niang, after disputing with her for some time, returned to the rear compound.

That evening in their quarters, Hsi-men Ta-chieh also took Ch'en Ching-chi to task, saying, "You lousy jailbird! You can hardly deny that you were caught red-handed with:

Irrefutable proof of your guilt, yet you continue to babble on about it. What sort of shenanigans were the two of you up to on the second floor? It goes without saying that the two of you have been up to mischief together while keeping me in the dark just as though you had:

Put a water crock over my head.

That whore has stolen my husband while still trying to keep me entrained with her specious words.

Like the bricks in the privy:

She is both hard and smelly, and seems to think she can still continue to ride herd on me. She's just like:

The ramshorn scallion that grows by the southern wall:

The longer it stays there the hotter it gets.

And you seem to think that you can still go on scrounging for food in this household."

"You whore!" retorted Ch'en Ching-chi. "While your family has hold of my money, you have the nerve to accuse me of scrounging for food off them."

So saying, he headed off for the front compound in a fit of pique.

From this time on, Ch'en Ching-chi kept to the front compound, no longer daring to enter the rear compound without some legitimate excuse. When it was necessary to get anything from the storeroom, either Tai-an or P'ing-an would come inside and go up to the second floor to fetch it. Food for the midday meal was no longer brought out to the shop from the rear compound, leaving Manager Fu Ming in his hunger no recourse but to take money and go out on the street and purchase ready-made noodles to eat. Truly:

When the dragon battles the tiger,

The one hurt is the innocent fawn.

All the doors and gates were closed while the sun was still high in the sky. As a result, the amorous relations between Ch'en Ching-chi and Chin-lien were interrupted once again. Ch'en Ching-chi's original family home had been looked after and occupied for some time by his maternal uncle, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, who had forfeited his office and was residing there in retirement. Ch'en Ching-chi resorted to going there for his meals, both early and late, and Yüeh-niang did not even bother to inquire about it.

The two of them were separated for as much as a month without even seeing each other. For the woman, all by herself:

Each day was like three months of autumn;

Each night seemed like half a summer.

How could she endure:

The seclusion of her deserted chamber,

Or the scorching flames of her desire?

To even catch a glimpse of him was:

As difficult as difficult could be,

and between the two of them:

All communication had been cut off.

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:

There was no way he could gain access to her.⁷

Suddenly one day, he caught sight of Auntie Hsüeh as she passed by outside the gate, and it occurred to him that he might be able to prevail upon her to deliver a note to Chin-lien on his behalf that would:

Express his concern about their separation,

And serve to reveal his innermost feelings.

One day, on the pretext of going to settle accounts with a creditor outside the city gate, he rode his mount straight to the home of Auntie Hsüeh, tied up his mule, raised the hanging screen, and asked, "Is Auntie Hsüeh at home?"

Her son Hsüeh Chi's wife, Chin Ta-chieh, was sitting on the k'ang with her baby son in her arms, in the company of two girls that people had entrusted to Auntie Hsüeh to offer for sale as maidservants. When she heard someone calling for Auntie Hsüeh, she came out and asked who it was.

"It's only me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, and asked, "Is Auntie Hsüeh at home, or not?"

"Uncle, please come inside and have a seat," responded Chin Ta-chieh. "My mother-in-law has gone to someone's place to collect payment on a few items of costume jewelry that she is offering for sale. What have you got to say to her? I'll send someone to call for her."

So saying, she hastened to pour out a serving of tea for Ch'en Ching-chi.

After he had sat there for a little while, who should appear but Auntie Hsüeh, who came in and greeted Ch'en Ching-chi with a bow, saying, "Uncle, what wind has blown you to my home here?"

Turning to Chin Ta-chieh, she said, "Pour out some tea for Uncle to drink."

"He has just finished a serving of tea," said Chin Ta-chieh.

"I would not have bothered to come for no reason," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but I have been entangled, thus and so, with the Fifth Lady for some time, and now, thanks to the wagging tongue of that maidservant Ch'iu-chü, our liaison has been disrupted, and both the First Lady and my wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, have decided to turn a cold shoulder to me. My relationship with Sister Six is such that:

We can never agree to be separated,
but the two of us have been kept apart for some time now, and:

All communication has been cut off.

I would like to send a few words to her, but there is no one able to get inside for this purpose. That is why I have felt compelled to appeal to you in the hope that you might find some way, thus and so, to transmit a message on my behalf."

Reaching inside his sleeve, he brought out a tael of silver, and said, "This paltry gift is merely offered in the hope that you can use it to purchase some tea for yourself."

No sooner did Auntie Hsüeh hear him out than she fell to:

Clapping her hands and beating her palms, as she laughed out loud, saying, "Whoever heard of a son-in-law making out with his mother-in-law? Such conduct is unheard of in this world. Uncle, tell me the truth. Really, how did you ever accomplish such a thing?"

"Auntie Hsüeh," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "pray keep your voice down, and stop scoffing at me. I have brought a sealed note here with me, and I hope that, for better or for worse, you will be good enough to deliver it to her for me tomorrow."

Auntie Hsüeh took the note with one hand, saying, "Ever since your First Lady returned from her pilgrimage I haven't gone to pay a call on her, so if I go do so now I can kill two birds with one stone."

"Where can I expect to hear back from you," asked Ch'en Ching-chi.

"I'll go look for you in the shop and report to you there," replied Auntie Hsüeh.

When they had finished their conversation, Ch'en Ching-chi mounted his mule and returned home.

To resume our story, the next day, Auntie Hsüeh took her box of trinkets and made her way first to the master suite in Hsi-men Ch'ing's house to pay a call on Yüeh-niang. After sitting with her for a while, she also went to visit Meng Yü-lou, and only then went to Chin-lien's quarters.

Chin-lien, at the time, had set up a table and was eating her congee.

When Ch'un-mei saw that the woman was:

Feeling depressed and unhappy, she said, "Mother, you ought not to be so upset. Even the immortal maiden Ho Hsien-ku⁸ was falsely accused of having daily trysts with a lover.

When gossip over pros and cons is overheard,⁹

If you pay no heed to it, it will disappear.

But even the immortals of ancient times were sometimes guilty of:

The moral deficiencies of petty persons,¹⁰ not to mention the likes of you and me. Moreover, at present, Father is dead, and the First Lady has given birth to a posthumous son, who may also be said to be:

Of questionable origin.

Consequently, she is in no position to exert control over our private affairs. You might as well relax.

Even if the sky should be about to fall,

There are the four giants to hold it up.

For humans living in this world:

Every day that you enjoy is another day."

Thereupon, she poured out some wine and handed a goblet of it to the woman, saying, "Mother, drink a cup of this warmed wine in order to dissipate your depression."

Then, happening to notice that there were two dogs engaged in copulation beneath the steps, she said, "Since even animals enjoy this kind of pleasure, how can humans be expected to do otherwise?"

As they were drinking their wine, who should appear but Auntie Hsüeh, who came in, bowed in greeting, and said, "The two of you, mother and daughter, are certainly having an easy time of it."

Then, catching sight of the two copulating dogs, she laughed, saying, "What an auspicious omen for your house. As the two of you enjoy the sight, how could it help but relieve your depression?"

So saying, she proceeded to bow to them once again.

"What wind has blown you here today?" the woman asked. "And why has it been so long since you paid us a visit?"

So saying, she offered Auntie Hsüeh a seat.

"I don't know what has kept me so busy all day long," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but I just haven't had any spare time. When the First Lady returned from her pilgrimage to the summit of Mount T'ai I failed to visit her, and she expressed her disappointment to me just now. I also visited the Third Lady on the west side of the rear compound and she decided to purchase two pairs of turquoise ornaments and a pair of decorative pins to hold her chignon in place. She is inclined to handle things promptly and weighed out eight mace of silver for me on the spot. Unlike that Sun Hsüeh-o from the rear compound, who bought two pairs of velvet artificial flowers from me in the eighth month, which were worth two mace of silver, but claims that she is short of cash and refuses to pay me. She is really a stingy sort. But may I venture to ask, why were you not anywhere to be seen?"

"I have not been feeling too well the last few days," the woman replied, "and have not been up and about."

Ch'un-mei proceeded to pour out a goblet of wine and offer it to Auntie Hsüeh, who promptly bowed in response, saying:

"If one drinks a cup of wine on entering the door."

At which, the woman interrupted her, saying:

"You'll bear a bonny baby someday."

"I'm no longer able to do so," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "but my daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, gave birth to a son only two months ago."

She then went on to say, "Since the death of your husband, you must have been feeling lonely for some time now."

"Needless to say," the woman responded, "if he were only here everything would be fine. But at present, the two of us are being:

Alternately broken up and ground down.¹¹

I won't deceive you, Auntie Hsüeh, but right now in this household:

When people are many, tongues are many.

Ever since the First Lady produced that son of hers, her attitude has changed, and our sisterly feelings are no longer as warm as they used to be. For the last few days, both because I have been feeling depressed and because I have been the target of malicious gossip, I have not gone back to the rear compound."

"It's all due to that slave of ours, Ch'iu-chü," explained Ch'un-mei. "While the First Lady was away from home, she made up an invidious story about my mistress out of thin air and dragged me into it as well, creating quite a disruption."

"So it was all the doing of that maidservant of hers," said Auntie Hsüeh. "How could she bring herself to betray her mistress that way? It goes without saying that:

If you don the black livery of a servant,

You must cling to even the blackest post.

That kind of conduct will never do."

At this, the woman turned to Ch'un-mei and said, "Go see what that slave is up to. I fear she may be eavesdropping on us."

"She's back in the kitchen picking up some rice," said Ch'un-mei. "That ruptured vessel of a slave serves in these quarters as:

Nothing but a leaky trough.

She habitually takes our private affairs and peddles them abroad."

"Since no one else is present," said Auntie Hsüeh, "we can hold a frank conversation. Yesterday, your son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi came to my place and told me, thus and so, what has been going on. So it turns out that she was the one responsible for exposing your affair. Ch'en Ching-chi told me that the First Lady has taken him severely to task, seen to it that all the doors are tightly secured, and prohibited him from coming inside to fetch clothes or pharmaceutical supplies. And that she has even gone so far as to move his wife Hsi-men Ta-chieh into the rear compound to reside in Li Chiao-erh's former quarters on the east side of the courtyard, and stopped sending food out to the shop for his lunch, so that he has been compelled to go to the home of his maternal uncle Chang Kuan for his meals. What sense does it make for her to refuse to trust her own son-in-law, but to put her trust in those page boys instead? He said that it has been some time since he has seen you and pleaded with me to deliver a note to you. He sends you his ardent regards and suggests that you should not allow yourself to be upset. After all, since your husband is dead, you might as well determine to go flat out and do what you want, no matter how much of a commotion it may cause. What is there to be afraid of?

Rather than fearing that a stick of incense may produce smoke,

You might as well simply set it on fire and let it go at that."

Thereupon, she took out the sealed note that Ch'en Ching-chi had entrusted to her and handed it to the woman. When she opened it and took a look she found that it contained nothing but a song to the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers" that read as follows:

The fire in the Zoroastrian Temple¹²
burns my skin and flesh;

The Blue Bridge is flooded with water¹³ right up to my throat.

Though we try to repress it, the word has been spread abroad.

Even if we should call it off, the damage is already done.

If we should consummate the affair
it would be romantic;

But if we should not, they will still contend that we did.¹⁴

After the words to the song, it read: "Addressed to the dressing table of Sister Six," followed by the inscription,

“Presented with a hundred salutations by Ch'en Ching-chi.”

When the woman had finished reading it, she tucked the note into her sleeve.

Auntie Hsüeh said, “He wants you to send a token of some kind back to him, along with a few words, so that he will know that I actually delivered his message.”

The woman told Ch'un-mei to share a drink of wine with Auntie Hsüeh while she retired into her room. After some time, she came out with a white satin handkerchief along with a gold ring. She had inscribed a song to the tune “Red Embroidered Slippers” on the handkerchief that read as follows:

On your account, I have had to anticipate surprise and suffer fear;
On my account, you have gone so far as to neglect your spouse.
On your account, I have stopped putting on my rouge and powder;
On your account, I have had to disguise
my intentions before others;
On your account, I have had to resort to deception with my servants.

As a consequence, the pair of us have both become utterly distraught.¹⁵

When the woman had sealed these things up securely and handed them to Auntie Hsüeh, she said, “Convey my regards to him, and tell him that he ought not to let his temper get the better of him and persist in going to eat his meals at the home of his maternal uncle Chang Kuan. By so doing, he runs the risk of annoying his uncle to the point that he may complain, saying, ‘You conduct your business at the home of your father-in-law but come to my place to eat your meals, thereby giving people the impression that both households are hard up.’ If he doesn’t have anything to eat, tell him to take some money from the shop and use it to buy snacks for himself and Manager Fu Ming. If you continue to let your temper get the better of you and refuse to come inside, who have you got to blame but yourself? It seems he is just an example of the adage that:

The thief suffers from a sense of guilt.”

Auntie Hsüeh said, “I’ll convey your message to him.”

After the woman had also given her five mace of silver, Auntie Hsüeh said farewell, went out the door, and headed for the shop at the front of the compound to look for Ch'en Ching-chi.

The two of them went to a secluded spot where they could talk in private, and Auntie Hsüeh handed the sealed package to him and told him that the Fifth Lady had enjoined him not to let his temper get the better of him or express his resentment, but find a way to come inside when he wanted to; and to refrain from going to eat his meals at his uncle Chang Kuan’s place, lest he give him cause for annoyance.

She then showed him the five mace of silver, saying, “This is the reward given me by the lady inside.

The holes in the water clock let it all spill out.¹⁶

There is no reason to doubt that the two of you will get together again in the future, and if she were to mention it to you without my having revealed it, I would be embarrassed.”

“Auntie Hsüeh,” said Ch'en Ching-chi, bowing deeply to her, “I am greatly indebted to you.”

Auntie Hsüeh took a few steps on her way but then came back and said, “I almost forgot something. Just now, as I was leaving, the First Lady sent the maidservant Hsiu-ch'un to intercept me and invite me back to the rear compound. She asked me to return this evening and take Ch'un-mei away with me because she intends to sell her. She said that she had acted as a go-between for the two of you and colluded with her mistress in facilitating your adulterous affair. That is the reason she wants to get rid of her.”

“Auntie Hsüeh,” said Ch'en Ching-chi, “go ahead and take her to your place. I’ll come pay you a visit someday soon, because there is something I want to ask her.”

When their conversation was concluded, Auntie Hsüeh returned home.

Sure enough, that same evening, as the moon was rising, she came back to take Ch'un-mei away but went first into Yüeh-niang’s quarters.

“Originally,” said Yüeh-niang, “I purchased her from you for sixteen taels of silver, and now you can have her back for the same sum of sixteen taels of silver.”

She then turned to Hsiao-yü, and said, “You go out front with her to take care of things, and see that she leaves empty-handed. Don’t let her take any clothing with her other than what she has on.”

Auntie Hsüeh then proceeded out front and told the woman, thus and so, “The First Lady has sent me to take Sister Ch'un-mei away. She told me that you and she had been:

Colluding in chicanery,

in order to facilitate your clandestine adultery, and that she:

Didn’t care about the rights and wrongs, of the situation, but only wanted to recover the original price she had paid for Ch'un-mei.”

When the woman heard that she was going to take Ch'un-mei away in order to be sold, she opened her eyes wide and was unable to say a word for what seemed like half a day.

Before she knew it, her eyes brimmed over with tears, and she said, “Auntie Hsüeh, you can see how hard it has been on the two of us to be without a man in our lives. And now, when our husband has been dead for such a short space of time, she wants to get rid of his former bedmates. How can the First Lady be so bereft of human-heartedness, benevolence, and righteousness? Only because she has given birth to this piddling bladder's spawn of hers, she feels she can ignore the rest of us, and:

Trample us into the mud.

That child of Li P'ing-erh's lived for less than a year and a half and had not even come down with smallpox, measles, chicken pox, or rubella yet. Who knows what Heaven may have in store for her, yet her self-confidence is great enough to block out the sun."

"Has her son developed smallpox, or not?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.

"No he hasn't," the woman responded. "After all, he's not even a year old yet."

"Ch'un-mei tells me," said Auntie Hsüeh, "that when Father was alive he took his pleasure with her."

"Took his pleasure with her indeed!" responded the woman. "That dead devil treated her as though she were as important to him as his vital organs.

She had but to say one thing,

And he would comply with ten.

Whatever she asked for, she received tenfold.

As a result, his legitimate wife who was in charge of the household had to take a back seat. If she wanted him to give a page boy ten strokes with the cane, Father would not venture to give him even as many as five."

"It's outrageous!" exclaimed Auntie Hsüeh. "The First Lady is making a mistake to act this way. To send off an attractive young woman who has been favored by her husband without allowing her to take a trunkful of her belongings with her, or even an outfit of clothing, but requiring her to leave empty-handed, will not seem right in the eyes of the neighbors."

"Did she actually tell you not to let her take even an outfit of clothing with her?" the woman asked.

"The First Lady," replied Auntie Hsüeh, "told Hsiao-yü to come with me and see to it that she does not take any clothes with her, other than those she has on."

When Ch'un-mei, who was standing to one side, heard that she was being sold, she did not shed a single tear; but when she saw that her mistress was weeping, she said, "Mother, what are you crying about? Once I am gone, try to get on as patiently as you can. Don't injure yourself by worrying too much. If you worry yourself to the point of falling ill, there will be no one to sympathize with you. Let me go if I must. If I am not permitted to take any extra clothes with me, so be it. It has always been true that:

A decent man does not consume

his inheritance;

A decent woman does not wear

her bridal clothes."¹⁷

As they were speaking, who should appear but Hsiao-yü, who came in and said, "Fifth Lady, you need not comply with the topsy-turvy instructions of my mistress. After all, the young lady has served you faithfully for all this time. I am prepared to:

Ch'un-mei Refrains from Shedding a Single Parting Tear

Deceive my superiors but not my inferiors.

You ought to select two of the best outfits from her trunk, wrap them up, and entrust them to Auntie Hsüeh to take along for her, both as a memento of her years with you, and to assist her as she embarks on her new life."

"My good sister," exclaimed the woman, "you are actually exhibiting a trace of benevolence and righteousness."

"After all," responded Hsiao-yü:

"Who can be sure that nothing will ever happen to them?

Both the toad and the cricket,

Inhabit the same spadeful of earth.

When the hare dies, the fox is sad;

Creatures grieve for their fellows."

They then brought out Ch'un-mei's trunk and told her to pick out the kerchiefs and turquoise hairpins that she was accustomed to wear and take them with her. The woman selected two outfits of top-grade silk and satin garments, together with shoes and foot-bindings, and wrapped them up in a large package for her. She also gave her several of her own hairpins, combs, clasps, pendants, and rings. Hsiao-yü, too, pulled two pins out of her hair and gave them to Ch'un-mei. The remaining pearl necklaces, frets of silver filigree, and skirts and blouses of variegated and figured brocade, were all left undisturbed and carried back to the rear compound.

Ch'un-mei then bowed good-bye, and the woman and Hsiao-yü bade her farewell with tears in their eyes. As she was about to go out the gate, the woman wanted her to go pay a farewell obeisance to Yüeh-niang and the others, but Hsiao-yü stopped her with a negative wave of her hand. Ch'un-mei then proceeded to follow Auntie Hsüeh, without even turning her head, as she nonchalantly and resolutely marched out the main gate.

After the woman and Hsiao-yü had returned from seeing her out the gate, Hsiao-yü went back to the master suite to report to the First Lady, saying, "She left empty-handed, and her wardrobe has been retained, so she was not allowed to take anything with her."

Chin-lien made her way back to her quarters, where she was used to having Ch'un-mei's company. The two of them had been on intimate terms and were accustomed to sharing their innermost feelings with each other. But now that she had gone, her quarters seemed cold and desolate, and she felt so lonely that she commenced to weep out loud. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Her intimate words remain,
But now their love is severed;
In her room she is not seen,
In silence her soul melts. ¹⁸

a word to the wise;
It would be, "Don't ever confide your troubles to your sweetheart."¹

THE STORY GOES that from the time that Ch'un-mei left the household, P'an Chin-lien suffered from depression in her quarters. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after breakfast the next day, Ch'en Ching-chi went out on the pretext of settling accounts with a creditor and rode his mount to Auntie Hsüeh's house, where she happened to be at home. She invited him in, and Ch'en Ching-chi tied up his mule, came inside, and sat down. Tea was served to him, and he drank it, but Ch'un-mei, who was in an inner room, did not come out.

Auntie Hsüeh knowingly questioned him, saying, "Son-in-law, what have you come here to talk about?"

"I am on my way to settle accounts with a creditor up the street," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and just happened to pass by here. 'Is the young lady that you came to take away last night here with you?'"

"Yes, she is here," replied Auntie Hsüeh, "but I haven't found a purchaser for her yet."

"If she's here," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "I would like to be able to see her, and say a few words to her."

Auntie Hsüeh deliberately put on a meretricious act, saying, "My dear son-in-law, yesterday your mother-in-law was insistent in telling me that because the two of you had been:

Colluding in chicanery, and produced this ugly scandal, as soon as I have taken her away, I must take precautions to prevent the two of you from meeting or speaking to each other. You had better leave at once. I'm afraid that she might send a page boy here who, on seeing you, would go home and tell her about it, with the result that I would no longer have access to the household."

Ch'en Ching-chi merely responded with an ingratiating smile as he groped a tael of silver out of his sleeve, and said, "You can buy yourself some tea with this for the time being. If you accept it, I will reward you further on another day."

As for Auntie Hsüeh:

Her eyes opened at the sight of money, and she said, "My good son-in-law, short of money as you are, you are willing to spare some for me, are you? The fact is, though, that during the twelfth month of last year I pawned someone's two pairs of embroidered pillow ends in your shop. It has been almost a year since then and, including interest, it would probably cost me some eight mace of silver to redeem them. Could you retrieve them for me by any chance?"

"That's not a problem," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "I'll retrieve them for you tomorrow morning."

Auntie Hsüeh, on the one hand, invited Ch'en Ching-chi into the inner room to get together with Ch'un-mei and, on the other hand, told her daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, to prepare a meal, saying, "I'll go buy some tea things and snacks, and pick up a jug of wine, some potted meat, and the like, for the two of them to eat."

When Ch'un-mei caught sight of Ch'en Ching-chi, she exclaimed, "Son-in-law, a fine man you are! You're just:

An executioner who likes to play with his victims, leaving my mistress and me in such a predicament that we are at a loss for what to do in any direction. You have been responsible for putting us in this situation in which:

The exposure of misbehavior arouses disapproval.”²

“My sister,” responded Ch’en Ching-chi, “you have already been expelled from their household, and I do not intend to remain there much longer myself.

He and his wife, Chao Ying-ch’un,
Will each go their separate ways.”³

You must urge Auntie Hsüeh to find a good place for you. As far as I’m concerned:

Marinated leeks cannot be replanted in the vegetable bed.

I plan to go to the Eastern Capital to consult with my father, and when I come back I’ll not only divorce that daughter of theirs, but also demand the return of those boxes of valuables that my family entrusted to them.”

Not long after he had finished speaking, Auntie Hsüeh came back with the tea things, wine, and other foodstuff that she had purchased, set up a bed-table on the k’ang, and laid out a repast so the two of them could drink wine and chat with each other. She also joined them for a cup or two. They carried on an animated dialogue for some time about Yüeh-niang’s hard-heartedness.

Auntie Hsüeh said, “For her to expel such an attractive young lady as she is from the household without even allowing her to take any clothing or jewelry with her will not serve to enhance her value in the eyes of a future purchaser. And she asked for no more than the return of her original purchase price. Even when you pour clean water from one bowl into another, some of it is likely to be spilled. How mean-spirited can you get? When Ch’un-mei was about to leave, the maidservant Hsiao-yü did her a favor by inducing the Fifth Lady to provide her with two outfits of clothing. If she had not done so, what would she have had to wear when being looked over by a prospective purchaser?”

By the time they began to feel the effects of the wine, Auntie Hsüeh told her daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, to take her baby with her and go visit for a while with a neighbor so that the two of them would be at liberty to enjoy themselves in the inner room. Truly:

Just like male and female phoenixes amid the misty clouds,
Or like sporting mandarin ducks, diving beneath the waves;⁴
Signing a compact never to be separated
during this lifetime;
They agree to be happily bound together
in the life to come.⁵

When the two of them had finished their encounter, they prepared to part but found it:

Difficult to separate and difficult to split.⁶

Auntie Hsüeh was afraid that Yüeh-niang might send someone to spy on them and hurriedly urged Ch’en Ching-chi to get on his way, so he proceeded to mount his mule and return home.

Less than two days later, Ch’en Ching-chi came to present two gold lamé handkerchiefs and two pairs of ankle leggings to Ch’un-mei and also returned the pawned pillow ends to Auntie Hsüeh. He then spent some silver to purchase wine and proceeded to share a drink with Ch’un-mei in Auntie Hsüeh’s quarters. Unbeknownst to them, while they were drinking together, Yüeh-niang sent the page boy Lai-an to find out why Auntie Hsüeh had not yet found a buyer for Ch’un-mei, and he happened to notice the mule tethered outside the gate.

When he got home, he reported this to Yüeh-niang, saying, “Your son-in-law is also there.”

Upon hearing this, Yüeh-niang became enraged, sent people to summon Auntie Hsüeh again and again, and criticized her severely when she showed up, saying, “You took that slave away with you:

Promising today that you would do it tomorrow,

And tomorrow that you would do it the next day, while refusing to do your best to dispose of her as I commissioned you to do. It would seem that you are harboring her in order to exploit her propensity to engage in sexual affairs and thereby make some money for yourself. If you refuse to dispose of her, bring her back here. I’ll get Old Mother Feng to sell her for me and will no longer patronize you in the future.”

When Auntie Hsüeh heard this, with the loquaciousness of a go-between:

Wishing she had seven or eight more mouths than nature had provided, she exclaimed, “My Heavens! Venerable lady, you are mistaken in blaming me that way. Would you have me go after the God of Wealth with a stick? Under your patronage, venerable lady, how could I fail to do my best to dispose of her for you? Just yesterday, I took her to visit two or three potential purchasers, but none of them was willing to come up with the requisite sum. You asked me for the return of the original purchase price of sixteen taels of silver. But, as a mere go-between, how could I come up with such a sum out of my own pocket?”

“My page boy tells me,” said Yüeh-niang, “that that seedling of the Ch’en family was drinking wine with her at your place today.”

“Ai-ya! Ai-ya!” protested Auntie Hsüeh in consternation. “Here we go again. During the twelfth month of last year, I pawned someone’s two pairs of pillow ends at your shop on Lion Street, which they have now paid to redeem. Today, your son-in-law brought the pillow ends back to me, and I offered him a drink of tea, but without even drinking it, he hurriedly mounted his mule and went his way. Since when did he come into my place to drink wine with anybody? It seems that this servant of yours is prone to:

Making up lies and telling tales."

This speech reduced Yüeh-niang to silence for a time, after which she said, "I am merely concerned that that seedling of the Ch'en family may have:

Developed ideas that induce depravity, and Allowed his thoughts to be led astray."

"Do you take me to be a three-year-old child?" expostulated Auntie Hsüeh. "If any such thing were taking place, how could I have been unaware of it? In view of your instructions to me, do you think that I am indifferent to the relative merits of:

Long-term profits, and Short-term gains?

When he came to my place he did not:

Stick around or sit down for any time, but simply handed me the pillow ends and then departed without even drinking his tea. Since when did he have a chance to see the young lady from your household?

The only thing that ought to matter is the truth, yet you have seen fit to subject me to these accusations. The fact of the matter is that, at present, Commandant Chou Hsiu would like to purchase her in the hope of obtaining a son but is only willing to offer twelve taels of silver for her. If I can get him to come up with thirteen taels, I could then weigh out the silver and turn it over to you. It is said that His Honor Chou Hsiu, on previous occasions, when attending parties at your place, has seen the young lady and been impressed by the repertoire of songs she could sing, as well as her demeanor, and that is why he is willing to spend these few taels of silver for her, despite the fact that she is not a virgin. As for the other potential purchasers, none of them will offer to put up that much."

Auntie Hsüeh thus succeeded in hammering out an agreement with Yüeh-niang on the purchase price.

Early the next day, she got Ch'un-mei's things together and saw to it that she was properly dressed and made up. She sported a cloud-shaped chignon to hold her hair in place;

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets;

she wore a blouse of red chiffon over a skirt of blue chiffon; and her feet were clad in a pair of shoes with upturned toes. Auntie Hsüeh then hired a sedan chair and escorted her to the home of Commandant Chou Hsiu. When Chou Hsiu observed that Ch'un-mei's countenance was:

Both redder and whiter, than it was before; that her stature was:

Neither short nor tall;

and that she had a pair of tiny bound feet; he was as delighted as could be and weighed out an ingot of fifty taels of silver as her purchase price. Auntie Hsüeh took this home with her, where she chiseled off a piece worth thirteen taels, took it to the Hsi-men residence, and gave it to Yüeh-niang.

She also brought out an additional tael of silver to show her, saying, "This was given to me by His Honor Chou Hsiu as a reward for my efforts. Venerable lady, will you not also give me a little something?"

Wu Yüeh-niang felt compelled to accede to this request and weighed out five mace of silver for her. As a result, Auntie Hsüeh made a profit of thirty-seven taels and five mace of silver out of the transaction. The fact is that nine out of ten go-betweens make the money to support their households this way.

To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi now found himself in a situation in which Ch'un-mei had been sold, he no longer had access to Chin-lien, and Yüeh-niang refused to pay any attention to him. She saw to it that the doors were tightly locked, personally came out every evening to check them by lantern light, and closed and locked the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds before going to bed at night. Because of this, he felt himself to be helpless and was extremely frustrated.

This led him to quarrel with Hsi-men Ta-chieh more than once, calling her a whore time after time, and saying, "Since I married into your family as a son-in-law I have scarcely been guilty of eating you out of house and home, and your family has possession of trunkloads of my family's gold and silver. You are my wife after all, but you not only fail to look after my interests but accuse me of scrounging for food off your family. Since when have I been eating off your family for nothing?"

He attacked Hsi-men Ta-chieh so severely that he reduced her to tears.

The twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month was Meng Yü-lou's birthday, and she prepared several saucers worth of hors d'oeuvres and snacks to go with the wine and told Ch'un-hung, with the best of intentions, to take them out to the shop on the street front of the residence for Ch'en Ching-chi and Manager Fu Ming to enjoy.

Yüeh-niang objected to this, saying, "There's no need to cater to that worthless creature. If you want to provide something for Manager Fu Ming, go ahead and provide something for him to enjoy, but there is no need to cater to that creature."

But Meng Yü-lou rejected this advice, and Ch'un-hung took what she had prepared out and set it down on the counter in the shop. The jar of wine she had provided was large but was soon emptied, and Ch'en Ching-chi told Lai-an to go back and ask for more.

Manager Fu Ming objected to this, saying, "Son-in-law, there is no need to ask for more wine. This amount is adequate, and I am not going to drink any more."

But Ch'en Ching-chi rejected this advice and insisted on sending Lai-an back to get some more.

They had to wait for quite a while, before Lai-an came back and reported, "There is no more wine to be had."

Ch'en Ching-chi was already half drunk on the wine he had consumed and tried to send him back again, but when Lai-an refused to budge, he went out and bought some wine with his own money.

He then berated Lai-an, saying, "You lousy little slave, you just wait. Since your mistress is unwilling to countenance me, you slaves have also started to defy me, refusing to do so much as move when I tell you to do something. Since I entered your household as a son-in-law, it can hardly be said that I have eaten enough to deplete your supply of wine or meat. When your master was alive, how did you treat me? But now that your master is dead, you've had a change of heart and begun to ignore me, doing whatever you can to get rid of me. My mother-in-law has paid heed to the slanders of you slaves and started to act defensively toward me, entrusting everything to you slaves, and nothing to me. But let her do as she pleases. I'm:

Quite inured to such alarms."

"My good son-in-law," expostulated Manager Fu Ming, "don't continue to talk that way. If they don't respect you, who do they respect? I imagine they must be too busy in the rear compound, or they would scarcely have refused to supply you with wine. It's no big deal that you should scold them that way, but:

Walls have cracks,

Fences have ears,

and someone is likely to say that you have been drinking too much."

"Venerable manager," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "you don't know what's going on. As for me:

Though wine is in my belly,

My concerns are on my mind.⁷

My mother-in-law is credulous enough to believe the slanders that petty persons have lodged against me and treats me as though I have been guilty of intercourse with someone who is not guilty of intercourse with me. What if I were to have carried on affairs with every woman in the household? If I were taken to court, it would only be a case of intercourse with my stepmothers-in-law, which would result in no more than a charge of misconduct.⁸ At present, I might as well divorce that daughter of yours and then draft a complaint and take you to court. Or else, I may go to the Eastern Capital and submit a memorial to the throne inside the Myriad Years Gate. Your family has possession of trunkloads of my family's gold and silver, all of which were originally ill-gotten gains accumulated by Yang Chien and are subject to confiscation by the state. How would you like it if I were to succeed in getting these several damned houses of yours confiscated, and the women of the household all sold into servitude by the judiciary? It's not as though:

I were not out to catch fish,

But only to muddy the waters, for the fun of it. If she had any sense, she'd acknowledge me once again as her son-in-law and treat me as she did before, which would be for the benefit of all those concerned."

When Manager Fu Ming heard these threatening words, he said, "Son-in-law, you're drunk.

Wang Ten-plus-nine,

Let's sip our wine,

and set these wanton allegations aside."

At this, Ch'en Ching-chi opened his eyes wide and glared at Manager Fu Ming, saying, "You lousy old dog! How can you accuse me of making wanton allegations, or allege that I am drunk? It's not as though I've been drinking any wine of yours. Unworthy though I may be, I am the favored son-in-law in her family, and you are no more than a cashier employed by her household. Are you also trying to get rid of me? Don't worry, you old dog. You have made more than enough money off my father-in-law over the years, and have had more than enough to eat, and yet you want to join the cabal that is seeking to drive me out, do you? No doubt, you hope to be given sole charge of the business so you can skim off the cash to support your family. In the future when I lodge a complaint and take her to court I'll be sure to include your name in the indictment."

Manager Fu Ming was not a courageous man. When he saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, he put on his outer garments and, surreptitiously heading for home, disappeared in a cloud of dust. A page boy came out to collect the utensils and take them back to the rear compound, after which Ch'en Ching-chi collapsed onto the k'ang and fell asleep. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, early in the morning, Manager Fu Ming went into the rear compound to see Yüeh-niang and told her everything that had happened the night before. Weeping and wailing, he said that he wanted to quit his job and return to his original home, turn over his account books, and engage in trade no longer.

Yüeh-niang endeavored to dissuade him, saying, "Manager Fu, just relax and carry on your business as before. Don't pay any attention to that worthless piece of goods. He is as expendable as a piece of stinking shit. Originally, on account of the fact that his family was implicated in a legal proceeding, he was sent to seek temporary refuge in our household. There were no such things as gold and silver or other valuables involved. There were only several items from Hsi-men Tachieh's dowry, and the luggage that they brought with them. Meanwhile, his old man went into hiding in the Eastern Capital, while the members of our household were left in fear, day and night, that some petty person might inform on him and get us into trouble. When he came here he was no more than fifteen or sixteen years old, a mere fledgling, and he has had the good fortune to be supported by his father-in-law's family for all these years, and trained to be proficient in various enterprises. But now that:

His wing feathers are dry enough for flight,
he is:

Requiting kindness with enmity,
and:

Trying to sweep it all under the rug with a single stroke of the broom.

He's just a youngster whose words cannot be trusted. What does he understand of Heavenly principle? But, in the future, Heaven will not fail to observe his conduct. Manager Fu, just relax and carry on your business as before. Don't pay any attention to him. He will surely come to feel ashamed of himself."

In this way, Yüeh-niang succeeded in placating Manager Fu Ming. But no more of this.

One day it was one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

The pawnshop was crowded with customers who had come to redeem their belongings, when who should appear but the wet nurse Ju-i, carrying Hsiao-ko, who had come to deliver a kettle of tea for Manager Fu Ming to drink. As she set it down on the table Hsiao-ko, in the wet nurse's arms, began to cry for all he was worth.

On seeing this, Ch'en Ching-chi, in front of the crowd of customers, addressed himself to the baby, saying:

Half facetiously but in earnest,⁹

"Little brother, my precious child, you stop that crying."

He then turned to the customers, and said, "This child behaves just as though I were his father, in that he does what I tell him to do. When I tell him to stop crying, he stops crying."

This remark stunned the customers, and Ju-i admonished him, saying, "Son-in-law, what kind of talk is that? You even went so far as to address him as your son. Just see if I don't report this to the First Lady when I go back inside."

At this, Ch'en Ching-chi ran up to her and gave the wet nurse a couple of kicks, saying in a jocular but abusive manner, "Why you crazy louse of a stinker! Go ahead and report it; but if you do, I'll kick your ass hard enough to produce a sounding fart."

The wet nurse, with the baby in her arms, promptly went back to the rear compound and wept as she told Yüeh-niang, thus and so, what Ch'en Ching-chi had said about the child in front of the crowd of customers.

If Yüeh-niang had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard it, while she was combing her hair in front of her mirror stand, she was rendered speechless for what seemed like half a day, and then:

Fell to the floor in a faint,¹⁰

Oblivious to human affairs.

Behold:

The jade from the Ch'u mountains is damaged;

Much to be lamented is Hsi-men Ch'ing's lawfully wedded wife.

The bloom in the jeweled mirror is withered;

Despite the ninety days of spring given by the Lord of the East.

Her flowery countenance looks dispirited;

Like the herbaceous peony in the West Garden clinging to the red railing.¹¹

Her sandalwood mouth remains speechless;

Like the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin of the South

Seas engaging in meditation.

In the little garden last night the spring wind was disastrous;

Scattering the blossoms of the river plums

all over the ground.¹²

This threw Hsiao-yü into such consternation that she called together the members of the household, high and low, to help Yüeh-niang up into a sitting position on the k'ang. Sun Hsüeh-o then jumped onto the k'ang, administered artificial respiration for some time, and poured a dose of ginger extract into her throat, but it seemed like half a day before she regained consciousness. Yüeh-niang's breathing was obstructed at first, so that all she could do was choke, without being able even to sob out a sound.

The wet nurse Ju-i told Meng Yü-lou and Sun Hsüeh-o about the facetious remarks Ch'en Ching-chi had made about Hsiao-ko in front of the customers in the pawnshop and went on to say, "I endeavored to admonish him with the best of intentions, but he chased after me and kicked me a couple of times, nearly causing me to faint with anger on the spot."

Sun Hsüeh-o continued to support Yüeh-niang in an upright position until the others had left and then, while they were alone together in the room, quietly said to her, "Mother, there is no need to get angry. If you allow yourself to get so upset that:

Anything untoward should happen to you, that would be an even greater calamity. That youngster, because Ch'un-mei has been sold, and he can no longer have his way with that whore from the P'an household, has been frustrated enough to give vent to such allegations. Right now, one must either:

Refuse to do something;
Or not stop at anything.

Since Hsi-men Ta-chieh has already been married off, she is like a plot of land that has been sold, and there is not much we can do for her. As the saying goes:

All you get for raising toads is dropsy.

What's the point of keeping that youngster around the house anyway? Tomorrow, we ought to inveigle him into coming back to the rear compound, give him a real beating, and then drive him out the door to return to his own family. After that, we ought to summon Dame Wang. Since:

She is the one who produced this problem,
She should be the one who eliminates it.

We should get her to take that whore away from here and sell her off, just as one would dispose of dog shit or stinking piss. In this way the whole problem could be solved in a single day. What's the point of letting them continue to reside here, and thereby run the risk of their dragging us into the soup in the future?"

"What you say makes sense," responded Yüeh-niang.

They decided upon their plan there and then.

The next day, after the morning meal, Yüeh-niang arranged to have seven or eight maids and servants' wives lie in wait, armed with sticks and cudgels, and then sent the page boy Lai-an to trick Ch'en Ching-chi into coming into the rear compound for a talk.

Once he was inside, and the ceremonial gate had been closed behind him, she ordered him to kneel down in front of her and demanded, "Do you acknowledge your crime?"

Ch'en Ching-chi refused to kneel and exhibited as haughty an air as ever, while Yüeh-niang proceeded to interrogate him. There is a long set piece of parallel prose that testifies to this.

At the outset, Yüeh-niang did not offend him, but now her countenance altered.

After this, Ch'en Ching-chi, responding to her dressing down, raised his head,

Saying, "You need not waste your breath with this incessant bickering.

I've got to arrive at some sort of an understanding with you."

Yüeh-niang said, "This is your father-in-law's private dwelling place;

It is not a Verdant Spring Bordello, or a Nest of Orioles and Swallows.

How can you have the effrontery to flirt with one of his womenfolk?

As your father-in-law's beloved concubine, she is living as a widow.

How can you feel yourself entitled to engage in flirtation with her?

And there is also that shamelessly wanton slave who has ensnared you.

From of old, if the bitch does not wag her tail, dogs will not engage her.

These are all offenses that besmirch the family,
and are hard to forgive."

Ch'en Ching-chi cried, "By unleashing a horde of witches to bind Chung K'uei,¹³

You have sprung a trap so you could beat this culprit to your heart's content.

The cheeks of my bottom find this flagellation almost impossible to endure.

You maidservants, cease your agitation; First Lady, forgo your perturbation.

If you don't watch out, these pitiless sticks will end up breaking my back."

Yüeh-niang retorted, "You lousy nincompoop! Do you dare to give me your lip?
As they say, when the ice is three feet thick,
it is not due to one day of cold.¹⁴
You are guilty of such unpardonable acts that they are difficult to forgive.
You are lucky to be subjected merely to this flailing with stalks of reed.
But if you should have the temerity to think of doing any such thing again, I'll cut off this perishable prick of yours and leave you celibate for life."

Yüeh-niang, at this juncture, directed the squad of women, including Sun Hsüeh-o, Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu, Lai-chao's wife "The Beanpole," Chung-ch'iu, Hsiao-yü, and Hsiu-ch'un, to proceed, hugger-mugger, to hold Ch'en Ching-chi down on the floor and give him a drubbing with their sticks and cudgels. Hsi-men Ta-chieh saw what was going on but merely withdrew and did nothing to save her husband.

They beat the young scamp until, in desperation, he tore off his pants and exposed his organ, which was standing up as straight as a stick. This so startled the women that they dropped their sticks and cudgels and fled in all directions.

Yüeh-niang, for her part, was both annoyed and amused by this display and berated him, saying, "What a fine phony of a cuckold's spawn you are!"

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,

"Had it not been for this ploy of mine, how could I have escaped?"

Thereupon, he crawled to his feet, pulled up his pants with one hand, and fled out to the front compound. Yüeh-niang deputed a page boy to follow him and tell him to settle his accounts and turn them over to Manager Fu Ming. Ch'en Ching-chi realized that, under the circumstances, he could no longer remain there. After gathering up his clothes and bedding, without even saying good-bye, he proceeded to walk out of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in a huff, and head for his family's old home, now occupied by his maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, to find a place to stay. Truly:

It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;
Even in a thousand years or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.

When P'an Chin-lien heard that Ch'en Ching-chi had been beaten and expelled from the household, she felt:

Worry piled upon worry, and Depression augmented by depression.

One day, Yüeh-niang, inspired by Sun Hsüeh-o's suggestion, sent Tai-an to summon Dame Wang. Ever since Dame Wang's son Wang Ch'ao returned home from his apprenticeship to a merchant in the Huai River region, from whom he had purloined a hundred taels of silver entrusted to him for the purchase of stock, she had felt affluent enough to give up her business of selling tea. Her son had purchased two donkeys, a set of millstones, and a sieve frame, and set himself up as a miller. When she heard that she was being summoned to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, she promptly donned her outer garments and started off.

Along the way, she said to Tai-an, "Brother, I haven't set eyes on you for a long time, but I see that you're old enough to have started wearing your hair in a bun. Have you taken a wife already?"

"No I haven't," replied Tai-an.

"Since your master is dead," said Dame Wang, "which member of your household is it who is calling for me, and what am I wanted for? No doubt the Fifth Lady is about to bear a son and would like me to help with the delivery."

"The Fifth Lady is not bearing a son," responded Tai-an, "but she has been caught carrying on an affair with her son-in-law. The First Lady would like you to take her away and marry her off to someone."

"My Heavens!" exclaimed Dame Wang. "You see, it is just as I thought, that whore, on losing her husband, could not be expected to maintain her chastity. Just as:

Dogs cannot be trained not to eat shit, she's reverted to practicing her dirty tricks again. So it was with that son-in-law of yours, was it? What's his name?"

"His surname is Ch'en and his given name is Ching-chi," said Tai-an.

"I remember the occasion last year," said Dame Wang, "when I came to ask your master's help in that affair involving the younger brother of Ho the Ninth. Your master was not at home at the time, and that lousy whore not only failed to invite me to stay for a chat in her quarters but refused to come up with so much as a broken needle for me. All she did was to tell a maidservant to pour me a cup of plain tea, after drinking which, I left. I had thought that she would remain a member of his household for:

A thousand if not ten thousand years.¹⁵

Who could have anticipated that she is now going to be sent away. What a home-breaker of a whore she is. Quite aside from the fact that it was I had who arranged her marriage into such a prestigious household; even if it had been any ordinary person, she should not have been treated so skimpily.”

“Because of the chaos she and our son-in-law have created,” said Tai-an, “the First Lady almost died of anger yesterday and has already expelled him from the household. And now, she wants you to take her away as well.”

“When she entered the household, she came in a sedan chair,” said Dame Wang. “And she should be allowed to leave in one as well. She brought a trunkful of belongings with her when she came, and she should also be allowed to take one with her now.”

“That goes without saying,” said Tai-an. “The First Lady will decide what is appropriate.”

As they engaged in this discussion, they arrived at the door of Hsi-men Ch’ing’s residence, and Dame Wang went back to Yüeh-niang’s quarters, where she bowed in greeting and sat down.

After they had finished the tea served by a maidservant, Yüeh-niang said, “Dame Wang, I would not have invited you here for no reason.”

She then proceeded to spell out, thus and so, all of the preceding events involving P’an Chin-lien and concluded by saying, “Since:

You are the one who produced this problem,

You should be the one who eliminates it.

One guest does not trouble two hosts.

I would, therefore, prevail upon you to take her away again and either marry her off to someone else, or dispose of her in a way that allows her to continue:

Eating the bread of idleness.

Now that my husband is dead, I can no longer afford to maintain such people as this. Needless to say, that dead devil of mine spent vast sums of money on her; enough to cast a silver figurine to match her dimensions. If you give me back whatever you manage to marry her off for, I can use it to hold a sutra recitation for my husband, so some good may come of it.”

“Venerable lady,” said Dame Wang, “I understand that it is not the money that you are really concerned about, but the need to rid yourself of this troublemaker. I will not let you down.”

She then went on to say, “Today is a propitious day for such an undertaking. I might as well take her away forthwith. But there is another issue. She brought a trunkful of her belongings with her and arrived in a sedan chair. She ought to be provided with a sedan chair for her departure.”

“I’ll let her take a trunk of her belongings with her,” said Yüeh-niang, “but I won’t allow her to go in a sedan chair.”

“My mistress talks that way at the height of her rage,” said Hsiao-yü. “But she will not fail to provide a sedan chair when the time comes for her to leave since:

Exposing her face to the public gaze, would only cause our neighbors to laugh at us.”

Yüeh-niang did not say anything in response to this but sent the maidservant Hsiu-ch’un to the front compound to summon Chin-lien. When Chin-lien saw that Dame Wang was there in the room, her eyes opened wide with surprise, and she bowed in greeting before sitting down.

Dame Wang opened the conversation, saying, “You had better get your things together right away. The First Lady has instructed me just now to take you away with me today.”

“How long has it been since my husband died?” said Chin-lien. “As for me:

What fault have I committed;

What offense am I guilty of?

Why should I be driven away for no good reason?”

Yüeh-niang¹⁶ responded, “Don’t you:

Feign being more silly than you are,¹⁷

Pretending to be both dumb and deaf.¹⁸

It has always been true that:

When a snake makes a hole for itself
it knows where it is.¹⁹

Whatever a person sees fit to do,
Is clear in the mind of the doer.

Chin-lien, you had better not:

Disguise your perfidy by playing dumb,²⁰

Showing an innocent face to both sides.²¹

Praising here and faultfinding there.

In my hands you can dispense with your:

Clever words and deceptive phrases,

Apple polishing and favor currying.²²

It has always been true that:

There is no party that does not come to an end.
The beam that projects is the first one to rot.²³
Just as a man has his reputation,
A tree has its shadow.
Flies don't cluster on eggs unless they're cracked.

You had better not assume that you can continue to support yourself by committing adultery. And right now, I'm going to send you off to oblivion."

Chin-lien responded:

"If you hit someone, avoid hitting his face,
If you berate him, don't expose his faults."²⁴

As the sayings go:

If one cock dies, another will crow in its stead.
He who works a sieve will have some grain to eat.²⁵
Who can ever defend his head with an iron helmet?
Who can ever shield his eyes with bamboo matting?
Human beings are likely to meet each other again,
Just as fallen tree leaves return to their roots.

You ought not to:

Drive people out with bare hands and naked fists.²⁶
In arguing don't heed the words of petty persons.

Truly:

A decent woman does not wear
her bridal clothes;
A decent man does not consume
his inheritance.
It is useless to complain that the weather is cold."

There and then, after Chin-lien and Yüeh-niang had wrangled for a while, Yüeh-niang accompanied her to her quarters and agreed to let her take with her two trunks worth of belongings, a table with drawers in it, four outfits of clothing, a number of clasps, combs, hairpins, and rings, and a set of bedding. She also stuffed the shoes and foot-bindings she was accustomed to wear into one of the trunks. She then ordered Ch'iu-chü to move back into the rear compound and put a lock on the door to Chin-lien's quarters.

Chin-lien proceeded to don her outer garments, bade farewell to Yüeh-niang, and wept profusely in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet. She also paid a visit to Meng Yü-lou's quarters. The two of them had been like sisters to each other, but now:

One fine day they were fated to part,²⁷ and they could not help shedding tears together.

Meng Yü-lou also gave her a pair of gold hairpins with bowl-shaped ends, a jacket of kingfisher-blue satin, and a red skirt, without Yüeh-niang's knowledge, saying, "Sister Six, from now on, you and I must:

Spend more time apart than together.

I hope you can find a good home, and go on to enjoy a good life. It has always been true that:

Though you erect a thousand li marquee,
There is no party that does not come to an end.

If you find a home, send someone to tell me, so when I go out I may be able to come see you, and thus fulfill our sisterly feelings."

Thereupon, they bade each other farewell with tears in their eyes.

As Chin-lien was about to go out the gate, Hsiao-yü escorted her and surreptitiously presented her with two gold-headed pins.

"Sister," Chin-lien responded, "it would seem you actually have some human feelings for me."

By the time Chin-lien got into the sedan chair at the gate, Dame Wang had already hired workers to carry off her trunks and the table that Yüeh-niang had allowed her to take. Only Meng Yü-lou and Hsiao-yü saw Chin-lien off in her sedan chair, after which they went back inside. Truly:

Of the ten thousand things that create grief in this human world;
Nothing exceeds the severance of death and separation of the living.

To resume our story, when Chin-lien arrived at Dame Wang's home, Dame Wang put her into her inner chamber, where she slept together with her at night. Dame Wang's son, Wang Ch'ao, had grown up to be a tall young man and had started to wear his hair in a bun, although he had not yet taken a wife. A bed had been provided in the outer room for him to sleep on.

The next day, P'an Chin-lien made herself up as usual with:

Exaggeratedly painted eyebrows and eyes, and stood behind the hanging door-blind gawking at the passersby. When she had nothing else to do, she sat on the k'ang, either:

Painting her brows and making up her eyes,

Or idly strumming her p'i-p'a.

When Dame Wang was not at home, she spent her time playing at cards or board games with Wang Ch'ao. Dame Wang, for her part, went about her business as usual, sweeping up the flour from the mill, or feeding the donkeys, without paying any attention to them. It was not long before, as:

The mornings and evenings came and went,²⁸

she succeeded in seducing Wang Ch'ao. At night, after waiting till Dame Wang had fallen asleep, the woman would get off the k'ang, on the pretext of needing to urinate, go into the outer room, and get into bed with Wang Ch'ao.

As the two of them went at it together one night, they shook the bed until the creaking became audible enough to wake up Dame Wang, who asked, "Where is that noise coming from?"

"It's only the cat chasing a rat under the counter," replied Wang Ch'ao.

In her half dreaming state, Dame Wang muttered, "It must be because there is some bran and flour lying about the room that this annoying creature is keeping us awake during:

The third watch in the middle of the night."

Later, on hearing the sounds of movement as the bed continued to creak, Dame Wang asked again, "Where is that noise coming from?"

Wang Ch'ao replied, "The cat has caught the rat and is making a noise as he chews at it in the hole under the k'ang."

Dame Wang bent her ear to listen and, sure enough, it sounded like a cat worrying its prey in the hole under the k'ang. Only then did she cease asking about it. As soon as the woman and the young scamp had finished their business, she quietly climbed back onto the k'ang and went to sleep as before.

There are several lines of double entendre that describe this rat very well:

Your body is small, but your daring is great;

Your muzzle is pointed, and prone to mischief.

On seeing anyone, you hide yourself away;

But the squeaks you create can still be heard.

You disturb one's sleep in the middle of the night.

Unwilling to follow the rules of good behavior;

You are given to boring your way into cracks.

And there is another symptom of your knavery;

You can never abandon your taste for stolen sweets.

One day, Ch'en Ching-chi, upon learning that Chin-lien had been expelled from the household and was temporarily lodged in Dame Wang's home while being offered in marriage, took two strings of copper cash, along with some silver, and made his way to Dame Wang's home. When he arrived there, Dame Wang was engaged in sweeping up the donkey droppings in front of her door.

P'an Chin-lien Agrees to Relieve Wang Ch'ao's Thirst

Ch'en Ching-chi stepped forward and greeted her with a deep bow, upon which Dame Wang inquired, "Brother, what do you want?"

"Would you please allow me to speak to you inside?" said Ch'en Ching-chi.

Dame Wang, accordingly, ushered him inside, whereupon Ch'en Ching-chi took off his eye shades and asked, "Is not the woman named P'an the Sixth from the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing lodging here while being offered in marriage?"

"What is your relationship to her?" asked Dame Wang.

Ch'en Ching-chi replied with an ingratiating smile, "I would not deceive you ma'am. I am her younger brother, and she is my elder sister."

Dame Wang appraised him by:

Looking him over from top to bottom,²⁹ for a while and then said, "Since when does she have any younger brother? I know nothing of such a one. Don't try to deceive me. I imagine you must be the son-in-law of the household, surnamed Ch'en, who has come here in the hope of pulling the wool over my eyes; but I won't let you get away with it."

Ch'en Ching-chi laughed at this and then pulled the two strings of copper cash out from his waist and laid them before her, saying, "These two strings of cash can serve you temporarily to defray the cost of a cup of tea. If you will only consent to let me see her, I will reward you more generously on another day."

When Dame Wang saw the money, she reacted more meretriciously than ever, saying, "Don't talk about rewarding me. The First Lady of the household ordered me not to let any riffraff look her over. But I'll demean myself so far as to make you a proposition. If you want to have a single interview with this woman, give me five taels of silver. If you want to see her a second time, give me ten taels of silver. If you decide to marry her, it will cost you a hundred taels of silver, in addition to which there will be a go-between's fee of ten taels of silver. I don't go in for idle negotiations. What's the point of offering me these two strings of cash that are:

Hardly enough to discolor the water?"

When Ch'en Ching-chi realized that the procuress was adamant in refusing the little he had offered, he plucked a pair of gold-headed, silver-shafted, pins out of his hair that were worth five mace of silver, knelt down on the ground:

Dragging his legs like a chicken on the chopping block, and said, "Dame Wang, pray accept what I am offering. I will bring you another tael of silver another day, without fail. Let me meet with her, and allow us to exchange a few words, that's all."

Dame Wang, thereupon, after accepting his hairpins and silver, said, "You go inside and see her, say what you have to say, and then come out again. I won't allow you to just sit there:

Ogling her with your hungry eyes.

And you must be sure to bring me the extra tael of silver you have promised tomorrow."

Thereupon, she lifted aside the portiere and let Ch'en Ching-chi into the inner room, where the woman was sitting on the k'ang engaged in stitching a shoe.

When she saw Ch'en Ching-chi, she put down the shoe vamp she was working on and complained to him, saying, "A fine man you are! Leaving me betwixt and between:

Unable to reach the village ahead,

Or make it back to the inn behind.

You may have what it takes to get started,

but you don't carry through.

You put me in a predicament in which:

The exposure of misbehavior arouses disapproval, while you disappeared without leaving a shadow behind and didn't even come back to see how I was doing. Ch'un-mei and I have been forcibly separated:

You to the east and I to the west.³⁰

And whose fault was that?"

As she spoke, she clutched at Ch'en Ching-chi and began to weep bitterly. Dame Wang objected to her weeping, fearing that it would be overheard.

"My sister," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "on your account, I have been:

Skinny alive and cut to the quick;

while, on my account, you have:

Endured anger and suffered disgrace.

It is not that I have refused to come see you. Yesterday, I went to Auntie Hsüeh's place, where I learned that Ch'un-mei has already been sold to the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu. I also learned that you had been expelled from the household and were staying at Dame Wang's place, waiting to be married off. Today, I made a point of coming to see you in order to discuss matters together.

Our feelings are hard to disregard;³¹

We can never agree to be separated.

So what are we to do about it? At present, I have made up my mind to divorce my wife, the daughter of that household, and demand that the trunks of gold and silver that my family entrusted to them in the past be returned to me. If they refuse to do so, I will go to the Eastern Capital and submit a memorial, together with a legal complaint, to the Emperor inside the Myriad Years Gate. If they propose to return them to me after that, it will be too late. I can then, surreptitiously, using:

An assumed name and appropriated identity, pop you into a sedan chair and take you into my household, so that:

We can remain forever reunited, as husband and wife. There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme."

"Right now," said the woman, "my godmother Dame Wang is asking a hundred taels of silver for me. Do you have such a sum of silver to give her?"

"Why is she demanding so much?" asked Ch'en Ching-chi.

"Your mother-in-law," said Dame Wang, "says that your father-in-law, in the past, expended more than enough money on her to cast a silver figurine to match her dimensions. She insists upon the price of a hundred taels of silver. Not a bit less will do."

"I will not deceive you," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but the warm feelings between myself and Sister Six are such that:

We can never agree to be separated.

Will you not consent to lower the price by half, to something like fifty or sixty taels of silver? I can go to my maternal uncle Chang Kuan's place and rent two or three rooms from him, so I would have a home into which to take Sister Six as my wife.

That would constitute 'a fling in the spring breeze,' even though you would make a little less off the transaction."

"Quite aside from fifty taels of silver," said Dame Wang, "I would not let you have her even for eighty taels of silver. Just yesterday, Magnate Ho, the silk merchant from Hu-chou, offered me seventy taels of silver for her. And Chang the Second from Main Street, who is currently serving as judicial commissioner, sent two adjutants offering eighty taels of silver, duly weighed out in two packets, but it was not enough, and they had to take it back with them. You're just a youngster with:

An empty mouth uttering empty words.

And yet you have the nerve to try to take advantage of me. But I'm not about to let myself be fleeced."

There and then, she strode out into the street and called out in a loud voice, saying, "Just whose son-in-law is it who is brazen enough to propose to marry his mother-in-law, and has the nerve to come farting around my place in order to do it?"

Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into such consternation by this that he pulled the old woman inside with one hand, got down on his knees before her, and pleaded, "Dame Wang, pray be quiet. I'll accept the price of a hundred taels of silver that you demand. The only problem is that my father is in the Eastern Capital. I'll set out for the Eastern Capital tomorrow in order to get the money from him."

"Since you are doing this for me," the woman said, "don't you quibble over the price with my godmother, but go get the money as fast as you can. My only fear is that if you are too late, I may be married off to someone else and won't end up belonging to you after all."

"I'll hire a horse and travel by double stages, both day and night," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "I should be back in half a month, at most, or as little as ten days."

Dame Wang said, "As the saying goes:

The first one to cook the rice is the first to eat.

In addition, there is my go-between's fee of ten taels of silver. You must not come up short. I want to make that absolutely clear."

"There is no need to remind me," said Ch'en Ching-chi.

"Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

As soon as they finished their discussion, Ch'en Ching-chi said good-bye, went out the door, returned home, and packed his bags for the trip. Early the next morning, he hired a horse and set out for the Eastern Capital to get the money he needed. This trip of his was truly a case of:

DAME WANG HUNGERS AFTER WEALTH AND RECEIVES HER JUST REWARD; WU SUNG KILLS HIS SISTER-IN-LAW AND PROPITIATES HIS BROTHER

If you devote your life to good works

Good and evil acts inevitably bring

Though you fly high or travel far¹ you cannot escape them.²

THE STORY GOES that Ch'en Ching-chi hired a horse for himself, called for a servitor of Militia Commander Chang Kuan to accompany him, and set out early in the morning for the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.

To resume our story, the day after Wu Yüeh-niang had expelled P'an Chin-lien from the household, she sent Ch'un-hung to summon Auntie Hsüeh because she also wished to sell Ch'iu-chü.

While Ch'un Hung was walking along Main Street on this errand, he happened to run into Ying Po-chüeh, who called him to a halt and inquired, "Ch'un-hung, where are you headed?"

"The First Lady has sent me to summon the go-between Auntie Hsüeh," replied Ch'un-hung.

"What does she want with that go-between?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"She plans to sell the maidservant Ch'iu-chü from the Fifth Lady's quarters," explained Ch'un-hung.

"Why was the Fifth Lady expelled from the household?" Ying Po-chüeh went on to ask. "She is now at Dame Wang's place, and I hear that Dame Wang is looking for someone to marry her off to. Is all this really true?"

Ch'un-hung then proceeded to tell him, thus and so, "She was said to be having an affair with her son-in-law, and, when the First Lady found out about it, she first expelled the young lady Ch'un-mei from the household, after which she subjected her son-in-law to a beating and forced him to flee to his family home. It was only yesterday that she expelled the Fifth Lady from the household."

When Ying Po-chüeh heard this, he nodded his head and said, "So it turns out that your Fifth Lady was up to something with that son-in-law of yours. It's not easy to tell what people are capable of."

He then addressed Ch'un-hung again, saying, "My child, since your master is already dead, why should you want to remain in his household? There's no profit to be obtained by doing so. If you would like to go back to the south where you came from, why not look for someone here that might take you back there with him? What do you think?"

"It is just as you say," responded Ch'un-hung. "My master is already dead, and the First Lady has become extremely strict with us. She has closed up most of the businesses the master formerly engaged in, and sold off the premises where they were conducted. Ch'in-t'ung and Hua-t'ung have already left, and she is no longer able to support such a large number of people. I would like to be able to return to the south, but I don't know of anyone who would find it convenient to take me, and I don't know how to find anyone here in the city who would be willing to employ me."

"You silly child!" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"If one is not farsighted,³

One will never be secure.

To return to the south, you would have to traverse:

A thousand mountains and a myriad streams.⁴

What would be the point of that, and who would take you there? You are able to perform quite a few songs, and consequently you should have no trouble finding someone here in town to employ you. Let me recommend a possibility to you, namely, the household of His Honor Chang the Second on Main Street. He disposes of property worth tens of thousands of strings of cash, owns buildings with a hundred rooms, and has been appointed to replace your former master in his posts as judicial commissioner and battalion commander. And at present he has also acquired the Second Lady from your household as a concubine. If I should take you to his place in order to seek employment, when he sees that you are adept at performing southern songs, I guarantee you'll:

Hit the bull's-eye with the first arrow.

If he retains you as a personal servant to wait on him, you'll be better off than you are in your current situation. He has a good disposition, is still quite young, is unrestrained in his behavior, and is attracted by good looks. You would be a lucky fellow to obtain such a position."

Ch'un-hung then proceeded to prostrate himself before him and said, "I would be indebted to you for your help. If I meet with His Honor Chang the Second and succeed in:

Advancing by so much as a single step,

I will purchase a present and come kowtow to you."

Ying Po-chüeh pulled Ch'un-hung to his feet with one hand and said, "Silly child, stand up. I always do whatever I can to help people succeed. I don't require any expressions of gratitude from you. Where would you get the money for such a thing?"

"If I should go with you," said Ch'un-hung, "I fear that the First Lady back at home will wonder where I have gone. What should I do about that?"

"That shouldn't be a problem," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I will ask His Honor Chang the Second to write a note to her and enclose a tael of silver. She probably won't dare to accept the silver but, no doubt, will end up by handing you over to him with both hands."

When they had finished their conversation, Ch'un-hung went on to Auntie Hsüeh's place and told her that she was wanted by his mistress. Upon meeting with her, Auntie Hsüeh led Ch'iu-chü away, after paying Yüeh-niang her asking price of a mere five taels of silver. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Ying Po-chüeh took Ch'un-hung with him to pay a visit to Chang the Second and, on seeing how good-looking he was, and hearing that he could perform southern songs, Chang the Second agreed to retain him as a personal servant. He then wrote out a note, sealed it up with one tael of silver, and sent someone to the Hsi-men household to collect his trunk of belongings.

That day, Wu Yüeh-niang was at home, entertaining Yün Li-shou's wife, née Su,⁵ with a cup of wine. Some time before this, Yün Li-shou had succeeded to his elder brother's hereditary post as vice commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard. Upon witnessing the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, and the fact that Yüeh-niang was set on maintaining her widowhood and still had substantial means at her disposal, he could not help salivating with excitement at the prospect of profiting from the situation. That day, his wife had purchased eight trays of preserved fruit and come to call on Yüeh-niang. Knowing that Yüeh-niang had given birth to a son named Hsiao-ko, and having a daughter of her own who was only two months old, she intended to form a marriage alliance with Yüeh-niang by betrothing the two children to each other and formalizing the pact by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of their blouses.⁶ She had also presented a gold ring as a betrothal gift.

At this point, Tai-an came in with the note from His Honor Chang the Second and the tael of silver and explained that Ch'un-hung had accepted a job as a personal servant in his household, and that he had sent someone to collect his trunk of personal effects and his clothes. Yüeh-niang felt that since Chang the Second now held the post of judicial commissioner she could hardly object to this arrangement, but she refused to accept the proffered silver and duly turned over Ch'un Hung's trunk of belongings.

Before this, Ying Po-chüeh had said to Chang the Second, "P'an Chin-lien, the Fifth Lady in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, is really attractive, is adept at playing the balloon guitar, and, when it comes to the standard repertory of popular songs, backgammon and elephant chess, there is little she has not mastered. In addition, she is literate and knows how to read and write. Because she is still young, she is unable to maintain a chaste widowhood, and she has been so at odds with the First Lady that she has been expelled from the household and is currently residing at Dame Wang's place waiting to be married off."

In response to this, Chang the Second had sent a servant with money in hand to Dame Wang's place, again and again, to size up the situation; but Dame Wang had insisted that, pursuant to the orders of the First Lady, she would refuse to accept anything less than a hundred taels for her. The servant had gone back and forth several times to bargain with her and had raised the offered sum to more than eighty taels, but Dame Wang still refused to give her assent.

Afterwards, when Ch'un-hung entered his household, and Chang the Second learned from him that the woman had engaged in adultery with her son-in-law, and that that was the reason why she had been expelled, he decided that he didn't want her.

"I have a fourteen-year-old son in my household," he told Ying Po-chüeh, "who has not yet reached puberty but is going to school and studying his books. What would I want with a woman like that in my home?"

Li Chiao-erh also told him, "Chin-lien originally poisoned her husband to death so that she could be taken into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. She later had an affair with a page boy and was also responsible for doing to death both the Sixth Lady and her baby son."

As a result, Chang the Second no longer wanted anything to do with her.

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, when Ch'un-mei was sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and the commandant saw that she was naturally:

Both beautiful and clever, and

Her deportment was enticing, he was utterly delighted and not only supplied her with a suite of three rooms to live in but also arranged for a young maidservant to wait upon her.

He slept in her room for three nights in a row. At the third day celebration after her marriage into the household, he had two outfits of clothing tailored for her, rewarded Auntie Hsüeh with five mace of silver on her departure, and purchased another female servant to serve Ch'un-mei. In addition, he formally designated her as the Second Lady in his household. His first wife was blind in one eye, restricted herself to vegetarian fare, devoted herself to reciting the Buddha's name, and:

Did not concern herself with ordinary affairs.⁷

Chou Hsiu also had a concubine named Sun Erh-niang, who had borne him a daughter and resided in quarters on the eastern side of the courtyard, while Ch'un-mei's quarters were on the western side of the courtyard. He entrusted the keys to all the doors in the house to Ch'un-mei and conspicuously bestowed his favor upon her.

One day, she heard from Auntie Hsüeh that P'an Chin-lien had also been expelled from the household and was residing at Dame Wang's place, waiting to be married off.

That evening, Ch'un-mei, wailing and weeping, addressed Chou Hsiu, saying, "My mistress and I kept each other company for many years, and she never so much as raised her voice in anger against me but treated me as though I were her own daughter. I knew that we had to separate but failed to anticipate that she, too, would now be expelled from the household. If you are willing to take her in marriage, the two of us could enjoy happy days together again."

She then went on to elaborate on her attractiveness, saying, "She can perform the lyrics and songs of a multitude of authors and is adept at playing the balloon guitar. She is:

Both quick-witted and elegant,⁸ just as clever as can be. She was born in the year of the dragon and is now only thirty-one years old. If she were to enter your household, I would be happy to cede my place to her and settle for the position of your Third Lady."

By so saying, she succeeded in arousing Chou Hsiu's interest, and he proceeded to dispatch his servants Chang Sheng and Li An to Dame Wang's place with two handkerchiefs and two mace of silver to look her over. Sure enough, they found her to be an exceptionally attractive woman. Dame Wang informed them at the outset that the First Lady from her former household demanded the sum of a hundred taels of silver for her. Chang Sheng and Li An bargained with her for what seemed like half a day and raised their offer to as much as eighty taels, but Dame Wang still refused to accept it. When they reported this to Chou Hsiu, he agreed to put up an additional five taels and sent the two of them back with the silver in hand to continue their bargaining with Dame Wang. Dame Wang, however, persisted in alleging that the First Lady would not settle for anything less than a hundred taels for herself, and that although her fee as the go-between might be negotiable:

Heaven would hardly condone letting her go unrewarded for her pains.

Chang Sheng and Li An had no alternative but to take the silver back with them and report the situation to Chou Hsiu.

He let the matter drop for two days but could not withstand the weeping and wailing of Ch'un-mei, who said to him at night, "If you would only offer a few more taels of silver, for better or for worse, and contrive to marry her so that we can be together again:

I'd be prepared to die if I must."

Dame Wang Craves Wealth and Ignores the Consequences

When Chou Hsiu saw that Ch'un-mei continued to do nothing but weep bitterly, he felt compelled, once again, to direct his senior servant Chou Chung, along with Chang Sheng and Li An, to take the silver in a felt bag and open it up for Dame Wang to see. The sum offered had been increased to a full ninety taels.

But Dame Wang responded more meretriciously than ever, saying, "If I had been willing to let her go for ninety taels, she wouldn't be here now, for Judicial Commissioner Chang the Second would have carried her off in a sedan chair."

This response annoyed Chou Chung, who told Li An to put the silver back in the bag and said, "Though a three-legged toad may be nowhere to be found, a two-legged woman can be found anywhere. This inveterate whore doesn't know who she's dealing with. What reason do you have to mention that official Chang the Second? Do you think my master the commandant is incapable of dealing with you? It is only because that newly married secondary wife of his is constantly pressing him to do so that he wants to marry this woman. What need does he have for her that he should put up all this money?"

"She has forced us to come back and forth two or three times," said Li An. "The lousy old whore! She is repeating herself more and more like a parrot."

So saying, he took hold of Chou Chung and said, "Brother, let's go home and report the situation to His Honor. How do you suppose she would like it if we had a jailer drag her into the yamen and give her a good taste of the squeezers?"

Dame Wang, however, was still looking forward to the profit she expected to make off Ch'en Ching-chi and let them threaten her without saying a word in reply.

Upon returning to his residence, they reported to Commandant Chou Hsiu, saying, "Even though we have raised our offer to ninety taels, she still refuses to accept it."

"In that case," said Chou Hsiu, "tomorrow, we might as well weigh out the sum of a hundred taels and go bring her back here in a sedan chair."

"Master," said Chou Chung, "even if you increase your offer to a hundred taels, Dame Wang will still demand a go-between's fee of an additional five taels. It would be better to drop the matter for a couple of days and then, if she still raises any objections, have her arrested and given a taste of the squeezers. Only then will she be appropriately fearful."

Gentle reader take note: For P'an Chin-lien, as for all of us:

Her place of birth and place of death
were predetermined.⁹

As a direct result of these few words uttered by Chou Chung, Chin-lien would find that:

Though her deeds were done in the past,
Today the chickens would come home to roost.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In this life, although we are not endowed with foreknowledge;
The causes of disaster or good fortune are not to be sought elsewhere.
Good and evil acts inevitably bring their appropriate results;
The only question being whether they come early or come late.

Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment in order to speak of another person.

To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had managed to have Wu Sung sentenced to military exile in Meng-chou, he was befriended by Shih En, the son of the warden of the prison camp. Later, when Shih En was engaged in a struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern, he was wounded by Chiang Men-shen and called on Wu Sung for help, upon which Wu Sung gave Chiang Men-shen a beating. Who could have anticipated that Chiang Men-shen's younger sister Chiang Yü-lan, who was a concubine of Military Director-in-chief Chang of Meng-chou, should collaborate with her husband in framing Wu Sung, subjecting him to a beating, and sentencing him to military exile in the An-p'ing Stockade. Upon reaching Fei-yün P'u, Wu Sung murdered the two guards who were escorting him and then returned to slaughter the entire households, old and young alike, of Military Director-in-chief Chang and Chiang Men-shen.¹⁰

After this, he escaped to the home of Shih En, who gave him a letter of recommendation and a leather case containing a hundred taels of silver and directed him to go to the An-p'ing Stockade and seek the patronage of his friend Liu Kao, the commander of the stockade. Who could have anticipated that, while on his way, he heard that an heir apparent had been designated to reside in the Eastern Palace, and that at the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven on the day of the winter solstice, a general amnesty had been issued to celebrate the occasion. Thus, on receipt of the amnesty, Wu Sung was able to return home to Ch'ing-ho district, where, on submitting his papers at the district yamen, he was allowed to resume his post as police captain.

On returning to his brother's home, he looked up his neighbor Yao the Second, who turned his orphaned niece Ying-erh back over to him. At this time Ying-erh was already eighteen years old, and he took her in to live with him.

Upon making inquiry, he was told, "Hsi-men Ch'ing is already dead, and your sister-in-law has been expelled from his household and is currently residing at Dame Wang's place where she is waiting to be married off."

When Wu Sung heard this:

His old resentment awoke in his heart.

Truly:

Though you wear out shoes of iron without finding what you seek;
In the end you may find it without making any effort whatsoever.¹¹

The next day, he put on his turban, donned his clothes, went straight out the door, and headed to Dame Wang's place. Chin-lien was standing behind the blind that hung over the front door at the time, and when she saw Wu Sung coming, she promptly disappeared into the inner room.

Wu Sung lifted aside the blind and asked, "Is Dame Wang at home?"

Dame Wang, who was engaged in sweeping up the flour by the millstone at the time, promptly came out and asked, "Who is it that is calling for me?"

When she saw that it was Wu Sung, she greeted him with a bow, saying, "Many felicitations," and Wu Sung bowed deferentially in return.

Dame Wang said, "Brother Wu the Second, congratulations! How long have you been home?"

"On being granted an amnesty I have been able to return home," said Wu Sung. "But I only arrived yesterday. I am much indebted to you for looking after my brother's home all this time. I will demonstrate my gratitude to you on another day."

Dame Wang gave him an ingratiating smile, saying, "Brother Wu the Second, you look more impressive than before and have even begun to grow a stubble of beard. Your figure has also filled out attractively, and you have picked up a knowledge of etiquette while away from home."

She then offered him a seat, poured out a serving of tea, and shared it with him.

"There is something I would like to talk to you about," said Wu Sung.

"What might that be, Brother Wu the Second?" asked Dame Wang. "Go ahead and tell me what it is."

"I have heard," responded Wu Sung, "that Hsi-men Ch'ing is already dead, and that my sister-in-law has been expelled from the household and is currently residing here with you. I would venture to ask you to tell my sister-in-law that if she does not intend to remarry, so be it; but that if she does intend to remarry, now that Ying-erh has grown up, I would like to take her as my wife, so she could look after Ying-erh and, early or late, find someone to marry into our family as a son-in-law, so that we can:

Keep the whole household together, and live out our lives, without arousing the derision of others."

Initially, Dame Wang was reluctant to give her assent to this proposal and said, "It is true that she is living here with me, but I don't know whether she plans to remarry or not."

Afterwards, however, on hearing that Wu Sung intended to see that she was amply rewarded, she said, "Permit me to feel her out on the subject."

The woman, who was eavesdropping behind the portiere, heard Wu Sung say that he would like to marry her so she could help him look after Ying-erh. She also noticed that while away from home Wu Sung had grown bigger and taller than ever, had put on weight, and had learned to speak even more effectively than before.

Her former feelings had not altered, and

In her heart she thought to herself,

"This marriage affinity will enable me to end up in his hands after all."

Thereupon, without waiting for Dame Wang to call for her, she came out herself, greeted Wu Sung with a bow, and said, "If you would really like to marry me so I can help you look after Ying-erh, and find a husband for her, that would be splendid."

"But there is another issue," said Dame Wang. "The First Lady of her household is demanding a bride price of a hundred taels of 'snowflake' silver for her."

"Why is she demanding so much?" asked Wu Sung.

"His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing," said Dame Wang, "originally spent enormous sums of money on her; enough to cast a silver figurine of similar dimensions."

"It doesn't matter," said Wu Sung. "Since I would like to take my sister-in-law home with me as my wife, if it costs me as much as a hundred taels, so be it. In addition, I am willing to offer you five taels of silver as a reward for your efforts."

Upon hearing these words, Dame Wang was pleased enough to:

Fart ferociously and pee in her pants, and blurted out the words, "Brother Wu the Second, you have really acquired a knowledge of etiquette from your experiences out on the rivers and lakes the last few years. You've really turned out to be a fine man."

Upon hearing these words, the woman went into the inner room, poured a cup of strong tea flavored with melon seeds, and proffered it to Wu Sung with both hands.

"At present," Dame Wang went on to say, "the mistress of her household is anxious to have her disposed of as soon as possible; and there are also three or four persons of official status who are competing with each other to marry her. But I have refused their offers as insufficient. You had better come up with this money as fast as you can. As the sayings go:

The first one to cook the rice is the first to eat.

A marriage affinity between people a thousand li apart connects them by a single thread.

You wouldn't want her to end up in someone else's hands."

"If you really want to marry me," the woman said, "you must show some urgency about it."

"I'll come to weigh out the silver tomorrow," said Wu Sung, "and invite you to come home with me that evening."

Dame Wang was still somewhat incredulous that Wu Sung had the stipulated amount of money at his disposal but tentatively gave her consent and allowed him to go.

The next day, Wu Sung opened the leather case, took out the hundred taels of silver that Shih En had given him for Stockade Commander Liu Kao, wrapped up an additional five taels worth of loose silver, and went to Dame Wang's place, where he proceeded to weigh it out with a steelyard.

When Dame Wang saw the shiny display of silver that covered the entire tabletop:

From her mouth no word was uttered, but

In her heart she thought to herself,

"Although Ch'en Ching-chi promised me a hundred taels of silver and has gone off to the Eastern Capital to get it, there is no way of knowing when he will return. No matter whether:

Things land right side up or upside down,
it would make no sense to:

Refrain from ringing the bell at hand,

In order to wait for one to be forged."¹²

When she realized that he was also offering her an additional gratuity of five taels, she promptly accepted the money and bowed to him repeatedly, saying, "Brother Wu the Second, you have really acquired a knowledge of etiquette, and: Understand one's vicissitudes."

"Since you have accepted my silver," said Wu Sung, "I would like to invite my sister-in-law to come and cross my threshold today."

"Brother Wu the Second," expostulated Dame Wang, "you're in too much of a hurry. You're the type who:

Lets off fireworks behind the gate:

Unable to wait for evening.

You'll have to wait until I've gone to the First Lady's place and turned over the money before I'll relinquish her to you."

She then went on to say, "Today:

You'd better don shiny new headgear, for Tonight you're going to be a bridegroom."¹³

Wu Sung was unhappy about this, but Dame Wang, just as though she:

Didn't know any better,

continued to banter with him and sent him on his way.

"The First Lady from her household," she thought to herself, "merely told me to dispose of her without settling on a particular amount. Today, I might as well simply give her ten or twenty taels of silver. At the very least, barring any monkey business, I ought to be able to make off with more than half of the asking price for the support of my family."

She consequently chiseled off a piece of silver worth twenty taels and went to Yüeh-niang's place to settle accounts with her.

"Who has agreed to take her in marriage?" asked Yüeh-niang.

Dame Wang responded by saying:

"When the rabbit has done exploring the hill,

It will finally go back to its original hole.

She is being taken in marriage by her former husband's brother, so she will end up by:

Eating congee out of her old pot."

Upon hearing this, all Yüeh-niang could do was stamp her feet in resignation.

As the saying goes:

When two enemies meet each other,

Their eyes are clearer than ever.¹⁴

Later on, Yüeh-niang spoke to Meng Yü-lou about it, saying, "In the future, she is likely to die at the hands of her brother-in-law. He is the sort of man who:

Kills people without batting an eye,¹⁵ and is hardly likely to spare her."

We will say no more for the moment about the way Yüeh-niang gave vent to her concerns back at home.

To resume our story, in the afternoon, after Dame Wang had returned home from turning over the silver, she sent Wang Ch'ao ahead to deliver the woman's trunks and her table to Wu Sung's place. Wu Sung, meanwhile, had already completed his preparations, buying wine and meat and appropriate foodstuffs for the occasion.

That evening, Dame Wang led the woman over to Wu Sung's place. She had abandoned her mourning garments, put a new fret on her hair, dressed herself in red clothing, and wore a veil over her head. As she entered the door, she observed that the parlor was brightly illuminated with lanterns and candles, and that Wu the Elder's spirit tablet was set up in a position of honor at the head of the room. This made her somewhat apprehensive, and she couldn't help feeling as if:

Her hair was being pulled, or

Her flesh was being hooked.¹⁶

When they had come through the door and entered the room, Wu Sung ordered Ying-erh to lock both the front and the back doors.

Upon seeing this, Dame Wang said, "Brother Wu the Second, I've got to go. There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."

"Venerable dame," said Wu Sung. "Please come inside and have a cup of wine."

Wu Sung then told Ying-erh to bring in the food and set it out on the table. In no time at all, the wine was duly heated, and he invited the woman and Dame Wang to help themselves to the wine. Wu Sung himself, however, did not proffer any wine to his two guests, but proceeded to pour himself four or five bowls of wine and drink them down one after the other.

When Dame Wang saw that he was getting himself nastily drunk, she said, "Brother Wu the Second, I've had enough wine. Permit me to go. The two of you can continue to enjoy drinking together."

"Dame Wang," responded Wu Sung, "you can cut out the nonsense. I, Wu the Second, have a score to settle with you."

All they could hear was a swishing sound as he proceeded to whip out from beneath his clothes a two-foot long, fine-edged, thick-bladed dagger, which he gripped firmly by the hilt with one hand, while holding it to her breast with the other.

As he:

Opened wide his weird eyes, and Caused his beard to bristle, he said, "Dame Wang, there is no reason for you to be surprised. It has always been true that:

For every injustice there is a perpetrator;

For every debt there is a creditor.

You had better not pretend to be:

Still asleep in dreamland.

It is you who are responsible for the death of my elder brother."

"Brother Wu the Second," exclaimed Dame Wang, "it's late at night, and you're drunk. This business of:

Brandishing knives and flourishing weapons,

Is not a laughing matter."

"Dame Wang," responded Wu Sung, "you can cut out the nonsense.

Even death itself does not frighten me."¹⁷

Wait until I have finished interrogating this whore, and I will then proceed to question you. Old pig and dog that you are, if you stir by so much as a step, I'll give you five or seven slashes with this blade."

So saying, he turned around to face the woman and reviled her, saying, "Listen to me you whore. Just how did you plot to do my elder brother in? If you:

Report the facts truthfully,¹⁸

I may forgive you."

"Brother-in-law," the woman responded, "why is it that:

The beans are popping in this cold pot?

It doesn't make any sense. The fact is your elder brother died of heart trouble. What does it have to do with me?"

Before she had even finished speaking, Wu Sung drove the point of his dagger into the tabletop with a chopping sound, gripped the woman's hair with his left hand, grabbed her bodice with his right hand, lifted her off the ground, and kicked over the table with one leg, knocking the cups and saucers to the floor, and smashing them to smithereens. The woman did not have the stamina to resist as her assailant lifted her lightly over the table and dragged her into the adjacent room to confront the stand on which his brother's spirit tablet was placed.

When Dame Wang saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, she fled toward the front door but found it to be locked. Wu Sung caught up with her in large strides, doubled her over on the floor, took off the belt around his waist, and tied her four limbs together in front of her in the position known as "The Gibbon Offering Fruit,"¹⁹ so that she was completely immobilized.

Wu Sung Kills His Sister-in-law to Propitiate His Brother

"Captain," she called out, "there is no reason for you to get incensed at me. It is the lady herself who is responsible. I had nothing to do with it."

"Old pig and dog that you are!" ejaculated Wu Sung, "I know all about it. Who else are you trying to shift the blame onto? It was you who suggested to Hsi-men Ch'ing that he get me out of the way by contriving to have me sentenced to military exile. But today, it is I who have managed to return home, while that rascal Hsi-men Ch'ing is nowhere to be seen. If you refuse to speak up, I will first carve up this whore and then proceed to kill you, old pig and dog that you are."

So saying, he picked up his dagger and waved it a couple of times in front of Chin-lien's face.

The woman hastily called out, "Brother-in-law, forgive me. If you will only let me up, I'll tell you what really happened."

Wu Sung responded by jerking the woman to her feet, stripping her stark naked, and then forcing her into a kneeling position in front of the stand that held his brother's spirit tablet.

"You whore!" Wu Sung shouted at her, "You'd better start to talk immediately."

The woman was so frightened it seemed as though:

Her soul was no longer attached to her body,²⁰ and she felt compelled to confess the truth. She told him how, in taking down the bamboo blind over the front door, the forked stick in her hand had fallen onto the head of Hsi-men Ch'ing; how she had made up the burial garments for Dame Wang as part of the scheme to initiate their illicit affair; how Hsi-men Ch'ing had kicked Wu the Elder in the solar plexus and injured his heart; how Dame Wang had persuaded her to obtain arsenic from Hsi-men Ch'ing and administer it to her husband; how she had arranged for him to be cremated; and how she had been taken into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. She gave a full account of what had happened, word for word, from beginning to end.

When Dame Wang heard this, all she could do was to complain bitterly to herself, saying, "What a simpleton you are! Now that you've told him the truth, how will I ever be able to cover up my own complicity?"

Wu Sung, for his part, held the woman down in front of the spirit tablet with one hand, while pouring a libation with the other, and burning some paper money.

"Elder Brother," he said, "hear me, if your departed soul be not too far away. I, Wu the Second, will now undertake to: Avenge your wrong and assuage your resentment."²¹

When the woman saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, she was about to cry out loudly, but Wu Sung plucked up a handful of ashes from the incense burner and stuffed it into her mouth, so that she was unable to utter a sound, and then roughly doubled her over on the floor. The woman struggled so violently that the fret on her hair, and her pins and earrings, rolled off onto the ground.

Wu Sung was afraid that she might succeed in struggling free, so he kicked her in the ribs with his waxed boots and then stamped on her two arms, saying, "You whore! It is said that you're really intelligent, but I don't know what sort of a heart you have, so I'm going to take a look at it."

So saying, he pulled open her bodice with one hand, and then:

The telling is slow, but

What happened was quick;

he took the dagger and cut open her pale and fragrant breast with a single slash, producing a blood-filled cavity from which fresh blood gushed out. As for the woman:

Her starry eyes blinked half open, and her two feet kicked spasmodically. Holding the dagger in his teeth, Wu Sung then pulled open her breast with his two hands and, with a popping sound, tore her living heart and entrails, dripping with blood, out of the cavity, and laid them as a sacrifice before the spirit tablet. After which, with a single swipe of the dagger, he cut off her head, as a result of which:

The flow of blood inundated the ground.²²

On seeing this from one side, Ying-erh, who was still only a young girl, was so frightened all she could do was to cover her face with her hands. It is clear that Wu Sung was truly a ruthless man, and that the woman had suffered a pitiable fate. Truly:

So long as one has three inches of breath,

one uses it a thousand ways;

But when the messenger of death shows up,

everything comes to an end.

She was thirty-one years old at the time of her death. Behold:

On falling into his hands, the springtime of her youth came to an end;

When his dagger fell, the pink-powdered beauty's life was terminated.

Her seven material souls have floated into the distance,

And have arrived at the Sen-lo Palace in the underworld.

Her three ethereal souls have vanished into invisibility,

And have doubtless reached the City of the Unjustly Dead.

Her starry eyes are tightly closed;

Stretched out straight, her body lies on the bare ground.

Her silver teeth are half-clenched;

Dripping with blood, her head lies fallen to one side.

It is just like:

The heavy snowfall of early spring,

Which breaks the golden threads of the willow branches;

Or the wild wind of the twelfth month,

That blows off the jade blossoms of the flowering plum.

As for this woman:

Who knows where her alluring beauty has vanished to;
Or whose home her fragrant soul has been reborn in?²³

A poet of yore has left us a poem lamenting the gruesome nature of Chin-lien's death:

The grievous destiny suffered by Chin-lien was certainly pitiable;
As, stripped of her clothes, she knelt down before the spirit tablet.
How could she have known that Wu Sung would slay her with his dagger,
When she expected him to tie her up as Hsimen did in the Grape Arbor?
Past events tend to inspire sighs of regret,²⁴
though ephemeral as a dream;
The present life is not even worth so much as half of a copper cash.²⁵
In this world, every single life must be repaid with another life;²⁶
Just retribution is clear and inescapable,²⁷ and occurs for all to see.

When Dame Wang saw that Wu Sung had killed the woman, she called out in a loud voice, "A murder has been committed!"

Upon hearing this, Wu Sung stepped forward and cut off her head as well with a single swipe of his dagger, after which he dragged her corpse to one side. He then took Chin-lien's heart and entrails and pinned them up with his dagger under the eaves at the back of the house. By then, it was the first watch of the night, and he proceeded to lock Ying-erh into the room.

"Uncle," complained Ying-erh, "I'm frightened."

"My child," Wu Sung responded, "there is nothing I can do for you under the circumstances."

Wu Sung then vaulted over the wall into Dame Wang's house next door, intending to kill her son Wang Ch'ao; but it turned out that Wang Ch'ao was not fated to die at this juncture. Upon hearing his mother's cry, he realized that Wu Sung was bent on wreaking havoc and tried unsuccessfully to open both the front and back doors. In a state of consternation, he ran out onto the street to find the head of the local mutual security unit. The neighbors to either side knew full well how violent and ruthless Wu Sung was, and none of them ventured to come forward.

When Wu Sung had vaulted over the wall and entered Dame Wang's house, he saw that, though the lanterns were lighted, nobody was present. He then proceeded to open Dame Wang's trunks and scatter her clothing all over the floor. Of the hundred taels of silver he had paid her, she had turned over only twenty taels to Yüeh-niang, so there were eighty-five taels left over, together with a number of hairpins, earrings, and other head ornaments. Wu Sung wrapped all these things up into a bundle, picked up his sword, vaulted over the back wall, and waited until the fifth watch, when he was able to slip out through the city gate and head toward Shih-tzu P'o, where he hid out in the inn operated by Chang Ch'ing and his wife. He subsequently disguised himself as a Buddhist ascetic and went to join the band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh.²⁸ Truly:

If you do nothing in your lifetime to make people raise their eyebrows;
There should be no one in the world prepared to gnash his teeth at you.

THE STORY GOES that after Wu Sung had killed the woman and Dame Wang and taken their valuables, he went to join the band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh.

To resume our story, after Wang Ch'ao ran out onto the street to look for the head of the local mutual security unit, he noticed that both the front and rear doors to Wu Sung's house were locked, and that the valuables had been taken from Dame Wang's house and the clothing scattered:

Higgledy-piggledy, all over the floor. Upon realizing that Wu Sung had killed both women and made off with their valuables, he felt compelled to break open both the front and rear doors, only to find their two corpses dripping with blood where they lay on the floor, Chin-lien's heart and entrails pinned up with a dagger under the eaves at the back of the house, and Ying-erh locked up inside the room. When he asked her what had happened, all she could do was to weep bitterly.

The next day, at the early session of the court, he submitted a report to the district magistrate and laid the dagger that had been used as the murder weapon before him. The newly appointed district magistrate was named Li Ch'ang-ch'i and was a native of Tsao-ch'iang district in Chen-ting prefecture of Hopei province. On hearing that it was a case of homicide, he promptly deputed the docket officer on duty to round up the neighbors, the head of the local mutual security unit, and the family members of the victims, Wang Ch'ao and Ying-erh, so that the corpses could be carried out into the street for all to see while a formal inquest was performed as the law required. It was determined that the two victims, P'an Chin-lien and Dame Wang, had been murdered by Wu Sung in a fit of drunken rage, and this tentative conclusion was:

Duly drawn up as a file on the case.⁴

The local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit were ordered to arrange for the temporary interment of the two bodies and to keep watch over them. Public placards describing the fugitive were hung up announcing that officers were being deputed to pursue the culprit Wu Sung in all directions, and that a reward of fifty taels of silver was being offered by the authorities for anyone who could provide evidence of his whereabouts.

Meanwhile, Chang Sheng and Li An from Commandant Chou Hsiu's residence showed up at Dame Wang's place with a hundred taels of silver, only to find that Dame Wang and the woman had both been murdered by Wu Sung, and that the district yamen had sent people to perform an inquest on the corpses and apprehend the murderer. The two of them then returned and reported this at the commandant's residence. When Ch'un-mei learned that Chin-lien was dead, she did nothing but weep for two or three days and refused to partake of either tea or food. This threw Commandant Chou Hsiu into such a state of consternation that he sent someone out onto the street to hire an itinerant acrobat to come in and entertain her, but her sorrow was not assuaged. He also dispatched Chang Sheng and Li An every day to find out if the culprit Wu Sung had been apprehended and report back to him. But no more of this. Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment.

To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi had started out for the Eastern Capital in order to get the money needed to ransom Chin-lien, with whom he had set his heart on becoming man and wife. Who could have anticipated that when he was halfway there, he should run into his family's servant Ch'en Ting, who had set out from the Eastern Capital to tell him that his father was in a parlous state of health.

"My mistress sent me to ask you to come home," he said, "so she can turn over to you the responsibility for the future of the household."

No sooner did Ch'en Ching-chi hear these words than he set out faster than ever:

Covering two stages in the time for one, and duly arrived, one day, at the house of his father's brother-in-law, Chang Shih-lien, in the Eastern Capital.

Chang Shih-lien had already died, so only his aunt was there, and he learned that his father, Ch'en Hung, had passed away about three days earlier, so the whole household was wearing mourning garb. Ch'en Ching-chi paid his respects before his father's spirit tablet and kowtowed to his mother, née Chang, and his aunt, née Ch'en, the elder sister of Ch'en Hung. His mother saw that he had already reached manhood, and the two of them, mother and son, wept together and then consulted with each other about the situation.

"Right now," his mother said:

"On the one hand, there is reason to be happy,

While on the other, there is reason to be sad."⁵

Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "What reason is there to be happy, and what reason is there to be sad?"

"The reason to be happy," his mother responded, "is that the Emperor has designated an heir apparent to reside in the Eastern Palace, and that at the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven on the day of the winter solstice a general amnesty has been issued to celebrate the occasion. The reason to be sad is that your father has taken ill and died unexpectedly, your uncle has also died, and your aunt is maintaining her widowhood. Under the circumstances, for us to remain living here:

Is not a long-term solution.

That is why I sent Ch'en Ting to summon you. If we can arrange together to take your father's coffin back to his native place for burial, it would be a good thing."

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard these words:

In his heart he thought to himself,

"If I should have to be responsible for preparing the coffin, and loading the bulky belongings of our family and its dependents into carts for the journey, it is bound, at the very least, to hold me up for a considerable period of time and cause me to miss out on this opportunity to marry Sister Six. It would be better for me, thus and so, to propose setting out for home immediately with two carts loaded with trunks of valuables. It would not be too late for me then to come back and take care of my father's coffin after marrying Sister Six."

He then said to his mother, "At present, the roads are beset with bandits and are hazardous to travel. If we were all to set out together, with my father's coffin and our trunkloads of bulky household belongings loaded onto any number of carts and beasts of burden, it would be difficult to avoid arousing attention; and if we were to encounter a bunch of brigands along the way, what would we do?

It is better to be late than to be sorry.

I ought to set out for home right now with two carts loaded with trunks of valuables, and take care of getting the house in shape. You and Ch'en Ting, along with the other household dependents, can then accompany father's coffin, and return home during the first month, after the New Year's Festival is over. It will not be too late then to deposit the coffin in a temple outside the city walls, arrange a funeral ceremony and scripture recitation, and see that it is properly entombed."

His mother, being the woman that she was, though she ought not to have done so, allowed herself to be persuaded by Ch'en Ching-chi's artful arguments; set out to pack two trunks with valuables; and loaded them onto two large carts that bore banners identifying them as pilgrimage vehicles. He departed from the Eastern Capital on the tenth day of the twelfth month and arrived not many days later at the gate of the family home in the Ch'ing-ho district of Shantung province.

Upon his arrival, he told his maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, "My father is already dead, and my mother is going to accompany the cart with his bier and should arrive sometime in the near future. I have brought two cartloads of belongings with me and have come ahead to take care of getting the house in shape and sweeping it out prior to her arrival."

When his maternal uncle heard this, he said, "In that case, I had better move out and return to my own home."

He then, forthwith, told his servants to move his belongings and vacated the premises.

Upon seeing his maternal uncle move out, Ch'en Ching-chi was utterly delighted and said to himself:

"At long last my enemy has been removed from my sight, which will enable me to marry Sister Six and enjoy her here at home to my heart's content. Since my father is already dead, and my mother dotes on me, I can first divorce that whore of mine, and then lodge a formal complaint against my mother-in-law and have her haled into court in order to recover the things that my family originally entrusted to her. Under the circumstances, she is no longer in a position to say no to this demand, since the members of my family are no longer threatened with military exile."

Truly:

Though men may plan to do thus and so:

Heaven's principles may yet deny them.

Ch'en Ching-chi, as soon as he had succeeded in getting his maternal uncle to move out, put a hundred taels of silver into the wallet at his waist, and another ten taels into his sleeve as a gratuity for Dame Wang, and proceeded to make his way to the door of her house on Amethyst Street.

Strange as it may seem, what should he see but the temporary tombs of two corpses buried on the side of the street in front of her door, with a pair of spears crisscrossed above them, and a lantern suspended from them. On the door there hung a handwritten placard that read as follows:

Notice concerning a case of murder posted by the district yamen. The culprit, Wu Sung, has murdered the woman née P'an and Dame Wang. Anyone who is able to apprehend him, or provide information to the authorities, will be rewarded with fifty taels of silver.

Ch'en Ching-chi raised his head and gazed at it for some time.

What should he see at this juncture but two men who emerged from a temporary shelter and shouted at him, "Who are you? And why are you gazing at that placard? At present, the real culprit has not been apprehended. Who are you anyway?"

The two of them advanced toward him in large strides as though they wished to take him into custody. Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into such consternation by this that he fled from the scene as fast as he could go.

As he was passing by the tavern below the stone bridge on Lion Street, he ran into someone wearing a flat-topped cap and a black jacket, who came up behind him from under the bridge and said, "Brother, you're really foolhardy. What were you staring at back there for no good reason?"

When Ch'en Ching-chi turned his head to look at him, he saw that it was an old friend of his named Yang the Elder, nicknamed the Iron Fingernail.

After the two of them had exchanged greetings, Yang the Elder said, "Brother, I haven't seen you for some time. Where have you been?"

Ch'en Ching-chi told him all about his trip to the Eastern Capital and his father's death and then said, "That woman who was slain recently was a concubine of my father-in-law's, whose maiden name was P'an. I didn't know that she had been murdered. It was only on reading that placard just now that I found out about it."

"It was her brother-in-law Wu Sung who did it," explained Yang the Elder. "He had been serving a term in military exile but was able to return home as the result of a general amnesty. I don't know why he murdered the woman and also refused to let Dame Wang off. He has a young niece who was supported for the last three or four years by my maternal Uncle Yao the Second. The other day, when her uncle committed those murders and disappeared, who knows where, my uncle recovered the girl from the district yamen, and he is planning to look for someone he can marry her to. Right now, those two corpses have been buried in their temporary graves for some time and are a source of distress to the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, who don't know on what day, month, and year the culprit Wu Sung will be arrested."

When he had finished speaking, Yang the Elder invited Ch'en Ching-chi to join him for a drink in the tavern, saying, "It will serve to brush off the dust from your journey."

Ch'en Ching-chi was so distressed at heart by the death of the woman that he was unable to enjoy the wine, and after drinking a mere three cups or so, he got up, went downstairs, said good-bye, and returned home.

That evening, he bought a hundred sheets of paper money and made his way to a spot by the stone bridge, some distance from Dame Wang's house on Amethyst Street, and addressed the woman, saying, "Sister Six, née P'an, I, your younger brother Ch'en Ching-chi, am burning a hundred sheets of paper money on your behalf today. It is all because I arrived back a step too late that you forfeited your life."

Ch'en Ching-chi Moved by the Past Sacrifices to Chin-lien

While alive you were a human being;

Once dead you have become a spirit.⁶

Allow me to assure you that I will apprehend your enemy Wu Sung in order to:

Avenge your wrong and assuage your resentment.

Only when I see him dismembered on the execution ground will my aspirations of a lifetime be fulfilled."

When he had finished speaking, he wept and then burned the paper money on her behalf.

Upon returning home, Ch'en Ching-chi shut the door, entered his bedroom, and went to bed, whereupon:

Seemingly asleep yet not asleep,

Chin-lien appeared to him in a dream, dressed all in white, with her entire body covered with blood, and wept before him, saying, "My brother, I died a gruesome death. I had hoped that I would be able to spend the rest of my life with you, but unexpectedly you failed to show up, and I was murdered by that rascal Wu Sung. At present, the Underworld will not admit me, so that, by day, I can only:

Drift aimlessly about;⁷

and, by night, I have to scrounge around everywhere in search of offerings made to the deceased. Just now, I received the hundred sheets of paper money that you burned for me, but that enemy of mine has not yet been apprehended, and my corpse is lying in a temporary grave on the street. If you are still moved by our old feelings for each other, you might buy a coffin, put my corpse into it, and see that I am properly buried, so that I will not have to lie there exposed for days on end.”

Ch'en Ching-chi wept on hearing this and said, “My sister, needless to say, I would like to see you properly buried. But I am afraid that my mother-in-law, that bitch who is utterly devoid of benevolence or righteousness from the Hsi-men Ch'ing household, who has it in for me, would seize upon this pretext to do me harm. Sister, what you ought to do is go to the residence of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and ask Ch'un-mei to see if she can take care of having you properly buried.”

“I have just been to the commandant's residence,” the woman said, “but:

The Gate God and the Portal Sentinel,⁸ blocked my way and would not let me in. I will have to go back and plead with them again however long it may take.”

Ch'en Ching-chi wept on hearing this and reached out to take hold of her and discuss the problem further when he was assailed by the stench of blood from her body as she extricated herself from his grasp and disappeared. It turned out to be but:

A dream of the Southern Branch.

As he lay awake on his pillow he heard the watchman's drum sound the second period of the third watch and said to himself, “How uncanny! Just now, I clearly saw Sister Six in a dream. She shared her innermost feelings with me and asked me to take care of giving her a proper burial; but we don't know:

On what day of what year,⁹

Wu Sung will be apprehended. It's really distressing.”

Truly:

Beset by limitless sorrow, communicated in a dream;
He sits alone in an empty room, weeping until dawn.

We will say no more for the moment about how Ch'en Ching-chi sought for information about the whereabouts of Wu Sung.

To resume our story, the authorities in the district yamen spent more than two months trying to locate and arrest Wu Sung but failed to apprehend him. Only then did they learn that he had fled to join the band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh. When the local constable, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, and the neighbors reported this to the authorities, it was decided that it would be appropriate to empower the relatives of the deceased to remove their bodies for burial. Dame Wang's corpse was duly taken away and buried by her son Wang Ch'ao; but there was no one to take charge of P'an Chin-lien's cadaver.

To resume our story, in the meantime, Ch'un-mei in Commandant Chou Hsiu's residence had been sending Chang Sheng and Li An to the district yamen every two or three days to find out if there was any news about the situation; and they had been reporting back that the culprit had not yet been apprehended, that the bodies of the victims were still temporarily interred under the surveillance of the local constable, and that under the circumstances no one would dare to remove them. This situation continued until some time in the first ten days of the first month of the following year.

Unexpectedly, one evening, Ch'un-mei had a dream in which Chin-lien appeared to her:

In an illusory and hallucinatory manner;¹⁰
With her cloud-shaped chignon disheveled,
And her entire figure covered with blood;

and called out to her, saying, “Young lady P'ang, my good sister, I died a gruesome death. I have been unable to come and see you, having been prevented by the Gate Gods who shouted so fiercely at me that I did not dare try to come in. At present, my nemesis Wu Sung has managed to escape, and my corpse has been exposed in the street for a long time:

Blown by the wind, drenched by the rain,¹¹
And stepped on by the chickens and dogs, with no one to bury it. Since I am without any relatives to look to, if you can remember our former feelings for each other, like those between mother and daughter, bring yourself to purchase a coffin for me, and see to my burial:

Although I will be dead in the Underworld,
I will be able to close my mouth and eyes.”

When she had finished speaking, she wept unceasingly. Ch'un-mei attempted to take hold of her, wishing to question her further, but she extricated herself from her grasp and disappeared, leaving Ch'un-mei to wake up and find that it was merely:

A dream of the Southern Branch.

Upon wakening from her dream in tears, she was:

Hesitant and uncertain what to do.¹²

The next day, she called in Chang Sheng and Li An and directed them, saying, “The two of you go to the front of the district yamen and see whether the corpses of that woman and Dame Wang are still buried there, or not.”

Chang Sheng and Li An accepted her instructions and set off on their errand.

Before long, they returned and reported, “The perpetrator of their murders is still at large. It is not convenient for the local officials to continue keeping watch over the corpses any longer, so they have empowered the relatives of the victims to remove their corpses and bury them. The corpse of Dame Wang has been removed by her son, but no one has come forward to take charge of the other woman's corpse, which is still buried there on the street.”

Ch'un-mei said to them, "In that case, there is something I would like to ask the two of you to do for me, for which I will see that you are amply rewarded."

The two of them knelt down and said, "Mistress, how can you say such a thing? If you are willing to put in a good word for us with the master, that will be more than sufficient."

Though we should have to go through fire and water, we would not refuse your request."

Ch'un-mei went into her room and came out with ten taels of silver and two bolts of muslin, which she turned over to the two of them, saying, "This murdered woman is actually a sister of mine, who married into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household but has been murdered upon leaving it. I would like the two of you, without informing the master, to take this silver, purchase a coffin with it, see that her corpse is encoffined, and then carry it outside the city and take care of burying it properly in some convenient spot. If you do so, I will see that you are amply rewarded."

The two of them responded, "That's no problem. We will do what you ask."

But Li An said, "I'm only afraid that the authorities in the district yamen will not let the two of us remove the corpse. It would be preferable if we could give them a note from the master authorizing our request."

Chang Sheng responded, "If we simply tell them that our mistress is a younger sister of the deceased who married into the Hsi-men household, the authorities in the yamen will not dare not to comply with our request. What need is there for a note?"

Thereupon, they took the silver and retired to the duty room, where Chang Sheng said to Li An, "I imagine that this murdered woman and our mistress must have lived together in the Hsi-men household and become intimate with one another. Otherwise, why should our mistress go to such pains on her behalf? I remember that when our mistress heard that this woman was dead, she did nothing but weep for two or three days and refused to eat, which disturbed our master to such an extent that he sent someone out onto the street to hire an itinerant acrobat to come in and try to entertain her, but her sorrow remained unassuaged. So, today, when there are no relatives to take possession of her corpse, how could our mistress fail to take care of having it decently buried? If we are able to carry this task out successfully, she is bound, sooner or later, to speak to the master on our behalf. Which means she will turn out to be our lucky star. At present, the master pays heed to everything she says and is:

Obedient to her every whim, while our First Mistress and Second Mistress have had to take a back seat."

When they had finished speaking, the two of them took the silver they had been provided with, went to the district yamen, and submitted a formal request that they be authorized to remove the corpse, explaining that their mistress, a member of His Honor Chou Hsiu's household, was the younger sister of the deceased and had entrusted them with this task. They then spent six taels of silver on the construction of a coffin, disinterred the woman's cadaver, replaced her heart and entrails in her abdominal cavity, employed thread to reattach her head to her body, wrapped the corpse in a shroud, and placed it in the coffin.

Chang Sheng then said, "We might as well take her out to be buried at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, our master's family temple outside the South Gate, where there are empty grounds available, and then report back to our mistress."

They then hired two men to carry the coffin out to the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where they explained to the abbot, Tao-chien, that the corpse was that of a relative of their mistress. The abbot, who did not dare to be remiss, chose a spot for the burial behind the temple, under a hollow-trunked white poplar tree.

Once the burial was completed, they returned home and reported to Ch'un-mei, saying, "There are still four taels of silver left over after buying a coffin and placing her corpse in the casket, which we hereby return to you."

"I have put the two of you to a lot of trouble," responded Ch'un-mei. "You should give two of the four remaining taels to Abbot Tao-chien, and ask him to arrange for the recitation of Buddhist sutras and litanies of repentance in order to ensure her rebirth in Heaven."

She then presented them with a large flagon of wine, a leg of pork, and a leg of lamb and said, "As for these two remaining taels of silver, each of you should take one of them home with you to help with your household expenses."

The two of them knelt down before her and refused to accept what she had offered, saying, "Mistress, if you will only put in a good word for us with the master, we will be more than adequately compensated. How could we accept payment in silver for such a meager accomplishment?"

"If I offer you a reward and you refuse to accept it," said Ch'un-mei, "you will only make me angry."

The two of them, consequently, felt obliged to kowtow to her and accept what she had offered before leaving her presence. As they drank the wine they had been given in the duty room, they expressed great appreciation for their young mistress.

The next day, Chang Sheng went to deliver the silver to Abbot Tao-chien and arrange for the scripture recitations. Ch'un-mei also spent five mace of silver to purchase paper money to burn on Chin-lien's behalf. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Ch'en Ting had conducted the coffin of Ch'en Ching-chi's deceased father, Ch'en Hung, and his dependents from the Eastern Capital to the outskirts of Ch'ing-ho district, where they proceeded to store the coffin temporarily in the Temple of Eternal Felicity until they could make the arrangements for scripture recitations, funeral rites, and the burial ceremony.

When Ch'en Ching-chi, who was living in the family home, heard that his mother, née Chang, their servants, and the carts with their belongings had arrived, and that his father's coffin had been placed in storage at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city, he proceeded to bring in the luggage, before kowtowing to his mother.

His mother was annoyed and asked him, "Why did you not come to meet me?"

Ch'en Ching-chi merely replied that he was depressed, on the one hand, and that there was no one to look after the place.

His mother then asked, "Why is your uncle not to be seen?"

To which he replied, "On hearing that you were coming home, he promptly moved out and returned to his own place."

"You should have told your uncle to stay a while," his mother said. "What need was there for him to move out so fast?"

Soon thereafter, his uncle, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, came to see his elder sister, and the two of them:

Embraced each other by the neck and wept.¹³

Wine was served and they proceeded to chat together, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

The next day, his mother sent Ch'en Ching-chi to deliver five taels of silver and several packets of paper money to Abbot Tao-chien at the temple outside the city gate, so he could arrange a scripture recitation on behalf of his deceased father. As he was riding his donkey along the street, he ran into two friends of his named Lu the Second and Yang the Elder and dismounted in order to greet them.

"Brother, where are you going?" the two of them asked.

Ch'en Ching-chi explained his errand, saying, "My deceased father's coffin is in temporary storage at a temple outside the city gate. Tomorrow, the twentieth, is the time for the final weekly commemoration of his death, and my mother has sent me to deliver some silver to the abbot so he can arrange for a funeral ceremony and scripture recitation on his behalf."

"The two of us did not know that your father's coffin had arrived," they responded. "We have been remiss in offering our condolences."

They then went on to ask, "When will the funeral procession and the burial ceremony take place?"

"They will take place in another day or two," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "After the scripture recitation has been held, he will be put to rest in the grave."

When they had finished their conversation, the two of them raised their hands in a gesture of farewell and started to leave, but Ch'en Ching-chi called them back and asked Yang the Elder, "How is it that the cadaver of my father-in-law's concubine, née P'an, that was temporarily interred in front of the district yamen is no longer to be seen? Who has taken it away?"

"About a fortnight ago," said Yang the Elder, "because the local authorities had not been able to apprehend Wu Sung, they petitioned the district magistrate to allow the relatives of the deceased to take their corpses away for burial. Dame Wang's cadaver was taken away by her son, but the body of the other woman was left where it was for another three or four days. In the end, someone from the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command purchased a coffin and sent people to carry the bier outside the city and bury it on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity."

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he realized that it must have been Ch'un-mei, who was now a member of the commandant's household, who had arranged for the burial of the body.

He then turned to Lu the Second and asked, "How many Temples of Eternal Felicity are there outside the city wall?"

"There is only the one Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate," replied Lu the Second. "It is the family temple of His Honor Chou Hsiu. How could there be more than one temple of that name?"

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he was secretly pleased and thought to himself, "So it's the same Temple of Eternal Felicity after all."

This coincidence was fated to occur.

It is fantastic that Sister Six is also buried there."

He then took leave of his two friends, whipped up his donkey, and made his way outside the city straight to the Temple of Eternal Felicity.

On meeting Abbot Tao-chien, he did not mention the scripture recitation for his father but asked the abbot, "Where is the grave of the woman from Commandant Chou Hsiu's household that was buried here recently?"

"It is underneath the white poplar tree behind the temple," the abbot replied. "They said that it was the body of the elder sister of the young mistress from the commandant's household."

Ch'en Ching-chi did not even bother to go look at his father's coffin but went first to P'an Chin-lien's grave with his paper money and sacrificial offerings.

After presenting the offerings and burning the paper money, he wept, saying, "Sister Six, your younger brother Ch'en Ching-chi has respectfully burned a packet of paper money on your behalf. May you:

Find an appropriate place in which to live;

And use the cash to cope with any problems."¹⁴

Only after he had finished sacrificing to her did he proceed to the abbot's quarters in order to burn paper money before his father's coffin and offer a sacrifice to him. He then presented the abbot with the money to pay for a scripture recitation and asked him to arrange for eight Buddhist monks to hold a scripture reading on the twentieth to mark the final weekly commemoration of his father's death. The abbot accepted the money offered for the scripture recitation and provided him with a vegetarian repast, after which Ch'en Ching-chi returned home to report to his mother.

On the twentieth, they all went to the temple to burn incense and select an auspicious day for the funeral procession. Later on, after his father's coffin had been transported to their ancestral graveyard and properly buried, they returned home, where mother and son continued to live together. But no more of this.

To resume our story, one day during the first ten days of the second month, when the weather was mild, Wu Yüeh-niang, together with Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Hsiao-yü, made their way out to the front gate in order to observe the coming and going of the carts and horses, and enjoy:

The liveliness of the teeming crowds.¹⁵

While there, they happened to observe a throng of men and women following in the wake of a Buddhist monk, who had an imposingly corpulent figure, wore bronze effigies of three Buddhas on his head, and bore a number of lantern trees on his body.

The sleeves of his apricot-yellow gown ruffled in the wind;

While the ankles of his naked feet were immersed in the mire.

He claimed to be an itinerant monk who had been ordained at Mount Wu-t'ai¹⁶ and had arrived here in the course of his wanderings in the endeavor to raise money and supplies for the erection of a Buddhist sanctuary there. An author of olden times has bequeathed us a few lines describing the virtues of such itinerant monks.

Assuming the lotus position to practice meditation,

Explaining the scriptures and expounding the Dharma,¹⁷
Raising their brows and blinking their eyes,
They struggle to attain the truth of the patriarchs.¹⁸
Relying on their religion to seek sustenance,
They propound the regulations of the Buddhist faith.
By day, they only sport their placards and rattle their bells;
At night, they manipulate their spears and flaunt their clubs.
Sometimes, they kowtow with their bald heads outside the gate;
When hungry, they give themselves loud
slaps along the street.
Reality is vacuity, vacuity is reality;
But who has ever seen living beings escape the mundane world?
They may go and come, and come and go;¹⁹
But who have they managed to escort to the Western Paradise?

When the monk saw Wu Yüeh-niang and the other women gathered at the gate, he came forward and saluted them in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "You venerable lay bodhisattva-like benefactors, though you may inhabit:

Vast courtyards and secluded mansions, are all predestined to be present at the Dragon Flower Assembly.²⁰ I have come down from Mount Wu-t'ai in the hope of cementing our virtuous affinity by soliciting the funds to erect a temple to the Ten Kings of the Underworld and a sanctuary dedicated to the Three Jewels, The Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. The success of this effort is dependent upon the willingness of you bodhisattvas, and others of:

The patrons in the ten directions,
to:

Widely sow your fields of fortune,²¹
so that by disbursing your wealth you can:

Together achieve a major endeavor, and thus ensure:

A just reward in the life to come.
This humble monk is merely an intermediary."

Upon listening to his appeal, Yüeh-niang turned to Hsiao-yü and directed her to fetch a monk's hat, a pair of monk's sandals, a string of copper cash, and a peck of white rice from her room. It so happens that Yüeh-niang had always been given to:

Almsgiving, or providing vegetarian meals for monks,

so that during her leisure hours she devoted herself to making monk's hats and monk's sandals in order to give to them.

When Hsiao-yü brought these things out, Yüeh-niang said to her, "You go ask His Reverence to come forward, and bestow these things upon him."

Hsiao-yü, thereupon:

Deliberately adopting an arrogant air,²² called out in a loud voice, saying, "You shaven-pated donkey of a monk, why haven't you come over here? My mistress is bestowing all these things on you, and you haven't even kowtowed in response."

Yüeh-niang rebuked her, saying, "You crazy, depraved little stinker! He is a monk, and a devoted Buddhist.

As though you didn't know any better, how can you bring yourself to abuse him that way? It's really outrageous. Little whore that you are, there's no telling how much evil karma you will have accumulated before you're through."

Hsiao-yü laughed at this and responded, "Mistress, as for this lousy monk, why is it that when I called him over, he devoted himself to:

Looking me over from top to bottom, with those furtive eyes of his?"

The monk, for his part, accepted the sandals, hat, cash, and rice with both hands, saluted Yüeh-niang in the Buddhist fashion, and said, "Many thanks for your largess, you venerable bodhisattva of a benefactor."

"This shaven-pated rascal is really discourteous?" remarked Hsiao-yü. "All of us are standing here, but he has only offered us two salutations. Why has he not offered one to me?"

"You little piece," said Yüeh-niang. "How can you:

Scramble black and white, so blatantly? He is a son of the Buddha, and you are not worthy of receiving his salutation."

"Mistress," responded Hsiao-yü, "If he is a son of the Buddha, who are the Buddha's daughters?"

"I imagine," said Yüeh-niang, "that it is ordained nuns who are the daughters of the Buddha."

"If you say that people like Nun Hsüeh, Nun Wang, and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery are all daughters of the Buddha," continued Hsiao-yü, "who are the sons-in-law of the Buddha?"

Yüeh-niang could not help laughing at this and reproved her, saying, "You lousy little whore! You've developed such an:

Oily mouth and a slippery tongue, that you constantly resort to vulgarity."

"Mistress," responded Hsiao-yü, "you're only directing your criticism at me, but this shaven-pated monk, with his:

Thievish looks and prying eyes, has been constantly ogling me."

"The fact that he looks at you that way," said Meng Yü-lou, "must be because he recognizes you as a candidate for salvation."

"If he really wants to save me," responded Hsiao-yü, "I'm willing to go along with him."

The gathering of womenfolk couldn't help laughing over this, but Yüeh-niang reproved her in a loud voice, saying, "You little whore! It seems that all you can do is persist in:

Blaspheming monks and profaning Buddhas."²³

Meanwhile, the monk in question accepted the donations and proceeded nonchalantly on his way with the bronze effigies of three Buddhas on his head.

"Mistress," complained Hsiao-yü, "though you rebuked me for cursing him, as you saw yourself, that lousy shaven-pated rascal gave me another indecent look as he departed."

There is a poem that describes Yüeh-niang's proclivity to:

Cultivate her virtue by charity to monks.

Maintaining my widowhood and reading the sutras
the years and months flow by;
Private dissipation and meaningless indulgence have long been anathema to me.
My person is just like the moon near the edge of the horizon;
That will not let itself be intruded upon by floating clouds.

As Yüeh-niang and the others continued their conversation by the gate, they suddenly observed that Auntie Hsüeh was passing by on the street with her box of trinkets in hand.

When she saw Yüeh-niang and the others she bowed to them, and Yüeh-niang asked, "Where are you headed? And why have we not seen so much as your shadow around here recently?"

"I hardly know what it is that keeps me so busy all day," said Auntie Hsüeh. During the last few days, the family of His Honor Judicial Commissioner Chang Mao-te who lives on Main Street has contracted a marriage between his son and the niece of Eunuch Director Hsü from the northern quarter, a match that was proposed by myself and Auntie Wen. Yesterday, as part of the 'third-day celebration,' they put on a lavish party, which kept me so busy that even though the young lady from your place who is now the mistress of Commandant Chou Hsiu's household sent for me, I was unable to go. Who knows how irritated with me she may be?"

"So where are you headed right now?" Yüeh-niang asked.

"There is something that I have respectfully come to tell you about," said Auntie Hsüeh.

"If there is something you want to communicate," said Yüeh-niang, "come inside and tell me about it."

So saying, she ushered Auntie Hsüeh back to the master suite in the rear compound and offered her a seat.

When they had consumed a serving of tea, Auntie Hsüeh said, "Venerable lady, you may not know about it, but last year in the Eastern Capital your son-in-law's father Ch'en Hung fell ill and died, and his wife called upon your son-in-law to come and help bring their dependents and his coffin home. They arrived here during the first month, and the scripture recitation, funeral procession, and burial ceremony have already taken place. I had assumed that you knew about all this, but if so, why did you not go burn some paper money on his behalf, or visit with your relatives?"

"If you had not come to tell us about it, how could we have known?" said Yüeh-niang. No one bothered to inform us. All we heard was that P'an Chin-lien had been murdered by her brother-in-law and was buried, along with Dame Wang, in a temporary grave. And we don't even know what her situation may be at present."

Auntie Hsüeh opined, "It has always been true that for P'an Chin-lien, as for all of us:

Her place of birth and place of death were predetermined.

If the Fifth Lady's conduct had not caused her to be expelled from the household, everything would have been all right. But, for no good reason, since she:

Was not the sort to abide by her lot, she chose to engage in an ugly affair, and got herself expelled. If she had remained in the household, how would her brother-in-law have been able to murder her? After all:

For every injustice there is a perpetrator;

For every debt there is a creditor.

It is thanks to the young lady from your household, Ch'un-mei, who couldn't get over her intimate feelings for her former mistress, that someone was sent to purchase a coffin, take possession of her corpse, and give it a proper burial. Otherwise, it would still be exposed to the public gaze in the street. Her brother-in-law has not been apprehended, and there was nobody else concerned about her fate."

Sun Hsüeh-o interrupted from the sidelines, saying, "It hasn't been long since Ch'un-mei was sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu. How could her status have risen so quickly to the point that she was able to dispense the silver needed to buy a coffin for her? How could the commandant help being annoyed with her? Who does she think she is, anyway?"

"Ai-ya!" responded Auntie Hsüeh. "You may not know it, but the commandant has really become attached to her. He spends every night in her quarters.

She has but to say one thing,

And he will comply with ten.

No sooner did he take her into his household than he noticed how attractive and intelligent she was, provided her with a suite of three rooms on the western side of the courtyard, assigned a maid to wait upon her, and spent three successive nights in her room. He had outfits of clothing for the four seasons tailored for her and allowed her to put her hair up like a regular lady. At the party on the 'third-day celebration' he rewarded me with a tael of silver and a bolt of satin. His first wife is forty-nine years old, is blind in both eyes, restricts herself to vegetarian fare, and does not concern herself with household affairs. His concubine Sun Erh-niang resides on the eastern side of the courtyard and has borne him a daughter. Although she is theoretically in charge of the household, she has her hands full looking after her daughter. As a result, the keys to all the storerooms in the house, both large and small, have been entrusted to Ch'un-mei. The commandant responds favorably to every request she has to make. So how can you say that she would be unable to disburse such a sum of silver?"

With these few words she managed to reduce both Yüeh-niang and Sun Hsüeh-o to silence.

After sitting a while longer, Auntie Hsüeh got up to go, and Yüeh-niang said to her, "If you are willing to come back tomorrow, I will prepare an offertory table, a bolt of fabric, and a packet of paper money for the use of the dead, and impose upon you to escort Hsi-men Ta-chieh to her father-in-law's tomb in order to burn the paper money on his behalf."

"Are you not going to go yourself?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.

"Just tell them I have been feeling out of sorts," said Yüeh-niang, "and that I will pay a visit to them on another day."

Auntie Hsüeh agreed to these arrangements, saying, "Tell the young lady to get everything ready and wait for me. I will come by after lunch."

"Where are you off to now?" inquired Yüeh-niang. "If it is the commandant's place, forget it."

"If I don't go, they will be annoyed to death with me," said Auntie Hsüeh. "They have sent a young servant to summon me several times already."

"What are they summoning you for," asked Yüeh-niang.

"Mistress," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "you may not know it, but she is already four or five months pregnant. His Honor is utterly delighted and has probably summoned me in order to reward me."

So saying, she picked up her box of trinkets, said farewell, and proceeded on her way.

"What that old whore says is completely without any basis," remarked Sun Hsüeh-o. "How long has it been since she was sold into the commandant's household? Scarcely long enough to have developed half a wombful of child. That commandant, at the very least, has a number of concubines at his disposal. So why should he insist on favoring her? How can she overstate things so?"

"He already has a legitimate wife," said Yüeh-niang, "as well as a concubine who has borne him a daughter."

"It's outrageous!" pronounced Sun Hsüeh-o. "Just an example of the loquaciousness of a go-between."

Producing hundred-foot waves out of a foot's worth of water."

What Sun Hsüeh-o said that day was not without consequences. Truly:

Heaven has seen fit to bestow both the needle and thread;
That bring out discordant patterns from the fabric's ground.²⁴

There is a poem that testifies to this:

One recalls the time when she was a servant
at her mistress's beck and call;
Who could have anticipated that today her prospects would be so different?
In this world, the infinite possibilities²⁵ are all predetermined; Scoff not that, in this floating life one's efforts may prove vain.²⁶

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

ON THE CH'ING-MING FESTIVAL THE WIDOW VISITS THE NEW GRAVE; WU YÜEH- NIANG BLUNDERS INTO THE TEMPLE OF ETERNAL FELICITY

Tossed by the wind, enshrouded in mist,
the brocade banner flutters;
During this era of great peace¹ the days are beginning to grow longer.
Wine is capable of enhancing the courage of even a stouthearted hero;²
And is equally effective at alleviating
the depression of a beauty.
Deep within the three-foot-long branches
on the willow-lined bank;
The tavern's signpost rises at an angle
beside the apricot trees.
The stalwart who has yet to accomplish
his lifelong ambition;³
Is prone to sing haughtily as he enters the Land of Drunkenness.⁴

THE STORY GOES that the next day Wu Yüeh-niang saw to the preparation of an offertory table, replete with a pig's head and the three sacrificial animals, soup and rice, paper money for the dead, and the like, wrapped up a bolt of fabric, and directed Hsi-men Ta-chieh to get herself ready by donning plain white mourning garments, and taking her seat in a sedan chair. Auntie Hsüeh then took charge of the sacrificial offerings and preceded her along the way to the door of the Ch'en residence. What should she see when she arrived there but Ch'en Ching-chi himself, who happened to be standing in the doorway.

Auntie Hsüeh started to turn the sacrificial offerings over to a servant to take inside when Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "Where do they come from?"

Auntie Hsüeh greeted him with a bow and said, "Son-in-law, don't pretend that you don't know. Your mother-in-law has sent me to present these things as an offering to your deceased father, and also to return your wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to you."

"Some fucking excuse for a mother-in-law!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi.

"To paste up the effigies of the Gate Gods on the sixteenth of the first month,

Is to be half a month too late.⁵

Only after the corpse of the deceased has been buried in the grave does she bother to offer a sacrifice on his behalf."

"My good son-in-law," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "your mother-in-law points out that a widow is as helpless as a legless crab. It is only because she did not know that the coffin of her kinsman had been brought home that she has been late in her response. Don't hold it against her."

While they were speaking to each other, what should they see but Hsi-men Ta-chieh's sedan chair, which was being set down at the door.

"Who is that?" Ch'en Ching-chi demanded to know.

"Who else would it be?" responded Auntie Hsüeh. "Your mother-in-law is not feeling well. On the one hand, she is returning Hsi-men Ta-chieh to you, and on the other hand, she is respectfully offering to burn paper money on behalf of your father."

"Take that whore back where she came from forthwith!" Ch'en Ching-chi exclaimed abusively. "Better persons than she have died:

By the ten thousands and the thousands.⁶

What would I want with the likes of her?"

"As the saying goes," responded Auntie Hsüeh,

"To marry a husband is to accept a master.

How can you talk that way about her?"

"I won't have anything more to do with that whore!" said Ch'en Ching-chi. "Why aren't you taking her away?"

Seeing that the bearers of the sedan chair were just standing there without making a move, Ch'en Ching-chi stepped out and gave them a couple of kicks, saying, "If you refuse to take her away, I'll break the legs of you beggars and pluck out the hair on her temples."

When the bearers of the sedan chair saw that he was bent on kicking them, they felt compelled to pick up the sedan chair and head for home without delay.

By the time Auntie Hsüeh succeeded in calling out Ch'en Ching-chi's mother, née Chang, the sedan chair had already been carried away, and she had no alternative but to take up the sacrificial offerings and return to report the situation to Wu Yüeh-niang.

Yüeh-niang nearly fainted with rage on hearing about it and said, "What an unprincipled short-life of a jailbird! Originally, your family, because of its legal troubles, sent you here to hide out in your father-in-law's household, which has maintained you for all these years. And now you are:

Requiting kindness with enmity, and have the nerve to maintain that my dead husband was only bent on sequestering your valuable property. Having first created a scandal, you are now trying to:

Cast me in the role of a stinking rat,
while you persist in:

Letting off your hot stinking farts of protest."

She then turned to Hsi-men Ta-chieh and said, "My child, you have seen with your own eyes that neither his father-in-law nor his mother-in-law have shortchanged him in any way. But the fact is that:

While you live you are a member of his family;

If you die you will become his family's ghost.⁷

There is no way I can continue to keep you here. You must go back to him tomorrow. There is no reason to be afraid of him. He will hardly thrust you down a well. No matter how foolhardy he may be, he is not likely to kill you. One can scarcely allege that there is no imperial law to be applied to him in this world."

We will say no more of the events of that evening.

The next day, Yüeh-niang had Hsi-men Ta-chieh put into a sedan chair and told Tai-an to escort her to Ch'en Ching-chi's residence. Who could have anticipated that Ch'en Ching-chi was not at home at the time but had gone to the cemetery to add earth to his father's tomb in order to make a higher grave mound.

His mother, née Chang, was a woman of breeding and agreed to receive Hsi-men Ta-chieh, saying to Tai-an, "When you return home, convey my gratitude to our kinswoman for her sacrificial offerings, and ask her to make allowances for my son, who had too much to drink yesterday, which accounts for his rude conduct. I will do what I can, little by little, to admonish him."

So saying, she offered Tai-an some refreshments before gently inducing him to return home.

That evening, when Ch'en Ching-chi returned from the graveyard and saw Hsi-men Ta-chieh, he fell to kicking and beating her as he cursed her, saying, "You whore! What are you doing back here? Do you still have the nerve to accuse me of scrounging for food off your family? Your family still has possession of the trunks of valuables that we entrusted to you, and which enabled your family to achieve its considerable wealth, so how can they claim to have been supporting their son-in-law for nothing? Better persons than you have died by the thousands. So what would I want with a whore like you?"

Hsi-men Ta-chieh responded in kind, saying, "You shameless jailbird! You unprincipled jailbird! When that whore was expelled from the household and got herself murdered, you felt helpless to do anything about it and have been taking it out on me."

Ch'en Ching-chi reacted by grabbing hold of the hair on top of her head and beating her as hard as he could with his fists. When his mother came over and tried to intervene, he gave her a shove that knocked her onto the floor.

His mother, screaming with rage, shouted, "What a jailbird you are! Your eyes are so red you don't even recognize your mother."

That evening, Ch'en Ching-chi once again sent Hsi-men Ta-chieh back to the Hsi-men household, saying, "If you fail to recover your dowry and the trunks of valuables that my family entrusted to them, whore that you are, I will see that your life is put to an end."

Hsi-men Ta-chieh was so intimidated by this threat that she stayed at home and did not venture out again. There is a poem that testifies to this:

On first acquaintance, their mutual trust was not unmingled with doubt; Though their feeling for each other seemed to be utterly without limit.
Who could have known that even the best of things are subject to change;
Even a single thought may turn out to be the harbinger of resentment.⁸

Hsi-men Ta-chieh remained so intimidated that she stayed at home, without daring to go out.

One day during the third month, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, Wu Yüeh-niang prepared incense and candles, imitation gold and silver paper money for the dead, offerings, including the three sacrificial animals, wine and delicacies, and the like, and had them put into two large food boxes to be carried to the family graveyard five li outside the city wall and presented at Hsi-men Ch'ing's recently created tomb. She left Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and the maidservants behind to look after the house, while taking with her Meng Yü-lou, Hsiao-yü, and the wet nurse Ju-i, who was carrying the infant Hsiao-ko, as they proceeded in their sedan chairs to the site of the family graveyard. She also invited the venerable couple, her brother Wu K'ai and his wife, to accompany them.

As they emerged from the city gate, behold:

The suburban fields stretch into the distance;
A landscape replete with blossoming fragrance.⁹
The flowers are red and the willows are green;
Wellborn young ladies and wandering gentlemen,
Pass hither and yon in their unbroken streams.
Among the four seasons of the year,
None of them is superior to spring,
With its all-surpassing loveliness.
Its days are designated glorious days,
Its breezes are called genial breezes,
Expanding the willow buds,
Opening the flower hearts,
Blowing the fragrant dust.
When the weather is warm it is called genial;
When the weather is cool it is called chilly.
The horses ridden then are called rare steeds;
The sedan chairs are called fragrant vehicles;
The roads walked on are called fragrant paths.
The dust that ascends is called fragrant dust.
The thousands of flowers that begin to bloom,
And the myriad grasses that engender sprouts,
Are called the harbingers of spring.
The spring splendor shimmers,
Its pure vistas are pleasing.
The tiny peaches cluster,
Their visages decorated voluptuously;
The slender willows sway,
Their waists supple as palace ladies.
The warbling of the orioles,¹⁰
Breaks off one's midday dreams;
The chirping of the swallows,
Betokens their spring sadness.
As the days begin to lengthen,
Yellow goslings bathe in the warm streams;
As the waters start to spread,
Green ducklings cavort amid the fragrance.
Across the water one glimpses an estate of someone unknown;
Where a swing is suspended on high amid misty green willows.

Indeed, the springtime scene is truly marvelous. When the spring season arrives, the prefectures, subprefectures, districts, and circuits all see to it that every village, garrison, township, and market within their jurisdictions is provided with areas that are worth visiting.¹¹ There is a poem that testifies to this:

During the Ch'ing-ming Festival mists hover everywhere;
In the suburbs the breezes waft shreds of paper money aloft.
People laugh and people sing amidst the fragrant meadows;
Sudden clearing and sudden showers¹²
beset the apricot blossoms.
Amid the flowering crab apples the songbirds give voice;
Beside the willow-lined embankment
the drunkards snooze.
Red-rouged beauties compete for places
on the painted boards;
Tugging the gaudy ropes they resemble

On the Ch'ing-ming Festival a Widow Visits the New Grave

To resume our story, by the time the sedan chairs of Wu Yüeh-niang and the others arrived at the family graveyard at Wu-li Yüan, Tai-an, who had gone ahead of them with the food boxes, had already made his way to the kitchen and arranged for the fire in the stove to be lighted, and for the chef who had been hired for the occasion to prepare the foodstuffs. But no more of this.

When Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, Hsiao-yü, and the wet nurse Ju-i, who was holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, arrived at the country estate, they sat down in the parlor and consumed a serving of tea while they waited for Sister-in-law Wu to arrive, but she failed to show up. Meanwhile, Tai-an went to the sacrificial platform in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's tomb and set up the offertory tables replete with the meat of the three sacrificial animals, the soup and rice, and other ceremonial offerings and also laid out the paper money to be burned to the dead.

All they could do was to wait, but it turned out that Sister-in-law Wu had been unable to hire a sedan chair. It was not until around ten o'clock in the morning that she and her husband Wu K'ai, who had succeeded in hiring a couple of donkeys, finally arrived.

"If you were unable to hire a sedan chair, Sister-in-law," said Yüeh-niang, "there really must not have been enough of them available on this festival occasion."

After consuming a serving of tea, and changing their clothes, they proceeded to the front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's tomb to present their sacrificial offerings and sweep the grave. Yüeh-niang was holding five sticks of incense in her hand, one of which she kept for herself, one of which she handed to Meng Yü-lou, and one of which she gave to the wet nurse Ju-i, who was carrying Hsiao-ko in her arms. The other two she handed to her elder brother Wu K'ai and his wife.

After placing her stick of incense in the burner, Yüeh-niang bowed deeply before the tomb and said, "Brother:

While alive you were a human being;

Once dead you have become a spirit.

Today, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival during the third month, your devoted wife Wu the Third, your Third Lady Meng Yü-lou, and your infant son Hsiao-ko have respectfully come to burn paper money before your grave, in the hope that you will assure him a long life of a hundred years, so that he will be able to offer sacrifices and sweep your grave in the future. Brother, you and I were man and wife for all that time, and when I recall your looks, and the way you used to talk to me, I am overcome with sorrow."

Tai-an then set the paper money on fire. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

As the paper money burns out,
I can't help stamping my little feet.
During the whole period I was your wife,
We never exchanged hostile words with each other.¹⁴
I really looked forward to living in harmony with you until our old age.¹⁵
Who could have anticipated that you would abandon me halfway?
Originally, the sentimental hopes for the future were mine,
But though you bequeathed us a fortune as solid as a brass ladle,¹⁶
Our child is still young,
And mother and son have been left a widow and orphan.
How will we manage to get by?
It is just like running into a rainstorm
during a journey,
Or encountering a windstorm halfway to one's destination.
The male and female mandarin ducks have been forced to part;
The exotic fruits have been plucked before they were ripe.
I cry out to my good-natured brother,
"On recalling your carriage and deportment,
How can I help sighing in distress?"

Continued to the tune "Every Step Is Captivating":

The ashes of the paper money I have burned swirl about,
But I do not see the face of my husband.
I cry out, "My young husband,
You have abandoned our delicate son,
And left me all alone.
If the two of us have no marital affinity,
How will we ever be able to see each other again?"

Meng Yü-lou then stepped forward, stuck her stick of incense in the burner, bowed deeply, and wept to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope":

As the paper money burns out,
My eyes are filled with tears.
I cry out to mankind and to Heaven,
You have abandoned me with no place to go.
I really looked forward to remaining with you until our hair turned white.
Who could foresee that en route the flowers would wither and the moon fade?¹⁷
The First Lady has a male child, so her future prospects are good;
But I have been abandoned so that the fallen tree no longer provides shade.
With whom am I to carry on?
To keep lonely vigil amid empty bed curtains,¹⁸
Is more than I can stand.
I'm unable to reach the inn ahead, or make it back to the village behind.
I suppose my fallen leaves have returned to the root,
And I must harvest my garden and reap my just reward.
I cry out to my youthful brother,
"If I ever see you again, it can only be an encounter in a dream."¹⁹
It's enough to grieve me to death."

Continued to the tune “Every Step Is Captivating”:

I can only weep and wail until I am stupefied with grief.
Once gone there are no tidings of you.
You have left me with no future in sight,
no future in sight.
You were in the springtime of your youth,
And I was still captivated to behold;
How upsetting it is.
It has wasted my flowery visage and moonlike features.

After Meng Yü-lou had finished burning her incense, the wet nurse Ju-i, holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, also knelt down to present her incense and kowtowed; after which Wu K'ai and his wife proceeded to burn their incense in turn. When these formalities were concluded, they were ushered into the summerhouse on the country estate, where a table and mats had been set up, and food and wine prepared. Yüeh-niang arranged for Wu K'ai and his wife to occupy the positions of honor, while she and Meng Yü-lou sat along one side, and Hsiao-yü, the wet nurse Ju-i, and Lan-hua, the senior maidservant in the Wu household, sat on the other. The wine was then poured, but we will say no more, for the moment, about how they proceeded to drink it.

To resume our story, that day Commandant Chou Hsiu also went to visit his ancestral tombs. Before this, during the preceding night, Ch'un-mei had slept with the commandant and pretended to have had a dream from which she awakened in tears.

The commandant asked in consternation, “What are you crying about?”

Ch'un-mei replied, saying, “I dreamt that my former mistress came to me in tears and wanted to know why, since she had nurtured me so generously over the years, I was not planning to go and burn paper money on her behalf at the time of the Ch'ing-ming Festival and the Cold Food Festival.²⁰ That is why I wept on waking up.”

“This is an example of your filial feelings of gratitude for the nurture you received from her,” said the commandant. “Do you know where your former mistress's grave is located?”

“It is located behind the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate,” responded Ch'un-mei.

“That's not a problem,” said the commandant. “The Temple of Eternal Felicity is my family temple. Tomorrow, when we go to visit our ancestral graves, you can have the servants carry some sacrificial offerings to present to her, and burn some paper money on your mistress's behalf. That would be the right thing to do.”

The next day, Commandant Chou Hsiu had his servants prepare food boxes, wine and appetizers, and sacrificial offerings and set out for his ancestral graveyard outside the South Gate. His estate was replete with a mansion, halls, and gardens, as well as a chapel and a sacrificial platform. His first wife, his concubine Sun Erh-niang, and Ch'un-mei all rode in sedan chairs borne by four bearers each, and preceded by orderlies who shouted to clear the way, as they set out on their excursion to the family graveyard.

To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang, with her older brother Wu K'ai and his wife, enjoyed their wine for a while, after which, fearing that it was getting late, she directed Tai-an and Lai-an to collect the food boxes and the remaining wine and appetizers and precede them along the Ten-li-long Embankment to find an elevated spot before the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village,²¹ where they could set up a picnic table and await them, so they could enjoy:

The liveliness of the teeming crowds.

When they saw that Sister-in-law Wu did not have a sedan chair, they decided to walk and let the bearers carry their sedan chairs behind them. The group of men and women then set out on their way, tripping over the grass and enjoying the scenery, while Wu K'ai led the donkeys to bring up the rear.

After three li they walked past Peach Blossom Inn;

After five li they beheld Apricot Blossom Village.

Behold: Swarming along the roads to visit their ancestral graves:

The patrician youths and wellborn ladies,²²

Amidst the red flowers and green willows,

Producing a tumultuous hubbub as they go,

Pass hither and yon in their unbroken streams.

On top of which:

The sun is warm and the breeze is gentle,²³

so that those who:

Pursue fragrance and savor the landscape,

Are so multitudinous they cannot be numbered.

As they walked along, it turned out to be one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

As they gazed into the distance, in the shade of the green locust trees, they perceived a temple of impressively fine construction. Behold:

The gate of the temple soars aloft;

The Buddhist sanctuary is secluded.

The characters on the imperial plaque are clearly inscribed;

 The bearing of the guardian deities on either side is fierce.
 The thirty-foot-wide front of the main hall,
 Is roofed with serried rows of azure dragon-scale tiles;
 The monk's quarters along the two corridors,
 Are made of shiny tortoiseshell bricks inlaid with flowers.
 In the front hall are graven gods that bring,
 Favorable winds and seasonable rains;²⁴
 In the rear hall stand venerated effigies of,
 The Buddhas of the past and the future.²⁵
 The bell and drum towers rise close together;
 The sutra storage chamber is located on high.
 The flagstaff soars aloft impinging upon the bluish clouds;
 The sacred pagoda likewise encroaches on the azure heavens.
 Wooden fish are horizontally suspended;
 Cloud-shaped gongs are hanging on high.
 The space before the Buddha is ablaze with lamps and candles; Emerging from the burner the smoke of incense swirls about.²⁶
 Pennants are arrayed in endless numbers;
 The hall of the goddess Kuan-yin is next to the chapel of the patriarchs.
 Jeweled canopies are clustered together;
 The effigy of Hārīti²⁷ is situated next to the gallery of the Arhats.
 From time to time the Dharma-protecting gods descend;
 Year in and year out the demon-quelling deities appear.²⁸

"What is the name of this temple?" asked Wu Yüeh-niang.

"This is the family temple of His Honor Chou Hsiu," responded Wu K'ai. "It is called the Ch'an Temple of Eternal Felicity. In former days, when my brother-in-law was still alive, he donated a considerable sum of silver for the restoration of the sanctuary, which is why it is in such good shape today."

Yüeh-niang then turned to Sister-in-law Wu and said, "Let's go into the temple and see what it looks like."

Thereupon she led her group of men and women into the temple. It was not long before a young novice spotted them and reported their arrival to the abbot.

When he saw that there were a number of men and women, he came out of his quarters to welcome them, saying, "My bodhisattva and my benefactor, pray feel free to explore the premises."

What did this abbot look like? Behold:

His bluish, finely polished, pate is newly shaven,
 And is evenly anointed with musk
 and pine seed oil.
 His long blazing-yellow gown is newly tailored,
 And is saturated with aloeswood and sandalwood.
 His high-ridged sandals,
 Have been dyed a deep black in Fu-chou;
 His belt of silk braid,
 Is of deep purple, imported from the West.

The slippery and furtive eyes of this monk,
 Are solely devoted to ogling
 alluring donors;
 The sweet-sounding words of this bald rascal,
 Are merely designed to tempt bereft young widows.
 When his voluptuous feelings are stirred,
 He proceeds to seek out nuns in their convents;
 Whenever his lustful daring is turbulent,
 He entices novices into his abbot's quarters.
 When he observes immortal ladies
 he seeks to bed them; Upon beholding the Moon Goddess
 he longs to seduce her.²⁹

When the abbot saw Wu K'ai and Wu Yüeh-niang, he came forward and saluted them by pressing his palms together in front of his chest and bowing to them in the Buddhist fashion, after which, he promptly summoned a young novice and said to him, "You open up the Buddhist sanctuary and invite our benefactor and the bodhisattva to explore the premises. Meanwhile, this humble monk will see to providing a serving of tea."

The young novice, thereupon, opened up the sanctuary and conducted Yüeh-niang and the group of men and women accompanying her on a tour of the two corridors, front and rear. After paying their respects and looking around for a while, they returned to the abbot's quarters, where he hastened to pour out a serving of fine tea, brewed with sweet water, and served in snow-white cups.

Wu K'ai then asked the abbot for his religious name, and the abbot responded, with an ingratiating smile, saying, "This humble monk's religious name is Tao-chien, and this edifice is the family temple of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu. This humble monk serves as the abbot of the temple, and there are some hundred or more monks under my jurisdiction. The meditation hall located behind the sanctuary also houses a considerable number of itinerant monks who engage in continual meditation in order to requite the good deeds of the benefactors from the four directions."

He then proposed to provide a vegetarian repast in the abbot's quarters and invited Yüeh-niang to partake thereof, saying, "Will you bodhisattvas please be seated. This humble monk is unable to provide any more than this meager collation."

"We ought not to impose upon your sacred institution in this way," responded Yüeh-niang.

She then took out five mace of silver and handed them to Wu K'ai so he could offer them to the abbot, saying, "This is to compensate you for burning some incense before the Buddha."

The abbot, with an ingratiating smile, bowed in gratitude, saying, "This humble monk is not able to offer you any more than this scant refreshment. It is my hope that you benefactors and bodhisattvas will condescend to sit down for a while and partake of this meager collation, which is all that I can offer. What need is there for you to present me with a donation?"

In no time at all, a young novice set up a table and brought in a vegetarian repast and some pastries, while the abbot sat down beside them and raised his chopsticks in order to proffer Yüeh-niang and the others samples of the various dishes.

All of a sudden, they were interrupted by the appearance of two black-clad servants, panting and puffing, who broke in upon them like a clap of thunder and addressed the abbot, saying, "Abbot, why haven't you come out to welcome her? The young mistress from the commandant's household is on her way here to make a sacrificial offering."

This threw the abbot into such consternation that he hastily threw on his cassock, donned his Vairocana hat, ordered a young novice to clear away the utensils, and said to his guests, "Will you bodhisattvas please retire into a side chamber for the time being. It will not be too late to sit down together again after the young lady has burned some paper money, offered her sacrifice, and gone on her way."

Wu K'ai wanted to refuse, but the abbot insisted upon their staying, as though it were a matter of life or death, and would not let them go.

He then hastily ordered the striking up of bells and drums and went out the gate of the temple to receive his visitor, going as far as the turnoff where the entranceway to the temple met the highway to wait. What should he see then but a crowd of black-clad servants escorting a large sedan chair as it came flying toward him from the east. The chair bearers had been traveling so fast that:

Their faces were bathed in sweat,
 And their clothes soaked through.

The abbot bent his body and saluted his guest in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "This humble monk did not know of your coming, young lady. I fear I have been remiss in not coming further to meet you. Pray forgive me.”

Ch'un-mei, from inside the curtain of the sedan chair, merely said, “I am imposing upon Your Reverence.”

Meanwhile, her servants had taken the offertory table to the back of the temple, where they placed it in front of Chin-lien's grave and set out the offerings and paper money upon it. When Ch'un-mei's sedan chair arrived, she did not go into the temple but proceeded straight to the site of Chin-lien's grave under the white poplar tree behind the temple, where she got out of her sedan chair, and her black-clad servants lined themselves up to either side.

Ch'un-mei then:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily,
made her way in front of the grave, stuck her stick of incense in the burner, kowtowed four times, and said, “My mistress, today your servant P'ang Ch'un-mei has come to burn a packet of paper money on your behalf.

May you find a pleasurable place in Heaven;

And use the cash to cope with any problems.

If I had only anticipated that you might suffer death at the hands of your enemy, I would have found a way, somehow or other, to have you enter the commandant's household, so that we could be together. It is I who have let you down, but my repentance is too late to be of any use.”

When she had finished speaking, she ordered her attendants to burn the paper money. Ch'un-mei then stepped forward and commenced to weep out loud. There is a song to the tune “Sheep on the Mountain Slope” that testifies to this:

As the paper money burns out,
I stamp my phoenix-toed shoes to pieces.
I call out to you, “Mother,
My liver and intestines feel ruptured.
Merely because you were so captivating,
people turned against you,
And lost no time in seeing you expelled
from the household; Thereby opening the way for your enemy to ensnare you.
Situating as I was in a secluded mansion,
I was not free to act;
And you had no relatives, so there was no one to care about you.
I had hoped that we could share the same bed and a single pillow.
Who could have known that death would cut short your life,
And in such a pitiable fashion?”
I cry out to Azure Heaven, “How blind can you be?”
As the sayings go, the finest objects are difficult to preserve,
And the bolt of red silk is shorter than it ought to be.

We will say no more, for the moment, about how Ch'un-mei made sacrifices and wept before Chin-lien's grave.

To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang, in the side chamber of the monk's quarters, knew only that a young lady from the commandant's quarters had come, and that the abbot had gone out to receive her, though she had not been seen to come in.

She asked a young novice about this, and he explained, “An elder sister of the young lady was recently buried in a grave behind the temple. Because today is the Ch'ing-ming Festival, she has come to make a sacrifice, sweep the grave, and burn paper money on her behalf.”

“I wonder if it might not be Ch'un-mei who has come?” remarked Meng Yü-lou.

“Since when has she had any elder sister that might have been buried here?” responded Yüeh-niang.

She then asked the young novice, “What is the surname of this young lady from the commandant's household?”

“Her maiden name is P'ang,” replied the novice. “The other day she donated four or five taels of silver to the abbot to pay for a scripture recitation on her elder sister's behalf, in the hope that it might:

Promote her chances of rebirth in Heaven.”³⁰

“I have heard Father mention that Ch'un-mei's maiden name was P'ang,” remarked Meng Yü-lou, “and that she was referred to as Miss P'ang. It must surely be her.”

As they were speaking, what should they see but the abbot, who came in ahead of his guest and ordered a young novice to quickly prepare some fine tea. Before long, the sedan chair was borne past the inner gate of the abbot's quarters, where the passenger was allowed to descend. Yüeh-niang, along with Meng Yü-lou and the others, proceeded to look out through the door-blind of the room in which they were secluded to see what the young lady looked like. When they got a closer look, they saw that it was indeed Ch'un-mei, although, compared to her former appearance, she seemed to have grown:

Larger and taller in stature.

Her face was like a full moon,

and she appeared to be:

Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.

On her headdress:

Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;

A phoenix hairpin was half askew.

She was wearing a scarlet jacket with a floriate design, over a skirt with a wide border of kingfisher blue embellished with gold thread, suspended from which decorative pendants tinkled. She was adorned quite differently from the way she had been in the past. Behold:

Her chignon is of an imposing height;

Her phoenix hairpin is half askew.

Pearl earrings hang low beneath her ears;

Golden phoenixes jut behind either temple.

Her scarlet embroidered jacket,

Enhances her jade-white fragrant flesh;

Her kingfisher-patterned skirt,

Shows off her minuscule golden lotuses.

Whenever she moves,

It makes the jade pendants on her breast tinkle;

Wherever she sits,

The reek of orchid and musk assails the nostrils.

Her neck appears to be made of congealed powder;

Flowery ornaments artfully enhance her eyebrows.

Her visage is astonishing,

Her countenance resembles the rare beauty of a secluded flower;

Her deportment is elegant,

Her nature appealing and agreeable as the fragrance of orchids.

If she was not engendered in ornate quarters,

She has been raised in orchidacious chambers.

In the Temple of Eternal Felicity a Wife Meets Her Owner

She looks just like:

The alabaster goddess from the Purple Elysium taking leave of the milky way;
An immortal of the Palace of Clustered Pearls³¹ descending to the mundane world.

The abbot lifted aside the portiere and invited the young lady into the parlor in his quarters. A formal seat was placed all by itself in the place of honor at the head of the room, and Ch'un-mei sat down upon it. When the abbot had finished paying his respects, a young novice came in with a serving of tea.

The abbot then offered her some tea, saying, "This humble monk was unaware that anyone was coming from the commandant's household to visit the grave today, or that you would be arriving to present a sacrifice.

I have been remiss in welcoming you.³²

Pray extend this humble monk your forgiveness."

"The other day," responded Ch'un-mei, "I put you to a lot of trouble reciting scriptures and praying for the salvation of the soul of the departed."

"How could this humble monk presume to accept such praise?" the abbot blurted out. "What effort did I expend sufficient to repay my benefactress for all the money for the recitation and other acts of beneficence you lavished upon me? This humble monk merely engaged the services of eight Ch'an monks to conduct the rites, recite the scriptures, and perform a litany of repentance. At the end of the day, they also prepared several coffers of paper money and burned them on behalf of the deceased. Only after the rites had been completed did I send the three servitors from your household back inside the city to report back to you."

When Ch'un-mei had finished drinking her tea, the young novice took the utensils away, and the abbot continued to engage her in an animated dialogue. This meant that Wu Yüeh-niang and her fellows were cooped up in their side room and did not feel comfortable about coming out. When Yüeh-niang saw that it was getting late, she sent the young novice to invite the abbot inside and told him that they would like to leave, but the abbot would not consent.

Instead, he went back into the parlor and said to Ch'un-mei, "There is something that this humble monk would like to mention to you."

"Your Reverence," responded Ch'un-mei, "Pray express yourself without constraint."

"Right now," the abbot explained, "there are several sightseeing ladies here, who were engaged in looking over the premises but did not know that you would be arriving. At present, they have expressed a desire to go home, but I do not know what you may feel about it."

"Your Reverence," said Ch'un-mei, "why not ask them to come out so we can meet each other?"

The abbot hastened to convey this request, but Wu Yüeh-niang was still reluctant to come out and said, "Your Reverence, there is no need for us to meet her. It is getting late, and we would like to be on our way."

The abbot felt embarrassed that he had accepted their largess without doing anything adequate to entertain them, and therefore he urged them repeatedly to come out. In the end, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Wu K'ai's wife felt that they could hardly refuse any longer and consented to come out.

As soon as she saw them, Ch'un-mei exclaimed, "So it turns out to be you two ladies and Sister-in-law Wu."

So saying, she maneuvered Wu K'ai's wife into assuming the position of honor and proceeded:

Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze, to kowtow to her; which so affected Sister-in-law Wu that she hastened to return her salutation, saying:

"The present cannot be compared to the past.

You embarrass this old body to death."

"My good sister-in-law," said Ch'un-mei, "how can you say such a thing? I am not the sort of person who ignores distinctions of status:

Exalted or humble, above and below;

This is a self-evident principle."

Having kowtowed to Sister-in-law Wu, she then turned to Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou and proceeded to kowtow to them:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.

Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou were about to return the compliment, but Ch'un-mei would not let them and helped them to their feet.

After kowtowing to them four times, she said, "I did not know that you all were here. If I had known, I would have invited you out so we could greet each other."

"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "since you left us, you have been a member of the commandant's household for some time now, and I have been remiss in not coming to pay a call on you. Pray don't hold it against me."

"My good lady," said Ch'un-mei, "how could the likes of me presume to hold anything against you?"

Then, upon noticing that the wet nurse Ju-i was holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, she remarked, "How little brother has grown."

Yüeh-niang thereupon turned to Ju-i and said, "You and Hsiao-yü, come over and kowtow to your elder sister."

Ju-i and Hsiao-yü, accordingly, came over with ingratiating smiles and performed a half obeisance to Ch'un-mei, while Yüeh-niang said, "Sister, pray accept their salutations."

Ch'un-mei then proceeded to extract a pair of gold-headed silver pins from her hair and stick them into Hsiao-ko's cap.

"Thank Sister for her pins," said Yüeh-niang to Ju-i. "Aren't you going to pay her an obeisance in return?"

Ju-i thereupon, while holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, actually paid an obeisance to Ch'un-mei, which pleased Yüeh-niang no end.

"Sister," said Meng Yü-lou, "if you had not come to the temple today, we would not have had this chance to meet each other again."

"You are right," responded Ch'un-mei. "It is only because my venerable mother was recently buried behind the temple here that I came. After all, I served under her for all this time, and she:

Lacks either relatives or friends.³³

If I were not to express my concern for her by coming and burning some paper money on her behalf, how would I be able to live with myself?"

Yüeh-niang said, "As I recall, your mother has been dead for quite a few years, but I did not know that she was buried here."

"First Lady," said Meng Yü-lou, "you don't understand what Sister P'ang is saying. She is referring to the death of P'an the Sixth. It was thanks to our sister that she was buried here."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she was reduced to silence.

"Who could be kinder than you, Sister?" remarked Wu K'ai's wife. "You were unwilling to forget the favors you enjoyed from her in the past and have gone to the trouble to have her decently buried. And now, on this festival occasion, you have remembered her, and come to burn paper money on her behalf."

"My good lady," responded Ch'un-mei. "I could hardly help remembering the favorable treatment I received from her. In view of the cruel manner in which she died, and the way in which her corpse was exposed and abandoned, how could I fail to arrange a decent burial for her?"

As soon as they had finished speaking, the abbot instructed a young novice to serve them a vegetarian repast. Two large Eight Immortals tables were duly set up, and their surfaces covered with steamed shortcake, fried pastries, a variety of vegetarian dishes, and the finest golden-leaved Sparrow Tongue tea, brewed with sweet water. When they had finished eating, the utensils were cleared away. Meanwhile, Wu K'ai had also been entertained in one of the monk's quarters, but no more of this.

Meng Yü-lou then got up, intending to go pay a visit to Chin-lien's grave and burn some paper money there on her behalf, in memory of the sisterhood they had shared together. When she saw that Yüeh-niang was not going to follow suit, she got out five candareens of silver and asked a young novice to go buy some paper money for her.

"My Lady," said the abbot, "there is no need for you to buy any paper money. I have a supply of imitation gold and silver paper money here, and you are welcome to take some of it with you to burn on her behalf."

Meng Yü-lou turned her silver over to the abbot and then had the young novice lead her out to Chin-lien's grave under the white poplar tree behind the temple, where she found a three-foot-high grave mound of yellow earth, on which a few clumps of artemisia were growing.

Inserting her incense stick into the mound and igniting the paper money, she performed an obeisance, saying, "Sister Six, I did not know that you had been buried here. But today, your sister Meng the Third, having chanced to visit this temple, has come to burn a packet of paper money on your behalf.

May you find a pleasurable place in Heaven;

And use the cash to cope with any problems."

So saying, she groped out a handkerchief and commenced to weep out loud. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

As the paper money burns out,
My pearly tears drop helter-skelter.
I call out to you, "Sister Six,
I weep for you until,
There are barely two breaths left in my body."³⁴
I recall how we never used to make distinctions between us,
During the sisterhood that we shared together.
We never allowed ourselves to get red in the face with anger.
Your temperament was forceful, and I often gave way to you.
But if we ever lost sight of each other,
If you did not look for me, I would go looking for you.
We were like the fish that swim in pairs,
with only one eye apiece,
Ardently sticking to one another;
Only to be suddenly blown apart
by a gust of wind.
Having been accustomed to perching
on the same tree,
One day we were forced to fly our separate ways.
I cry out to you, Sister Six, just try and listen to me.
What a pity that a person of your great intelligence, Should end up today being buried under the ground."

The wet nurse Ju-i, on seeing that Meng Yü-lou had gone back to the rear of the temple, took Hsiao-ko in her arms, intending to go out for a look at the grave herself; but Yüeh-niang, who was still talking to Ch'un-mei in the abbot's quarters, said, "Don't take the child with you, I'm afraid he might find it frightening."

"Don't worry, Mistress," Ju-i responded, "I can handle the situation."

So saying, she took Hsiao-ko with her and went out to the grave site, where she looked on as Meng Yü-lou burned the paper money and wept, after which they came back inside.

Meanwhile, Ch'un-mei and Yüeh-niang had both adjusted their makeup and put their clothing to rights, after which Ch'un-mei directed her servants to open up the food boxes, and they proceeded to lay out a selection of appetizers on the two tables, including sweetmeats, delicacies of various kinds, and partitioned boxes of assorted dainties. Wine was provided, after being strained through a cheesecloth sieve, and laid out along with silver goblets and ivory chopsticks. Ch'un-mei invited Wu K'ai's wife, Wu Yüeh-niang, and Meng Yü-lou to sit down in the positions of honor while she played the role of host, and the wet nurse Ju-i, Hsiao-yü, and Lan-hua, the senior maidservant in the Wu household, were seated to either side. Wu K'ai was also provided with a table for himself in the monk's quarters where he was located.

Just as they were drinking their wine, they suddenly saw a pair of black-clad servants, who came in, knelt down, and reported, "His Honor is at his new estate and has sent us to invite the young mistress to come and enjoy the show he is putting on that includes tumblers and vaudeville acts. His First Lady and Second Lady are both there, and he would like you to come join them as soon as possible."

Ch'un-mei responded:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily, saying, "You can go back. I understand the situation."

The two servitors assented and withdrew but did not venture to depart, choosing to wait outside for her to finish entertaining her guests.

Wu K'ai's wife and Yüeh-niang felt that it was time for them to take their leave, saying, "Sister, we don't wish to impose upon you any longer. It is getting late, and you have something to do. We had better be on our way."

Ch'un-mei, however, was reluctant to let them go and, telling her attendants to proffer them large goblets of wine, appealed to them, saying, "We former members of the same household:

Spend less time together than apart,³⁵ and have gone our separate ways, but we ought not to break off our relationship. I also:
Lack either relatives or friends.

On the occasion of your birthday, Mother, I will come to pay you a visit."

"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "it is nice of you to suggest it, but I would not presume to put you to such trouble. Some day soon, I will come pay a call on you."

After drinking a cupful of wine, Yüeh-niang said, "I have had enough wine. Sister-in-law Wu does not have a sedan chair, and it is getting late enough to hinder our return."

"If Sister-in-law Wu does not have a sedan chair," said Ch'un-mei, "I brought some ponies along with me and can lend one of them to her to ride home on."

As she prepared for her own departure, Ch'un-mei called for the abbot and had one of her servants bring out a bolt of muslin and five mace of silver, which she presented to him. The abbot bowed in thanks to her and escorted her out through the gate of the temple. Ch'un-mei exchanged farewells with Yüeh-niang and saw her, together with Meng Yü-lou and the others, into their sedan chairs, after which she got into her own sedan chair, and the two groups went their separate ways. Ch'un-mei was accompanied by a crowd of attendants who shouted to clear the way as she made her way to her husband's new estate. Truly:

If even the separate leaves of a tree
may encounter each other;
Why should people, too, not sometimes meet with good fortune?³⁶

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

LAI-WANG ABSCONDS TOGETHER WITH SUN HSÜEH-O; SUN HSÜEH-O IS SOLD TO CHOU HSIU'S HOUSEHOLD

Blossoms open and blossoms fall,¹ open and fall again;
Officials and commoners are wont to replace one another.
Prominent families cannot count upon remaining wealthy;
Poor persons are not necessarily doomed to remain poor.
If you assist people, they will not necessarily rise to Heaven;
If you abuse people, they will not necessarily end in a ditch.²
You are urged, in all things, not to be resentful toward Heaven; Heaven's attitude toward mankind is neither generous nor stingy.³

THE STORY GOES that Wu K'ai took charge of Yüeh-niang and the group of men and women that accompanied her as they left the Temple of Eternal Felicity and continued on their way under the tall trees on the long embankment. Meanwhile, Tai-an had already selected an elevated spot in the open air before the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village, from which they could enjoy:

The liveliness of the teeming crowds;
and set out their wine and appetizers:

Making a canopy of Heaven and a carpet of Earth.⁴
He had waited a long time before he saw the sedan chairs of Yüeh-niang and the others approaching.
Upon their arrival, he asked, "Why has it taken you so long to get here?"

Yüeh-niang responded by telling him all about how they had run into Ch'un-mei in the Temple of Eternal Felicity.
It was not long before the wine was decanted, and the group of them sat down to enjoy their drinks. As they did so, what should they see passing back and forth below the tavern in front of them but a stream of:

Perfumed carriages with decorated hubs,
Amid the discord of the teeming crowds.
The chariots and horses rumbled like thunder;
As the pipes and voices rose up tumultuously.⁵

Yüeh-niang and the others, standing on their elevated spot, looked on as the:
Mountains and seas of people, crowded around to watch the military instructors perform their equestrian acrobatics.

It so happens that among them was the son of the district magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, whose name was Li Kung-pi. He was about thirty years of age and was enrolled as a student at the Superior College of the National University. He had ever been:

As romantic and dashing as can be,
But too lazy to study the classics;
preferring instead to engage in:
Equestrian hunting with falcons and hounds,
Or playing at kickball and suchlike sports.

He was a habitué of the:

Three quarters and two alleys, of the pleasure precincts, and people referred to him as Bare Stick Li. That day, he was wearing an outfit of light glossy silk, with a small palmetto hat with a golden knob on his head, while his feet were clad in dark tan boots and embroidered stockings. Along with a clerk on the staff of the district yamen named Ho Pu-wei, he was leading a group of twenty or thirty stout fellows, equipped with slingshots, blowpipes, balls, and sticks, who congregated in front of the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village looking on as the military instructor Li Kuei performed his equestrian acrobatics; doing headstands on horseback, hanging on one side of his steed by grasping its belly bands, twirling his spear and flourishing his club. The considerable number of men and women gathered there were cheering vociferously.

This Li Kuei, whose nickname was Shantung Yaksha,⁶ wore a flat-topped cap on his head, held in place with a hammered gold ring that floated at the back of his skull. His body was draped in a close-fitting purple gown, his waist was encircled with a gold lamé cummerbund, his shins were encased in patterned puttees, and his feet were clad in long-legged boots and variegated stockings with a flying fish motif. He rode on a steed with a silvery mane and held a gleaming vermilion-handled spear in his hand, from which there floated a commander's standard.

Vaulting into the saddle in the middle of the street, he went on to introduce himself in a loud voice, saying:

Martial arts instructors such as myself are rare in this world;
My name has been known on the rivers and lakes for a long time.
Blows with my two fists feel like being hammered with a mallet;
My two feet carry me forward as nimbly
as though in flight.
In the martial contests in the Southern and Northern Capitals,
And those in Kuang-tung and Kuang-hsi,
I am without a rival.
It is clear I am an adamantly boastful and big-mouthed sort;
Though the fact is that I am utterly devoid of any talent.
My skill with the Shao-lin quarterstaff,
Barely enables me to batter field frogs;
My mastery of the Yüeh school of boxing,⁷ Hardly equips me to terrify little dogs.
When confronted with a real match,
I scarcely dare make even a sound;
If there is no rival to deal with,
I am wont to utter boastful words.
The money I manage to swindle this way
I find hard to hold on to;
Because I am so given to plucking the "willows" in the quarter.⁸
I am obliged to Young Master Li Kung-pi from the Northern Capital, Who sustains me in his household, and views me as a bosom friend.
Dipped in fresh sauce, I enjoy consuming half a field of scallions; Wrapped in thin pancakes, I stuff myself with half a load of leeks.
Your humble servant has always been addicted to intemperance;
And enjoys drinking wine throughout the time from 4:00 to 6:00.
Should my teeth hurt,
I only resort to grinding them;
Should my belly swell,
I merely resort to massaging it.
To sate myself, I have been known to consume three pecks of rice;
To amuse myself, I have been known to swill a large crock of wine.
I am exceedingly grateful to my patron,

but have no way to repay him;
In the life to come I will be reborn as a watchdog to guard his home.
Should a housebreaker show up and try to make a hole in his wall;
I will rise to the occasion by taking a bite out of his scrotum.
If you want to know why I would take
a bite out of his scrotum;
It is because I am not as expert at using my limbs as my mouth.⁹

On this occasion, no sooner did Li Kung-pi set eyes on Meng Yü-lou's tall and slender figure than, before he knew it;
His heart was agitated and his eyes disturbed.

It seemed to him that:

Such a vision is not exhaustible;
Such a view exceeds comprehension.
From his mouth no word was uttered,
In his heart he thought to himself,

"I wonder whose household that woman belongs to, and whether she has a husband or not?"

Turning to the "ball clubber" Trifler Chang, who was a member of his entourage, he called him over and whispered to him, saying, "You go over to that elevated slope and see if you can find out whose household those three women dressed in white belong to. If you succeed in discovering the truth of the matter, come back and report to me."

Trifler Chang, deferentially covering his mouth with his hand, assented and promptly flew off on this errand.

It was not long before he returned and proceeded to:

Whisper into his ear in a low voice, saying, "Thus and so, they are womenfolk from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing in front of the district yamen. The oldest of them is surnamed Wu and is his sister-in-law. The one who is petite in stature is his First Lady Wu Yüeh-niang. The one with the tall and slender figure and a few white pockmarks on her face is his Third Lady, whose name is Meng Yü-lou. The latter two of them have both chosen to remain in his household and maintain their widowhood."

When Li Kung-pi heard this, he felt particularly attracted to Meng Yü-lou and generously rewarded Trifler Chang for his efforts. But no more of this.

Wu K'ai, along with Yüeh-niang and the others, continued to enjoy the scene for what seemed like half a day until:

The sun began to be swallowed by the hills, when he directed Tai-an to gather up the food boxes and urged Yüeh-niang to get into her sedan chair and proceed home. Truly, it is the case that:

The young man grasps his brocade bridle and flaunts his silken sleeves in drunkenness;
The silk-clad young lady lifts aside the embroidered curtain the better to gaze at him.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The shadows of the flowers under the willows hold down the dust on the road;
Each time one sets out to enjoy them one's pleasure is renewed.
Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li;
Those without affinities will not meet though face to face.

We will say no more, for the moment, about how Yüeh-niang and the others returned home.

To resume our story, that day, back at home, Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, having nothing else to do during the afternoon, went out and stood by the front gate. It just so happened that:

As providence would have it, a peddler unexpectedly came along shaking the clapper by which he alerted housewives to his presence. In those days, peddlers who dealt in cosmetics, ornamental trinkets, and mirror polishing all alerted housewives by shaking such clappers.

Upon hearing the sound of the clapper, Hsi-men Ta-chieh said, "My mirror is tarnished," and told P'ing-an to go stop the peddler so he could polish her mirror for her.

The peddler put down his burden and said, "I am not a mirror polisher but deal in gold and silver objects, head ornaments, and trinkets."

As he stood there in front of the gate, he stared fixedly at Sun Hsüeh-o:

Looking her over from top to bottom.

Sun Hsüeh-o responded by saying, "As for you, if you are not a mirror polisher, you can take yourself off. What reason is there for you to stare at me that way?"

The man then said, "Sister Hsüeh-o, and the young lady of the household, I guess you no longer recognize me."

"You look familiar," said Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "but I don't seem able to remember who you are at the moment."

"I am Lai-wang," the man replied, "whom the master drove out of his household."

"Where have you been all these years?" asked Sun Hsüeh-o. "Why haven't we seen you? You've managed to gain quite a bit of weight."

"Upon leaving the master's household," replied Lai-wang, "I returned to my native place in Hsü-chou but was at loose ends and unable to find regular employment. So I joined the entourage of a gentleman who was leaving for the capital to take up an official position. Unexpectedly, while we were en route, his father died, and he had to return home in order to observe the mourning rituals for his parent. I therefore sought employment in the jeweler's shop of Silversmith Ku, where I have been learning the craft of working with precious metals, engraving patterns on larger vessels, as well as head ornaments and other objects. These last few days, business has been slack, so Silversmith Ku has sent me out on the street with a carrying pole to peddle some miscellaneous objects. When I saw you all standing in the entranceway, I did not dare to accost you, lest you accuse me of venturing to:

Dawdle at your door or loiter at your gate.

If you had not called me over today, I would not have made myself known to you."

"Though I scrutinized you for what seemed like half a day," said Sun Hsüeh-o, "I failed to recognize you. As an old member of the household, what were you afraid of?"

She then went on to ask, "What sort of merchandise are you selling in that load of yours? Bring it inside so we can have a look at it."

Lai-wang then proceeded to carry his load into the courtyard and open up the coffers, extracting a variety of head ornaments and incised gold and silver artifacts from the boxes inside them. The patterns displayed upon them were works of exquisite craftsmanship. Behold:

A solitary wild goose holds reeds in its beak;

A pair of fish sport among the aquatic plants.

A peony blossom is artistically incised with specks of gold;

The chalcedony head of a hairpin is as lustrous as a flame.

There are also:

A pair of lions playing with a brocade ball,

And a file of camels bearing costly tribute;

Cap ornaments made to delineate the Palace of the Moon,

Hair clasps carved to represent the Peach Blossom Spring.

The pins holding the hair on left and right,

Depict pears and persimmons¹⁰ on one side and a clump of lychees on the other;

The pins worn on the part in front and back,

Depict the Goddess Kuan-yin sitting with her legs crossed on her Lotus Throne.

There are also:

Frigid sparrows contending for plum blossoms,¹¹

And male phoenixes flirting with their mates.

Truly:

The chatelaines are studded with evenly spaced emeralds;

The cap buttons are fashioned from glaucous precious stones.

After examining these samples for a while, Sun Hsüeh-o said to Lai-wang, "If you have any other ornaments for sale, bring them out so I can see them."

Lai-wang then brought out another box containing artificial flower ornaments to be worn on the hair over the temples, cap ornaments of kingfisher blue in the shape of bird's wings, and an assortment of cricket-shaped stickpins. Hsi-men Ta-chieh picked out for herself two pairs of flower ornaments for the hair over her temples, and Sun Hsüeh-o selected a pair of emerald-green phoenix hairpins, and a pair of brooches representing the motif of goldfish pierced with willow twigs.¹² Hsi-men Ta-chieh then proceeded to weigh out the silver for her purchase and give it to him, but Sun Hsüeh-o, who owed him one tael and two mace of silver for the two items she had selected, requested that he come back early the next morning to collect her payment.

She then went on to explain, "Today, the First Lady is not at home, having gone to the family graveyard, together with her infant child and the Third Lady, in order to burn paper money at Father's grave."

"While I was at home last year," said Lai-wang, "I heard that Father had died and that the First Lady had given birth to a son. I imagine he must have grown somewhat bigger by now."

"The First Lady's child is only a year and a half old right now," said Sun Hsüeh-o. "The members of our household, both high and low, treasure him like a pearl on a piece of jewelry, and our future prospects are dependent on him."

As they were talking, Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," came out and poured a cup of tea for him to drink. Lai-wang accepted the tea and responded to her with a bow.

Lai-chao himself also appeared and, after chatting with him for a while, said, "You ought to come back tomorrow in order to pay your respects to the First Lady."

Lai-wang then picked up his carrying pole and departed.

That evening, when Yüeh-niang and the others arrived home in their sedan chairs, Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, together with the maidservants, all kowtowed to her. Tai-an felt unable to keep up with the bearers who were carrying the food boxes, and therefore hired a donkey for himself and took care of dismissing the bearers when they arrived home.

Yüeh-niang told Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh about their meeting with Ch'un-mei that day, saying, "It so happens that she had taken the trouble to arrange the burial of her mistress from the P'an family behind the Temple of Eternal Felicity, though we knew nothing about it. She came to burn paper money at her grave today, and we happened:

By some fortuitous fluke of fortune,¹³ to run into her there, and renew our acquaintance. Before this, we had already consumed a vegetarian repast provided by the abbot, but afterwards, Ch'un-mei also had two tables set up and directed her servants to lay out the contents of forty or fifty partitioned boxes containing delicacies of every kind, and to decant the wine. It was more than we could hope to consume. When she saw Hsiao-ko, she also presented him with a pair of her own hairpins. She was as friendly as could be. When she got up to go, she was:

Attended by three or five servants, and rode in a large sedan chair, followed by a crowd of retainers. Moreover, she appears to have grown taller than she was before, and is whiter and plumper as well."

"She has also chosen not to:

Alter her normal demeanor or forget her former status," remarked Sister-in-law Wu. "In the days when she was employed in your household, I noticed that her conduct was more proper and her speech more dignified than that of the other maidservants, and that she seemed to possess the potential for better things. One can see today the truth of the saying that:

Good fortune serves to stimulate the intelligence, and may result in this kind of prosperity."

Meng Yü-lou also chimed in, saying, "Our elder sister may not have asked her about it, but I did, and it turns out that she is pregnant, not having menstruated for the last six months, and that her baby is due in the eighth or ninth month. The commandant is utterly delighted by this. Thus, what Auntie Hsüeh reported to us turns out to be true after all."

After they had talked about this for a while, Sun Hsüeh-o said, "While Mother was not at home today, Hsi-men Ta-chieh and I were standing at the front gate when we caught sight of Lai-wang. It turns out that he has been here learning the craft of working with precious metals and was peddling a load of gold and silver articles and costume jewelry, though we did not even recognize him at first. Upon realizing who he was, we bought several items of costume jewelry from him. He asked about you, Mother, and I told him that you had gone to burn paper money at your husband's grave."

"Why didn't you ask him to wait until I returned home?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"We told him to come back tomorrow," responded Sun Hsüeh-o.

As they were sitting there, and talking together, whom should they see but the wet nurse Ju-i, who came forward and said to Yüeh-niang, "Ever since I arrived home with the little child, for what seems like half a day, he has been in a coma from which he has not awakened. The breath coming out of his mouth is cold, while his body feels:

As scalding as boiling water and as hot as fire."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she hastened in consternation to pick the baby up from the heated k'ang and give him a kiss. Sure enough, she found that he was covered with cold sweat, though his whole body felt feverishly hot.

Losing her temper, she took Ju-i to task, saying, "Whore that you are, you've let the child catch a chill in the sedan chair."

"I had him wrapped up tightly in a quilt," protested Ju-i. "How could I have exposed him to the cold?"

"If it wasn't that," continued Yüeh-niang, "you must have exposed him to a fright by taking him to visit that dead woman's grave. I told you not to take him there, but you ignored my instructions and insisted on taking him with you anyway."

"Luckily," responded Ju-i, "Sister Hsiao-yü can bear witness that I merely carried him with me to take a look at the grave and then came back. Since when did I expose him to any fright?"

"Don't give me any more of your lip," responded Yüeh-niang. "What need was there for you to go look at her grave in the first place, and thereby expose him to a fright?"

She then called in Lai-an and instructed him, saying, "Go at once and summon Dame Liu."

It was not long before Dame Liu showed up.

After taking his pulse, and feeling his body, she pronounced, "He is suffering from a colic brought on by encountering an evil spirit. I will leave you two doses of cinnabar pills which you should help him to wash down with some ginger extract."

She then directed the wet nurse to hold him in her arms and go lie down on the heated k'ang. It was halfway through the night before he broke out into a cold sweat and his fever began to abate. Dame Liu was then provided with a serving of tea, given three mace of silver as compensation for her services, and requested to return the next day to see how he was doing. What with the:

Opening of gates and closing of doors, the whole household was thrown into a state of consternation for half the night.

To resume our story, the next day, Lai-wang came back to the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence carrying his load of merchandise as before and bowed to Lai-chao, saying, "Yesterday, Sun Hsüeh-o selected a number of my products for herself and promised that if I would return today she would pay me the silver she owed for them, and also arrange a meeting with the First Lady."

"You had better leave for the time being and come back another day," said Lai-chao. "Yesterday, when the First Lady came home, her infant son had fallen ill, and they had to call in the medical practitioner Dame Liu to prescribe medicine for him. As a result, the household has been in a state of disruption and suffering from acute anxiety all night long. Only today does he appear to have gotten somewhat better. Under the circumstances, how could anyone have the spare time to weigh out silver for you?"

As they were speaking, who should turn up but Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o, who were in the act of seeing off Dame Liu and caught sight of Lai-wang as they came to the front gate. Lai-wang proceeded to kneel down on the ground and kowtow twice to Yüeh-niang.

"It's been some time since we saw you last," said Yüeh-niang. "Why haven't you come by to pay us a visit?"

Lai-wang told her what had happened to him during the interim and explained that although he had wanted to come, he had not felt comfortable doing so.

"As a former member of the household," said Yüeh-niang, "what were you afraid of? Moreover, your master is now dead. Originally it was simply because that whore from the P'an family engaged in:

Setting fires with one hand, and Pouring water on them with the other, fabricating tales about people behind their backs, that your good wife was driven to commit suicide by hanging herself, and you were framed for something you didn't do and condemned to be banished to your native place. But now, Heaven has refused to countenance her, and she is gone for good."

"It's not something I want to talk about," said Lai-wang. "It suffices that you understand it as well as you do."

After they had spoken for a while, Yüeh-niang asked him, "What kind of wares are you offering for sale? Get them out so I can take a look."

When he had done so, she selected several head ornaments for herself, the cost of which came to three taels and two mace of silver, and weighed the payment out for him on a scale. She then invited him to enter through the ceremonial gate into the rear compound and told Hsiao-yü to fetch a jug of wine and a platter of savories for him. Sun Hsüeh-o, who was in charge of the kitchen, personally saw to heating up a large bowl of pork and brought it out for him to eat. When he had had his fill of wine and food, he kowtowed to them in gratitude and went back out to the front gate.

When Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and the others had returned to the rear compound after seeing him off, Sun Hsüeh-o surreptitiously whispered to him, "You should feel free to come back here as often as you like. What is there to be afraid of? If I have anything to say to you, I'll have Lai-chao's wife tell you about it. Tomorrow evening, I'll wait for you here inside the ceremonial gate in the little anteroom next to the crape myrtle hedge."

The two of them exchanged winks with each other, the meaning of which was not lost on Lai-wang, and he went on to ask, "Is this ceremonial gate closed at night, or not?"

Sun Hsüeh-o responded, thus and so, "When you come, go to Lai-chao's quarters first, and wait until nightfall, after which, you can scale the wall with a ladder, and then make your way along the other side of the latticework partition. I'll help you down on this side, and the two of us can get together again. There are some personal thoughts that I want to share with you."

When Lai-wang heard these words, truly:

Joy manifested itself about his temples;

Delight spread itself across his cheeks, and, saying good-bye to Sun Hsüeh-o, he proceeded to take up his carrying pole and go out the gate. Truly:

Without the help of an insider,

A household cannot be broached.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Idle, with nothing to do, while merely leaning against the doorjamb,
He encounters a lover with whom he once enjoyed a deeply felt affair.
Not daring to speak loudly enough to be overheard by anyone else,
She clearly reveals her ardor with the autumn ripples of her eyes.

Lai-wang proceeded happily on his way home. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.

The next day, he did not take up his carrying pole and go out to peddle his wares but slowly sauntered back and forth in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's gate waiting for Lai-chao to come out.

When he did so, Lai-wang greeted him with a bow, to which Lai-chao responded by saying, "What a rare bird you are, Brother Wang. Long time no see."

"Having nothing to do," Lai-wang said, "I've dropped by for a visit. The young lady Sun Hsüeh-o from the rear compound owes me several mace of silver for some trinkets she purchased from me, and I have come by to collect the payment."

"In that case," responded Lai-chao, "come into my place and have a seat."

So saying, he ushered Lai-wang into his quarters.

"Why is my sister-in-law not to be seen?" asked Lai-wang.

"Your sister-in-law is on duty in the kitchen in the rear compound today," explained Lai-chao.

Lai-wang then groped out a tael's worth of silver and handed it to Lai-chao, saying, "These few pieces of silver should suffice to purchase a jug of wine for my brother and sister-in-law to enjoy with me."

"There is no need for that much," said Lai-chao.

So saying, he called over his son Little Iron Rod. Little Iron Rod, who had just recently put up his hair on reaching the age of fourteen, went out with a jug and came back with a large vessel of wine, after which, he was sent to the rear compound to summon "The Beanpole."

It was not long before "The Beanpole" showed up with a covered pewter pot of heated rice, a large bowl of boiled hash, and two side dishes, to go with the wine, saying, "How nice it is to see Brother Wang here."

Lai-chao then brought out the silver that Lai-wang had given him and showed it to "The Beanpole," saying, "Our brother has given this to us with which to buy a jug of wine for our enjoyment."

"The Beanpole" laughed at this, saying, "To enjoy something we have done nothing to deserve is hardly the right thing to do."

She then set up a bed table on the k'ang, invited Lai-wang to sit down at it, laid out the refreshments, and decanted the wine. Lai-wang promptly responded by filling a cup of wine to the brim and offering it to Lai-chao, after which, he poured out another cup and presented it to "The Beanpole."

Bowing deeply to them, he said, "It is some time since I have seen my brother and sister-in-law. These cups of watery wine are intended to show my filial respect for the two of you."

"We are hardly likely to accuse you of sponging off us," said "The Beanpole." "But:

When addressing sincere people,

You must not speak insincerely.

The young lady Sun Hsüeh-o in the rear compound appealed to us for help yesterday. She said that:

Your old feelings for each other remained intact,¹⁴ and asked the two of us, thus and so, if we could help you to get together again. You had better not pretend to be:

Still asleep in dreamland.

If you want to find the route down the mountain,

You had better ask someone who has been over it.¹⁵

If you should find a way to be reunited, and gain anything in the process:

Don't try to keep it all for yourself; but Spare us a mouthful of leftover gravy.

After all, we are putting ourselves at considerable risk on your behalf."

Lai-wang responded by getting down on his knees and saying, "All I am hoping for is that my brother and sister-in-law will consent to help us get together again. If so:

I will never dare to forget it."

When they had concluded this exchange, they proceeded to enjoy their wine for a while, after which "The Beanpole" went back to the rear compound to tell Sun Hsüeh-o about it.

Upon returning, she said, "We have agreed that you should come back this evening and hide out in our quarters until the ceremonial gate has been closed for the night and the residents of the rear compound have gone to bed, after which, you can climb over the wall and:

Seize the opportunity to do what you want."¹⁶

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Just retribution is absolutely devoid of bias;¹⁷

It follows as inevitably as shadows or echoes.

If you seek the causes of bad or good fortune;

Simply scrutinize the deeds that one has done.¹⁸

On hearing these words, Lai-wang went home and could hardly wait for the evening, when he slipped surreptitiously into Lai-chao's quarters and proceeded to share some wine with the two of them until late at night without anyone else being aware of his presence. After the main gate of the residence had been closed, and the crossbar had been locked in place on the ceremonial gate, the residents of the household, both high and low, all went to bed.

The two of them had arranged a secret signal, so as soon as Lai-wang heard the sound of Sun Hsüeh-o coughing, he proceeded to mount a ladder, crawl onto the plastered wall, and make his way along the other side of the latticework partition to the point at which Sun Hsüeh-o stood ready to help him down onto a bench.

The two of them then retired to the little anteroom on the western side of the courtyard that was used for storing saddles, where they fell to:

Hugging and embracing each other, as they went on to engage in the game of clouds and rain together. It was a meeting between a widower and a widow with:

The fire of lust in their hearts.

As for Lai-wang:

His tasseled spear was impetuous, and he worked it with all his strength for some time until his pleasure reached its height as his semen began to flow, and he:

Ejaculated like a geyser.

When they had finished their business together, Sun Hsüeh-o handed him a bundle containing some gold and silver head ornaments, several taels worth of silver, and two outfits of satin clothing and said, "You should come back again tomorrow evening. I still have some other valuables I can turn over to you then. You might as well start looking outside for a safe place for us to go. This household is no place for me to remain in the future. It would be better if the two of us could abscond together and find a place to stay outside where we could become man and wife. Since you have mastered the craft of a silversmith, there is no reason to worry about our being able to make a living."

"At the present time," responded Lai-wang, "there happens to be a maternal aunt of mine who lives on Polished Rice Lane outside the East Gate of the city. She practices midwifery and is well-known in the neighborhood as Midwife Ch'ü. It is an out-of-the-way location where we can safely escape observation. The two of us might as well seek refuge there for a while, and if we see that the coast is clear I can take you with me to my native place, buy a few acres of land, and plant some crops in order to support ourselves."

When the two of them had agreed on this plan, Lai-wang said good-bye to Sun Hsüeh-o, clambered back over the wall, and returned to Lai-chao's quarters, where he waited until the main gate was opened early the next morning and slipped furtively outside.

Lai-wang Absconds over the Wall with Sun Hsüeh-o

At dusk that day, he returned to the gate and slipped back into Lai-chao's quarters. That night, he climbed over the wall once again and made out with Sun Hsüeh-o. After this, as the mornings and evenings succeeded one another, he met with her in this way on more than one occasion. They also took advantage of the opportunity to make off with a lot of valuable objects, gold and silver utensils, clothing, and so forth. Lai-chao and his wife also fattened themselves by appropriating a share of these stolen goods, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

One day, in the rear compound, Yüeh-niang, who was feeling out of sorts because she feared that Hsiao-ko might be coming down with smallpox, went to bed earlier than usual. The maidservant in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters at the time was Chung-ch'iu, who had originally worked for Hsi-men Ta-chieh but had been reassigned to Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters by Yüeh-niang because Ch'en Ching-chi had asked for Yüan-hsiao, who had formerly served in Li Chiao-erh's quarters. Yüeh-niang had complied with this request by reassigning Chung-ch'iu to Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters, and ordering Yüan-hsiao to work for Hsi-men Ta-chieh. That night, after Sun Hsüeh-o had made sure that Chung-ch'iu was asleep, she proceeded to assemble a large bundle of hairpins, earrings, and head ornaments in her bedroom, packed them in a box, wrapped her head in a kerchief, and put on her traveling clothes. She had previously arranged with Lai-wang that he should wait for her in Lai-chao's quarters so the two of them could abscond together.

Lai-chao said to them, "I have no problem with your making good your escape, but I am responsible for the front gate and cannot afford to let so much as a duckling get away. If the First Lady finds out what has happened and demands to know why I didn't stop you, what am I to say? It would be better if the two of you were to go out over the roof, and break a few tiles in the process, so there will be some evidence of how you got away."

"Brother," responded Lai-wang, "what you say makes sense."

Sun Hsüeh-o also gave them a silver ewer with a hinged lid, a gold earpick, a black satin jacket, and a yellow satin skirt to thank them for their assistance. They decided to wait until the fifth watch when the moon was dark before climbing over the roof.

Lai-chao and his wife poured out two large goblets of heated wine and offered them to Lai-wang and Sun Hsüeh-o, saying, "This will facilitate your escape, and serve to buck up your spirits on the way."

They continued drinking until the fifth watch, when the two of them, while holding sticks of incense, climbed up the ladder and helped each other onto the roof. As they moved across it:

Step by step,

they dislodged and broke a considerable number of tiles. When they had climbed as far as the eaves on the front of the building, they saw that there were still no pedestrians in the street, though they could hear the sound made by a patrolling watchman. Lai-wang was the first to jump to the ground and then helped Sun Hsüeh-o down by allowing her to stand on his shoulders and then lifting her the rest of the way.

The two of them made their way forward, but when they arrived at a crossroads they were stopped by a patrolman, who demanded to know, "Where are the two of you going?"

This had the effect of throwing Sun Hsüeh-o into a state of panic, but Lai-wang responded:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily, by pointing to the stick of government-grade incense in his hand, and saying, "We are a married couple, and are on our way to burn incense at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak outside the city wall. We are earlier than we should be but hope that you will not hold it against us."

"And what have you got in that bundle you are carrying?" the officer went on to ask.

"It is a supply of incense, candles, and paper money," said Lai-wang.

"If the two of you are going to burn incense at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak," the officer responded, "that is a worthy undertaking, and you may continue quickly on your way."

This was just the signal Lai-wang was waiting for. Taking Sun Hsüeh-o by the hand, he proceeded to fly forward as fast as he could go. When they arrived at the city wall, the gate had just opened, and, insinuating themselves into the crowd, they made their way inconspicuously outside the city wall. After turning down a number of streets and alleys, they arrived at Polished Rice Lane, which was an out-of-the-way place, occupied by only a few families, living in:

Low-lying houses and humble dwellings, that backed on the embankment of a large pond.

When they arrived at Midwife Ch'ü's house, she had not yet opened the door. They had to call out for what seemed like half a day before she got up to open the door, and caught sight of Lai-wang with a woman in tow. It so happens that Lai-wang's surname had originally been Cheng, so he was known to her as Cheng Wang.

"This woman is my newly acquired wife," he explained to her. "If you have the room to accommodate us for a little while, we can go on to look for a place of our own."

So saying, he handed her three taels of silver with which to purchase kindling and rice. When Midwife Ch'ü saw the gold and silver head ornaments they had with them, she realized that their provenance was suspicious.

Her son, Ch'ü T'ang, upon seeing that his mother had agreed to accommodate Cheng Wang and his wife, and that they had brought these things with them:

On seeing their value developed ideas.

Prizing open the door to their room, he made off with some of the valuables and went out to gamble with them but was apprehended, confessed to the circumstances, and was brought before the district magistrate. When District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i saw that they were stolen objects, and that the evidence of this was clear, he dispatched runners to take Ch'ü T'ang to his home and trussed Cheng Wang and Sun Hsüeh-o together with a single length of rope. Sun Hsüeh-o was so frightened that her face turned as sallow as wax, and she proceeded to change into her everyday clothes, put on a pair of eye shades, and tear the rings off her fingers to give to the runners. They were then escorted under guard to confront the magistrate. This event created something of an uproar in the neighborhood, and people came out onto the street to see what was going on.

Among them there were those who recognized them and said, "She is a concubine from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household who has run away with the servant Lai-wang. He was formerly driven into exile but has come back under the name Cheng Wang, fornicated with her, and colluded with her in running off with stolen property, in order to go live together somewhere else. Once there, they have been ripped off in turn by this Ch'ü T'ang, and now that their crimes have been brought to light, they are being taken to confront the magistrate."

There and then:

The news spread from one person to ten,

And then from ten persons to a hundred.¹⁹

The mouths of the pedestrians on the road

cause stories to fly.²⁰

Let us revert to the story of Yüeh-niang back at home. When Sun Hsüeh-o absconded, and her maidservant Chung-ch'ü discovered that the valuables and head ornaments in her cabinet were all gone, and that her clothes had been left:

Scattered about in a state of disorder, and reported these facts to Yüeh-niang, she was taken completely by surprise.

"Since you slept with her," said Yüeh-niang, "how could you have failed to detect the fact that she was bent on eloping?"

"She was in the habit," responded Chung-ch'iu, "of sneaking outside during the night, and only returning after what seemed like half a day. I did not know what she was up to."

Yüeh-niang also interrogated Lai-chao, saying, "Since you are in charge of the main gate, how could anyone have escaped without your knowing it?"

"The main gate is locked every night," responded Lai-chao. "She could hardly have gotten out unless she flew off like a bird."

Later on, it was only when the broken tiles on the top of the building were discovered that she realized she must have escaped by going over the roof. Yüeh-niang did not venture to send anyone out to look for her, deciding that she had better repress her feelings and put up with the situation.

Who could have anticipated that when the district magistrate undertook to hear the case he started out by subjecting Ch'ü T'ang to the squeezers, which resulted in the recovery of four gold head ornaments, three silver ornaments, a pair of gold earrings, two silver goblets, five taels worth of loose silver, two outfits of clothing, a handkerchief, and a box. From Cheng Wang he recovered thirty taels of silver, a pair of gold hairpins with bowl-shaped ends, a pin in the shape of a Taoist goddess, and four rings. From Sun Hsüeh-o he recovered a gold clasp for the top of the coiffure, a pair of silver bracelets, five sets of gold buttons, four pairs of silver hairpins, and a package of loose silver. From Midwife Ch'ü he recovered three taels of silver. The magistrate issued a tentative ruling that Lai-wang was guilty of the crime of a servant engaging in fornication with his employer and stealing her goods, that Ch'ü T'ang was also guilty of larceny, both of which were miscellaneous capital crimes, commutable to five years of penal exile, and that the stolen goods were all subject to confiscation by the state. He then sentenced Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ch'ing's former concubine, as well as Midwife Ch'ü, to be subjected to the squeezers before the court. Midwife Ch'ü acknowledged her guilt and was released; but as for Sun Hsüeh-o, the magistrate directed runners from the district yamen to go to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household and request a formal document agreeing to resume responsibility for her.

Sun Hsüeh-o Suffers Abuse in Chou Hsiu's Household

Wu Yüeh-niang consulted with her elder brother Wu K'ai about what to do, and they concluded that since she had already created a scandal by her conduct, there was no point in taking her back, since her presence would only serve to further damage the family's reputation. They therefore paid off the runners and asked them to convey this message to the magistrate, who accordingly called in an official go-between and arranged for her to be put up for sale under judicial auspices.

To resume our story, meanwhile, in the commandant's quarters, Ch'un-mei heard it reported that Sun Hsüeh-o from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household had, thus and so, been abducted by Lai-wang, who had also made off with some valuables, and then taken her to live with him elsewhere; but that the matter had come to light, and she had been taken before the magistrate and was now being offered for sale under judicial auspices. No sooner did Ch'un-mei hear this than it occurred to her that she would like to purchase her and put her to work in the kitchen, so she could slap her in the face, and thus repay her for her former hostility.

She therefore said to Commandant Chou Hsiu, "This Sun Hsüeh-o is a skillful cook, capable of producing excellent fare. Why don't we buy her so she can serve us here at home?"

The commandant forthwith dispatched Chang Sheng and Li An to deliver his card to the magistrate and transmit this request. The magistrate, seeing this as a chance to curry influence by doing a favor, agreed to sell her for a mere eight taels of silver, and, after paying over the money, they brought her back to Chou Hsiu's residence and introduced her first to his principal wife, and then to his concubine Sun Erh-niang. Only after this was she taken to meet Ch'un-mei in her quarters.

Ch'un-mei had only just arisen from her bedstead with its incised gold ornamentation and its brocaded curtains, when her maidservants brought Sun Hsüeh-o in to meet her. Upon seeing that it was Ch'un-mei, all Sun Hsüeh-o could do was to bend low as she stepped forward, kneel down on the floor, and kowtow to her four times.

Ch'un-mei responded by opening her eyes wide, calling for the servant's wife who was on duty at the time, and ordering her, "Take charge of this worthless creature for me, strip off the fret from her coiffure, remove her outer garments, and drive her into the kitchen so she can light the stove and do the cooking for me."

On hearing this, Sun Hsüeh-o had no alternative but to groan to herself in silence. It has always been the case that:

The planks used in wall building are sometimes on top and sometimes on the bottom;
The servile sweeper of the rice will sometimes rise to become head of the granary.²¹
When confronted with low eaves,
How can we not lower our heads?

Upon finding herself in this situation, all Sun Hsüeh-o could do was to remove the fret on her coiffure, change out of her fancy clothing, and head for the kitchen with a sorrowful expression on her face. There is a poem that testifies to this:

The Calico Bag Monk²² has made his way as far as Ming-chou;
With his walking stick and straw sandals he wanders at will.
No matter how many myriad transformations
you can perform;
Every incarnation must cope with its own burden of sorrow.²³

MENG YÜ-LOU IS HAPPY TO MARRY LI KUNG-PI; LI KUNG-PI IN A FIT OF RAGE BEATS YÜ-TSAN

Our hundred years of life pass by
as though in flight;
Among them, the flowering seasons
do not last for long.
When autumn congeals the white dew
the crickets cry;
At twilight during the late spring
the cuckoos weep.
Wealth, eminence, and luxury¹ are blights upon the body;
Renown and great achievements are specters in the eyes.
Spring dreams are phenomena created by humans themselves;
The retributions ordained by azure
Heaven are not unjust.

THE STORY GOES that, one day, Ch'en Ching-chi heard from Auntie Hsüeh that Sun Hsüeh-o from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing had committed adultery with Lai-wang and absconded with him, along with a quantity of stolen property, to some place outside, but that their crimes had come to light, and she had been put up for sale by the district magistrate, and sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, where she was subjected to beating and abuse at the hands of Ch'un-mei both day and night.

Ch'en Ching-chi took advantage of this opportunity to send Auntie Hsüeh to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to say to Yüeh-niang, "I have heard 'wind-borne words' to the effect that Ch'en Ching-chi has openly announced that he no longer wants Hsi-men Ta-chieh as his wife; and that he has drafted formal complaints to submit to the grand coordinator and the regional inspector of the province asserting that Hsi-men Ch'ing, while still alive, had sequestered trunks of gold and silver and other valuables that his family had entrusted to him for safekeeping."

Yüeh-niang, first, because Sun Hsüeh-o had absconded with Lai-wang and made off with a quantity of valuables; second, because the servant Lai-an had run away; and third, because Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu had died, and her obsequies had only just been concluded, already felt herself to be overburdened with:

Seven of this and eight of that.

Consequently, when she heard what Auntie Hsüeh had to say, she was thrown into a state of panic and promptly hired a sedan chair in which to send Hsi-men Ta-chieh back to her husband. She also got together all the furniture, trunks, and other things that she had been provided with as her dowry and had Tai-an hire bearers to deliver them to Ch'en Ching-chi's place.

Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this by saying, "These are merely the things that she brought with her as her dowry. The trunkloads of valuables and gold and silver that my family entrusted to them must also be returned to me."

"Your mother-in-law," reported Auntie Hsüeh, "claims that when your father-in-law was still alive, he only took responsibility for accepting these articles from her dowry, and that she knows nothing of these other trunkloads that you refer to."

Ch'en Ching-chi also demanded that the maidservant Yüan-hsiao should be turned over to him.

When Auntie Hsüeh and Tai-an reported this to Yüeh-niang, she said, "I would prefer not to turn Yüan-hsiao over to him. This maidservant originally worked in Li Chiao-erh's quarters. Right now, I have nobody to look after Hsiao-ko, and I would like to keep her here for that purpose. I would be willing to let him have Chung-ch'iu, however, since she was originally purchased in order to serve Hsi-men Ta-chieh."

But Ch'en Ching-chi refused to accept Chung-ch'iu, and Auntie Hsüeh was obliged to go back and forth repeatedly to negotiate between the two households.

Ch'en Ching-chi's mother, née Chang, finally said to Tai-an, "Brother, when you return home please convey my respects to the First Lady, but since you have so many maidservants available in your household, how can she be so reluctant to relinquish this one on the grounds that she needs her to look after her child? Since she has been serving in Hsi-men Ta-chieh's quarters all this time, and her son-in-law has already deflowered her, how can she be so insistent on retaining her?"

When Tai-an went home and reported this to Yüeh-niang, she found herself:

At a loss for words,² and felt compelled to deliver Yüan-hsiao to Ch'en Ching-chi.

Ch'en Ching-chi was delighted to receive her and remarked to himself, "So it turns out that, somehow or other, things have ended up going my way after all:

Though you may be as devious as any demon,
You'll drink the water I've washed my feet in."

Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment and speak of something else.

To return to the story of District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i's son Li Kung-pi; ever since the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival on which he had caught sight of Wu Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou in front of the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village outside the city, when he had noticed that the two of them were similarly dressed and both good-looking, sent Trifler Chang to identify them, and thereby found out that they were womenfolk from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, he had fallen in love with Meng Yü-lou. He had observed that she had a tall and slender figure, and a face shaped like a melon seed, and though she had a few inconspicuous white pockmarks on her face, her demeanor was romantic and alluring.

It so happens that Li Kung-pi's wife had died, and he had been living the life of a widower for some time. He had engaged go-betweens to look for a suitable wife for him, but so far none of the prospects they came up with appealed to him. Now that he had encountered Meng Yü-lou, his heart was stirred, but:

There was no way he could gain access to her;

and he did not know whether she was prepared to remarry, or whether she would accept him or not. Unexpectedly, when Sun Hsüeh-o's case happened to come before the magistrate's court, and he learned that she had been a member of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, he exerted himself to see to it that the culprits were interrogated with the squeezers before his father's bench, and the stolen property duly retrieved, in the expectation that someone from the Hsi-men Ch'ing household would come to take possession of it. But Yüeh-niang was afraid and refused to send anyone to appear before the court, with the result that Li Kung-pi was disappointed, the stolen property was confiscated by the state, and Sun Hsüeh-o was put up for sale.

At this point, he consulted with his friend the clerk on the staff of the district yamen named Ho Pu-wei, and they decided to send Old Mother T'ao, the licensed go-between, to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to see if a match could be arranged; promising her that if she succeeded in bringing it about, she would no longer be required to report for duty at the yamen and would be rewarded with five taels of silver.

Old Mother T'ao was delighted by this proposition and set out forthwith:

Running as fast as though she had wings, straight to the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.

Lai-chao was standing there at the time and saw Old Mother T'ao come forward, greet him with a bow, and inquire, "Brother, is this the residence of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing?"

"Where have you come from?" asked Lai-chao. "This is the home of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing, but His Honor is deceased. What have you come for?"

"I would trouble you," said Old Mother T'ao, "to go inside and report my arrival. I am the officially licensed go-between of the district yamen, and my name is Old Mother T'ao. The young squire, the son of the district magistrate, has informed me that there is a lady in your household who wishes to be married, and I have come to respectfully propose a match between them."

"You old baggage!" Lai-chao shouted at her. "How unreasonable can you get? His Honor, the head of this household, has been dead for more than a year, and there are only two of his ladies left, who are both bent on preserving their widowhood, and are not about to marry anyone. As the saying goes:

Even to escape wild winds and violent rains,
One should not seek to enter a widow's door.³

How can a go-between like yourself:

As if you didn't know any better, barge in to propose such a match? You'd better get out of here. If the ladies in the rear compound find out about it, you're likely to get a good beating for your pains."

Old Mother T'ao merely laughed at this, saying, "Brother, as the saying goes:

Even if the order of an official or clerk is wrong,
The person deputed to carry it out is not to blame.⁴

If the young squire had not sent me on this mission, I would hardly have ventured to come on my own initiative. No matter whether she is willing to remarry or not, I would trouble you to go inside and convey the proposal so that I can report back on my mission."

"So be it," responded Lai-chao.

"To do someone else a favor,
Is to do a favor to oneself.⁵

If you will wait a little while, I will go inside and convey your message. Of the two ladies of the household, one of them has a son, and the other does not. Which of the two ladies do you think might be willing to remarry?"

Old Mother T'ao responded, "The young squire from the district yamen said that he had seen her out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival, and that it was the lady with a few white pockmarks on her face."

When Lai-chao heard this, he went back to the rear compound and reported, thus and so, to Yüeh-niang, saying, "The district yamen has sent an official go-between to come here, and she is waiting outside."

This caught Yüeh-niang by surprise, and she exclaimed, "Not even half a word of what goes on here in our household is ever leaked abroad. How could anyone outside know anything about it?"

“The young squire from the district yamen,” responded Lai-chao, “caught sight of the lady in question out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch’ing-ming Festival. He says that the lady in question is the one with a few white pockmarks on her face.”

“It must be Sister Meng the Third that he’s referring to,” said Yüeh-niang. “It would seem that:

Even during the twelfth month the frozen heart of the turnip is capable of being moved.⁶

All of a sudden, she wants to better her condition by marrying someone, does she? Truly:

In this world even the depth of the ocean may be gauged;
It is the human heart alone that is difficult to measure.”⁷

So saying, she went into Meng Yü-lou’s quarters, where she sat down and said, “Sister Meng the Third, there is something I would like to ask you about. There is a go-between out front, who says that the young squire from the district yamen claims that he saw you on the day of the Ch’ing-ming Festival, and that you would like to better your condition by getting married. Is there any truth to this?”

Gentle reader take note: On that occasion:

Without coincidences there would be no stories.

It has always been true that:

A marriage affinity connects people by a single thread.

On that day, out in the suburbs, when Meng Yü-lou observed that the young squire possessed a handsome demeanor, was:

As romantic and dashing as can be,
and that the two of them were about the same age, as well as the fact that he was adept at horsemanship and archery:
Their mutual feelings were visible in their four eyes,⁸
There was no longer any need to express them in words.

The only problem was that she did not know whether he already had a wife or not.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she figured to herself,

“My husband is already dead, and I have not borne a child of my own. Although the First Lady has a son, when he grows up in the days to come, since:

Everyone cares the most for his own flesh and blood, he is sure to cling to his own mother, and I will face the fact that:

The fallen tree no longer provides shade,
and that I will be obliged to:

Try to dip up water with a bamboo basket.

I have also observed that since Yüeh-niang gave birth to Hsiao-ko, her disposition has changed, and she does not care for me as much as she used to. I might as well take a step forward on my own, and seek a refuge where:

The fallen leaves can return to the root.

Why should I insist on foolishly preserving my widowhood here, only to end up:

Squandering the springtime season of my youth,
And forgoing the pleasures of my early years?”

She had just been engaged in pondering this question when Yüeh-niang unexpectedly came in and spoke to her about it. Thus it turned out to be the very gentleman that she had been attracted to out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch’ing-ming Festival that was expressing an interest in her.

Meng Yü-lou Considers Marrying Li Kung-pi

She was both delighted and embarrassed by this development, but although she responded by saying, "First Lady, don't believe any such nonsense, I never expressed such a wish," the blood flew to her cheeks.

Truly:

Suppressing her embarrassment, she is disinclined to open her mouth in public, Tidying the hair over her temples, without a word,
she only adjusts her tresses.

"This is the sort of question it is up to the individual to decide," said Yüeh-niang. "I can't be bothered by such things." So saying, she called in Lai-chao and told him, "You go out and invite that go-between to come inside."

Lai-chao, accordingly, went out to the front gate and called for Old Mother T'ao to follow him back to the rear compound into the parlor in Yüeh-niang's quarters, where Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet was displayed in the position of honor at the head of the room. When Old Mother T'ao had finished exchanging the customary amenities with her host, she sat down, and the young maidservant Hsiu-ch'un poured her a serving of tea.

When she had finished her tea, Yüeh-niang asked, "Go-between, what brings you here?"

Old Mother T'ao responded by saying, "As for me:

If I did not have a reason to do so, I would not visit the Hall of the Three Treasures.⁹

I have come at the behest of the son of the district magistrate, who asked me to respectfully report that there is a lady in your household who wishes to be married, and to propose a match with her."

"Even if there were a lady in the household who wished to be married," responded Yüeh-niang, "no word of this has been noised abroad, so how did the young squire find out about it?"

"The young squire told me," reported Old Mother T'ao, "that on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival, out in the suburbs, he had observed the lady in question with his own eyes, and seen that she had a tall and slender figure, and a face shaped like a melon seed, and that there were a few inconspicuous white pockmarks on her face. That is the lady he is interested in."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, needless to say, she realized that he was referring to Meng Yü-lou.

Thereupon, she ushered Old Mother T'ao over to Meng Yü-lou's quarters, where they sat down in the parlor, and waited for some time before Meng Yü-lou, after performing her ablutions and putting on her makeup, came out to receive them.

Old Mother T'ao greeted her with a bow and said, "So this is the lady in question. Sure enough:

The story is not untrue.

Her caliber is outstanding,¹⁰

Without peer in this world.

She is clearly fit to be the legitimate wife of the young squire. Just look:

If scanned from top to bottom,

Her glamour is incomparable;

If surveyed from head to foot,

Her glamour runs downward apace."

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this and said, "Mother, don't talk such nonsense. Just tell us the present age of the young squire, whether he is married or not, whether he has any concubines at his disposal, what his name is, the location of his native place, and whether he holds any official position or not. Be sure to tell us only the truth, without lying about anything."

"My Heavens," protested Old Mother T'ao, "I am the go-between officially appointed by the district magistrate and am not given to lying like the others may do.

If I've got a sentence,

I'll say that sentence, without any falsification. His Honor the district magistrate is more than fifty years old, and the young squire in question is his only offspring. He was born on the twenty-third day of the first month at eight o'clock in the morning during the year of the horse, so this year he is thirty years old. He is currently enrolled in the Superior College of the National University and is destined soon to become a provincial graduate or a holder of the chin-shih degree. He not only:

Commands a bellyful of literature,¹¹

but is also:

Adept at archery and horsemanship.¹²

As for the works of the hundred schools, there is little that he has not mastered. His wife died some two years ago, so all he has at his disposal now is a maidservant who entered his household as part of his wife's dowry and doesn't amount to anything. That is why he is looking for a wife to take charge of his household but has not so far found one of:

Appropriate social and economic standing.¹³

That is why I have respectfully come here to propose a match on his behalf. I have been promised that if the marriage is successfully arranged, I will no longer be required to report for duty at the district yamen and will receive a substantial reward to boot. If the mistress of your household agrees to this match, His Honor has also promised that in the future the household will be relieved of any requirements for corvée labor, or land taxes on your family graveyard; and that if anyone should try to take advantage of you, all you need do is report it, and he will have the culprit arrested and subjected to punishment before the bench."

Meng Yü-lou responded by asking, "Does the young squire have any male or female children, and where is his native place? I fear that when his father's term of office expires, I may be made to traverse:

A thousand mountains and a myriad streams.

My relatives are all here, but I would probably have to leave them behind in order to accompany him."

"The young squire has fathered no male or female children," responded Old Mother T'ao. "He is quite companionless. He is a native of Tsao-ch'iang district in Chen-ting prefecture in the vicinity of the Northern Capital, which is no more than six or seven hundred li north of the Yellow River. The wealth of his household is such that:

The paths run crisscross between the fields,

The mules and horses compose teeming herds,

And the male dependents are without number.

The memorial arches spanning the horse path, bear placards inscribed by the grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor, with an inscription by the Emperor himself standing above them all. It is all:

Resplendent enough to impress anyone.

Now if he should succeed in taking you into his household as his legitimate wife, and go on to obtain an appointment as an official in the future, you would then be entitled to receive a patent of nobility inscribed on patterned damask, to ride in a carriage embellished with seven aromatic spices, and to be addressed by the honorific title of lady. Is that not an appealing prospect?"

Meng Yü-lou was so impressed by this single speech of Old Mother T'ao's that she expressed herself to be:

Willing a thousand times if not ten thousand times.

She then summoned her maidservant Lan-hsiang and had her set up a table and provide tea and snacks for the go-between, saying, "Please don't take offense at the fact that I have insisted on asking so many questions, but the number of you go-betweens who resort to telling falsehoods is extremely great. You start out by eloquently describing things as if:

A flurry of flowers were descending from Heaven,¹⁴

Or golden lotuses were bursting from the ground;¹⁵

but when they are concluded, they don't amount to anything at all. I have, myself, had the experience of being grievously deceived."

"My good lady," protested Old Mother T'ao, "you must evaluate each case individually.

The clear is ever clear,

The turbid ever turbid.

The reputation of the good is often damaged by the bad. I do not purvey falsehoods but try my best as a matchmaker to bring about good matches for people. If you agree to accept the proposal, give me a card stating the year, month, day, and hour of your birth, so I can report back to the young squire with it."

Meng Yü-lou, accordingly, got out a piece of scarlet silk and had Tai-an take it out to Manager Fu Ming in the shop upfront so he could inscribe it with the eight characters that determined her horoscope.

Wu Yüeh-niang then said to her, "Originally, it was Auntie Hsüeh who arranged your marriage into the household. At present, it would be appropriate to send a page boy to summon Auntie Hsüeh, so the two go-betweens can proceed together to deliver the card with your vital statistics, and arrange the match between you."

Shortly thereafter, they sent Tai-an to summon Auntie Hsüeh, and when she saw Old Mother T'ao, she greeted her with a bow, in the way that:

Fellow professionals acknowledge each other;

and the two of them set out together with the card in hand, going out the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence and heading for the district yamen in order to report back to the young squire.

One of them was the matchmaker from this side;

The other was the go-between from that side.

With their two mouths, they had a total of forty-eight teeth between them.

On this mission, they could be counted on to boast that:

The Goddess in the Moon, Ch'ang-o,¹⁶

is looking for a mate;

The Goddess of Witch's Mountain¹⁷

is wedding King Hsiang.¹⁸

As they went their way, Old Mother T'ao asked Auntie Hsüeh, "So you were the original go-between for this lady, were you?"

"That's right, I was," replied Auntie Hsüeh.

"Originally," asked Old Mother T'ao, "what family was she a daughter of, and was this marriage that you arranged for her a second marriage?"

Auntie Hsüeh responded by giving her a full account, word for word, of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had originally married her as a widow from the Yang family.

Old Mother T'ao, on noticing that the card with the eight characters that determined her horoscope stated that she was a thirty-six-year-old woman who was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, said, "I fear that the young squire may consider her to be too old for him. What are we to do about that? He is only thirty years old at present, so she is six years older than he is."

"Let's take this card," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "and show it to a fortune-teller along the way, so he can calculate whether her horoscope presents any obstacles or not. If there are any problems with it, we would not be overstepping the bounds if we were to make her out to be a few years younger than she is."

As they continued on their way, they did not encounter any itinerant fortune-tellers sounding their clappers in the street, but in the distance, on the south side of the road, they saw a fortune-telling booth of blue cotton fabric, on which there were displayed two columns of large characters that read:

Tzu-p'ing¹⁹ will predict your fate,

be it noble or base;

The iron brush will determine your success or failure.

Whoever should come to have their fortunes foretold;
Will be dealt the truth without any prevarication.

Within the booth a table had been set up, behind which there sat a practitioner who was:

Adept at calligraphy and quick at calculation, named Master Ling. The two go-betweens approached him and bowed in greeting, at which he asked them to be seated.

Auntie Hsüeh addressed him, saying, "We would trouble you, sir, to calculate the fortune of a certain woman for us."

She then reached into her sleeve and pulled out three coins in lieu of a fee, saying, "Pray don't disdain this meager sum, but deign to accept it for the time being. We happened to be passing by and did not have any more money with us."

"If this relates to a marriage proposal," said Master Ling, "tell me the eight characters that designate the horoscope of the person in question."

Old Mother T'ao then handed him the card with this information on it, so he could evaluate her age and the eight characters of her horoscope.

Master Ling said, "So this does concern a marriage proposal."

He then:

Calculated on the joints of his fingers, gave his abacus a shake, and proceeded to pronounce, "The horoscope for this woman indicates that she is thirty-six-years-old at the present time, and that she was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month; that is to say, in a chia-tzu year, in a ping-tzu month,²⁰ on a hsin-mao day, during the keng-tzu hour, which calls for the analysis of the horoscopic category 'seal ribbon.'²¹ Working backwards, as one does with female horoscopes, she is now in the 'decennial period of fate' designated by the combination ping-shen. When the stems ping and hsin occur in the same horoscope, it indicates that in the future she is sure to hold a position of authority and enjoy the prestige of a principal wife. In the 'four pillars' of her horoscope the 'husband star' occurs more than once. Although this prosperous portent indicates that she is fated to benefit her husband, gain wealth, and enjoy her husband's favor, eventually she is sure to suffer some adversities. Has she met with any such setbacks, or not?"

"She has already lost two husbands," responded Auntie Hsüeh.

"If that is so," continued Master Ling, "in the future she will find a husband who was born in the year of the horse."

"Will she bear any sons in the future?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.

"Her horoscope indicates," said Master Ling, "that it will not be until she is forty-years-old that she will bear an only son to support her in her old age. She will be blessed with good fortune for the rest of her life, and enjoy incomparable wealth and honor, glory and luxury."

Taking up a brush, he then proceeded to compose a poem of eight lines about her future prospects, which read as follows:

The time when flowers and fruits have bloomed and been harvested is noteworthy;
She is delighted to marry a husband with the prospect of attaining high office.
Her seductive appearance has lost nothing of the loveliness of the river plum;
She will doff her bridal veil thrice and let two husbands paint her eyebrows.²² Holding each other's hands, they will embark along the way to the jade palace; Hiding her bashfulness, she will undertake to proffer the golden wedding goblet.
Looking forward to the day when the horse's head will ascend into the heavens;
She will consent to abandon the tiger's skin
so she can opt for something better.

Auntie Hsüeh questioned him, saying, "Sir, what is the meaning of the two lines:

Looking forward to the day when the horse's
head will ascend into the heavens;
She will consent to abandon the tiger's skin
so she can opt for something better?

We don't understand their significance. Pray be good enough to explain them to us."

"As for the horse's head," said Master Ling, "the lady in question is about to marry a husband who was born in the year of the horse, which is an auspicious star in her horoscope, indicating that she is fated to:

Enjoy a life of glory and luxury."²³

The tiger's skin refers to her deceased husband who was born in the year of the tiger. Although he did care for her, she was only a concubine in his household. In the future, her husband will have a successful career, and she will live to the age of sixty-seven, with a son to look after her, before her life comes to an end.

Husband and wife will grow old together."²⁴

The two go-betweens, upon receiving this statement of her prospects, went on to say, "It is true that the man she hopes to marry was born in the year of the horse, but we fear that the match may be rejected on the grounds that she is too old for him. It would look better if you could alter the horoscope to make her two years younger than she is."

"If you want to change it," Master Ling responded, "I'll alter the year of her birth from chia-tzu to ting-mao, which would make her out to be thirty-three years old."²⁵

Auntie Hsüeh went on to ask, "Will this alteration of her horoscope accord with that of someone born in the year of the horse, or not?"

Master Ling responded, "The stem ting is associated with the element fire, and the stem keng is associated with the element metal. When fire is employed to smelt metal a superior vessel may be produced. It should be propitious."

Thereupon, he altered the horoscope to make her thirty-three years old, and the two go-betweens took their leave, exited the fortune-telling booth, and headed straight for the district yamen.

The young squire was sitting inside at the time, and the gate-keeper went in to announce their arrival. After a time, the two go-betweens were summoned before him, knelt down on the ground, and kowtowed.

"Where does that other woman come from?" the young squire inquired.

"She is the go-between who negotiated her former marriage," replied Old Mother T'ao.

She then proceeded to recount the progress they had made, saying, "The lady in question is a person of incomparable caliber, but she is a little older than you are, and I did not have the presumption to act on my own. In order to let Your Honor decide, I have acquired a card with her horoscope for your perusal."

So saying, she handed the card to him.

When the young squire, Li Kung-pi, saw that it stated that she was thirty-three years old and was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, he said, "It doesn't matter if she is two or three years older than I am."

"Your Honor is an experienced observer," interjected Auntie Hsüeh. "It has always been true that:

When the wife is two years older,

Yellow gold never molders;

When the wife is three years older,

Yellow gold piles up like boulders.

As for this lady:

Her caliber is outstanding.

She is:

Good-natured and agreeable in disposition;

and as for her familiarity with the works of the hundred schools, and the ability to take charge of a household:

That naturally goes without saying."²⁶

"If she's as good as all that," the young squire responded, "and I've already had a chance to look her over, there's no need to arrange a formal viewing. We can have the yin-yang master select a propitious day and hour for the wedding, and go to her place to perform the tea-presentation ceremony."²⁷

The two go-betweens asked, "When shall we come back to receive your instructions?"

"There is no reason to delay," the young squire replied. "The two of you can come back to check with me tomorrow, and then return to her place to settle matters."

He then instructed his attendants, saying, "Give each of them a tael of silver as a reward for their efforts."

The two go-betweens were pleased at this and went happily on their way. But no more of this.

When the young squire, Li Kung-pi, realized that the match was going to take place, he was so delighted he could scarcely contain himself and called in his friend on the yamen staff, Ho Pu-wei, to consult about it. He informed his father, District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, of his intentions and sent for the yin-yang master, who selected the eighth day of the fourth month for the betrothal ceremony, and the fifteenth day of the month as a propitious day and hour for him to bring the bride over his threshold. He then weighed out a quantity of silver and commissioned Ho Pu-wei and Trifler Chang to purchase the tea, auspicious red ornaments, wine, and other gifts for the occasion, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

The next day, the two go-betweens, after ascertaining the proposed dates, went to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household to report back to Wu Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou on their mission. Truly:

Marriage affinities are determined in one's former life;²⁸

During which jade has been planted in the Indigo Field.²⁹

On the eighth day of the fourth month, in the district yamen, on the young squire's behalf, there were prepared sixteen trays of preserved fruit, tea and pastries, a headdress of gold filigree, a set of gold head ornaments, a girdle with an agate buckle and seven tinkling pendants, gold and silver bracelets and bangles, and the like. In addition, there were two robes of palace-style crimson brocade, four outfits of figured clothing, and thirty taels of silver as a bride-price. What with all the muslin, cotton, and silk fabrics, there were more than twenty loads of gifts. The two go-betweens accompanied them, and Ho Pu-wei from the yamen staff took charge of the procession, as they made their way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence and performed the ceremony of presenting the betrothal gifts.

On the fifteenth, the district yamen dispatched a bunch of couriers and idlers who had been hired for the purpose to carry Meng Yü-lou's beds and curtains along with the trunks in which her trousseau was packed. Yüeh-niang looked on and directed them to remove all the furnishings from her quarters. Originally, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was still alive, he had taken one of the gilt lacquer beds with retractable steps that had been part of Meng Yü-lou's dowry and given it to Hsi-men Ta-chieh as part of her trousseau. Yüeh-niang now took the bedstead of inlaid mother-of-pearl from P'an Chin-lien's quarters and turned it over to her to make up for it. Meng Yü-lou proposed to take her maidservant Lan-hsiang with her, while leaving Hsiao-luan behind to assist Yüeh-niang in looking after Hsiao-ko.

Yüeh-niang objected to this, however, saying, "How could I be justified in retaining one of the maidservants from your quarters? After all, Hsiao-ko already has Chung-ch'iu, Hsiu-ch'un, and the wet nurse to take care of him, which is more than enough."

Meng Yü-lou merely chose to leave behind a pair of silver flasks of Mohammedan manufacture for Hsiao-ko to play with, and to serve as a keepsake, while taking all the rest of her belongings with her.

That evening, the district yamen dispatched a large sedan chair borne by four bearers and four pairs of red silk lanterns encased in networks of steel wires, accompanied by eight lictors, to come fetch Meng Yü-lou. She was wearing a gilt-ridged cap:

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, along with pearl earrings, her body was clad in a scarlet full-sleeved robe, fastened at the waist by a girdle with an agate buckle in a gold setting and seven tinkling pendants, over a willow-yellow skirt sprigged with flowers. She first performed a farewell obeisance before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet and then kowtowed to Yüeh-niang.

"Third Sister Meng," said Yüeh-niang, "you are cruel. Once you have gone, I will be left alone, all by myself, with no one to keep me company."

The two of them held hands and wept together for a while, after which, the members of the household, both high and low, accompanied her to the front gate, where she donned her bridal veil of gold-flaked red gauze with the help of the two go-betweens and took the golden "precious vase"³⁰ in her arms. Since Yüeh-niang was preserving her widowhood, she did not feel that she should venture abroad but invited Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, the wife of Han Ming-ch'uan, to escort her to the district yamen, riding in a large sedan chair, wearing a gown of figured scarlet material, over a kingfisher-blue skirt, while:

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets.

The people along the street remarked to each other, "This is the Third Lady of the official Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, who is marrying the son of His Honor the district magistrate. Since this is a propitious day and hour for the wedding, she is on her way to be carried over his threshold."

There were some who had favorable things to say about it,

As well as those who had critical things to say about it.

Those who had favorable comments to make said, "Originally, His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing had a position in society to maintain, and now that he is dead, his First Lady is the only one of the women in his household who is determined to preserve her widowhood, which is truly admirable. She has given birth to a son, and her household is no longer able to support such a large number of people, so she has allowed the others to go their own way, which is an appropriate attitude to take."

Those who had critical comments to make, when:

Gossiping in the streets and discoursing in the alleys, pointedly remarked, "This is the third concubine from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing who is now about to remarry. Originally, while that rascal was still alive, he was:

Defiant of both Heaven and principle,³¹

Covetous of wealth and given to lust, and guilty of seducing other peoples' wives, and now that he is dead, the women in his household are absconding with his property.

Some are marrying other people,

Some are plundering his wealth,

Some are taking furtive lovers,

Some are resorting to thievery.

The feathers of the pheasant are being plucked one by one.

As the saying goes:

Retribution may take place as much as thirty years hence;

But here, retribution is taking place

before our very eyes."

The people on the sidelines all expressed their uninhibited views along these lines.

When Meng Yü-lou's elder sister had escorted the bride to the district yamen and seen that the beds and curtains and so forth in her trousseau were properly displayed, she remained there to enjoy the wedding feast before returning home. The bridegroom Li Kung-pi then summoned Auntie Hsüeh and Old Mother T'ao before him and rewarded each of them with five taels of silver and a length of festive red silk, before sending them on their way. That night the bride and groom consummated their marriage:

Emulating the pleasures of fish in the water, and Exhausting the felicities of connubial bliss.

The next day, Wu Yüeh-niang sent the ritually prescribed gifts of tea and food to celebrate the consummation of the marriage. Aunt Yang was already dead, but Meng the Elder's wife, Meng the Second's wife, and Meng Yü-lou's elder sister also sent ritual gifts of tea to the district yamen. Li Kung-pi, for his part, sent replies to his newly acquired female relatives, inviting them all to come and participate in the "third-day celebrations," including the erection of a tower of variegated bunting in the shape of a mountain, and a feast where they were to be entertained by musicians and singing girls from the licensed quarter, who would greet them with martial music, and perform pieces from the southern-style plays known as hsi-wen.

On that day, Wu Yüeh-niang went to the district yamen in a large sedan chair to participate in the "third-day celebrations" and attend the feast.

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, while her body was clad in a scarlet full-sleeved robe, a flower-sprigged skirt, and a gilded girdle. As she was drinking wine in the rear hall, the district magistrate's wife came out to keep her company.

On Yüeh-niang's return home after this event, she remembered the way the company had enjoyed themselves:

Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade;
whereas, when she arrived home, the courtyard in the rear compound was deserted, and there was no one to welcome her. This reminded her of how she and her sister wives had enjoyed things together in former days, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was still alive. In those days, when she came home from a social engagement, they would all come out to welcome her, and even a long bench would prove insufficient to seat them all; whereas now, there was nobody there. Happening to bump into Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, she was overcome with grief before she knew it and started to weep out loud. Only after she had wept for some time did her maidservant Hsiao-yü succeed in persuading her to stop and dry her eyes. Truly:

The innermost feelings of one's life³² are known to no one else;³³
Only the bright moon shining through the window discerns them.³⁴

We will say no more, for the moment, about Yüeh-niang's grief.

To resume our story, Li Kung-pi and Meng Yü-lou, being:

A woman of beauty and a man of talent,
enjoyed each other:

Like fish sporting in the water.
They fit together as closely as the lid on a lamp-oil jar.³⁵

Every day, he:

Enjoyed himself with his new wife, remaining with her in the nuptial chamber, and:

Not straying a step from her side.³⁶

When he contemplated Meng Yü-lou's face, it seemed to him that:

Such a vision is not exhaustible;
Such a view exceeds comprehension.

The more he gazed at her the more he was enamored by her. He also appreciated the fact that she had brought with her as part of her dowry two maidservants, one of whom, Lan-hsiang, was seventeen years old and could play musical instruments and sing, while the other, Hsiao-luan, was fourteen years old, and beautiful as well. He was:

Delighted in his heart,

by this to such an extent that he scarcely knew what to do with himself. There is a poem that testifies to this:

How praiseworthy are this woman of beauty and this man of talent; Heaven has devised this marriage affinity³⁷
as propriety dictates.
Amid the twelve peaks of Witch's Mountain³⁸ clouds and rain mingle;³⁹
Their mutual feelings will surely sustain a lifetime of bliss.⁴⁰

It so happens that Li Kung-pi's deceased wife had left him with a senior maidservant, about thirty years of age, named Yü-tsan, who was given to:

Putting on makeup and applying powder, and was a past master at mischief making. She did up her hair in two curled knots on either side of her head but covered it with a kerchief, held in place with a gold lamé headband so that it looked like a gentlewoman's fret, and studded it with brass pins and waxen ornaments that looked like fallen leaves and withered flowers. Her ears were adorned with a pair of muskmelon-shaped pendants. Her body was clad in a skirt and jacket of an off-shade of green and a strange shade of red that revealed glimpses of her undergarments in front and her posterior behind, so that she appeared to others like nothing so much as a rat dressed in lotus leaves. On her feet she wore a pair of cut-velvet moccasins that were:

Oil-stained inside and out,
Mortifying even to Liu Hai,⁴¹
Resembling a pair of boats, Manifesting four apertures, and as much as a foot and two inches in length. She smeared her face with lead powder so that it displayed:

A spot of white on the east,
A blotch of red on the west, looking for all the world like the surface of a fresh winter melon. In front of people, she gave vent to:

Simpleminded and officious foolishness,
Putting on airs and assuming attitudes.

Before the young squire took Meng Yü-lou into the household as his wife, she devoted herself every day to boiling his soup and cooking his rice, waiting upon him assiduously.

Though not spoken to, she forced herself to speak,
Though not smiled at, she forced herself to smile;

exhibiting a wealth of feeling. But after he married Meng Yü-lou, and she observed that he slept with her every night, that he was so close to her that they were:

Like glue and like lacquer, and that he no longer paid any attention to her, this maidservant began to give vent to fits of anger.

One day, when the young squire was in his study reading a book, this Yü-tsan prepared a cup of fine tea, flavored with fruit kernels, brought it to his study on a tray which she held with two hands, and smiled ingratiatingly as she lifted aside the portiere and took it inside to present to him. Who could have anticipated that the young squire, after reading his book for a while, had lain his head down on his desk and fallen asleep.

"Father," Yü-tsan called out to him, "who else is as fond of you as I am? I have taken the trouble to prepare this cup of fine tea for you, while that new wife of yours is still fast asleep under her bedclothes. Why has she not bothered to get one of her maidservants to bring you a cup of tea?"

On seeing that the young squire was taking a nap, she went up to him and called out again, but he did not respond, whereupon she exclaimed, "You old beggar! You labored so hard on your nocturnal business last night that you wore yourself out, did you? And now, you are dozing and nodding off in broad daylight. You had better get up and drink your tea."

She managed to wake him up, and when he saw who it was, he blurted out at her, "You crazy uncouth slave! Put the tea down, and get out of here."

Yü-tsan's face turned red with humiliation, and she dumped the tea down on the desk in a fit of pique and left the room, saying,

"You wouldn't know a favor if you saw one.

I went out of my way with the best of intentions to bring you a cup of tea early in the morning, only to be railed at this way. As the saying goes:

An ugly woman is a jewel in the household,⁴²
A lovable one is only a source of trouble.

If I am so ugly, you must have been blind from the beginning, since no one had to persuade you to take me on. That better-looking one is hardly worth as much as my juicy cunt."

When the young squire heard this, he caught up with her and kicked her twice, as hard as he could, with his leather boot.

On leaving his presence, Yü-tsan put on a long face, as high as the rafters. From that time on, she no longer applied makeup to her face, and no longer boiled tea or prepared meals. She refused to address Meng Yü-lou as mistress but insisted on employing the pronouns you and I with her. When no one else was around, she would park her posterior on Meng Yü-lou's bed just as if it were her own, but Meng Yü-lou simply ignored her.

She also endeavored, behind Meng Yü-lou's back, to establish her superiority over Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, saying to them, "You should not address me as sister, but as aunt, since I and your mistress are of roughly equal status in the household."

She also went on to admonish them, "But only address me that way in private, and not in front of your master. You must do as I tell you every day, and perform your tasks conscientiously. If you refuse to obey my instructions, I'll put you to work with the coal shovel."

Later on, after she felt that the young squire had pointedly ignored her several times, she began to get lazy, sleeping until the sun was high in the sky before getting up, and refusing to prepare meals or sweep the floor.

Meng Yü-lou, consequently, instructed Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, saying, "You had better not depend on Yü-tsan any longer. The two of you should go to the kitchen yourselves to prepare the meals and serve them to the master."

This only had the effect of angering Yü-tsan further, and she proceeded to:

Lose her temper and become abusive,
Throwing plates and saucers around.

She would go into the kitchen and strike Hsiao-luan and curse Lan-hsiang, saying, "You lousy little slave, and you little whore:

Even when using the pestle and millstone to hull grain and grind it,
One must come first and then the other.⁴³

Was it your mistress who came first, or was it me? Since the three of you have usurped my place, I don't feel like exerting myself any longer. Formerly, that mistress of mine who has passed away never had the discourtesy to address me by my given name as Yü-tsan; but within a few days after the three of you moved in, you have taken to addressing me by my real name. Do you take me to be no more than a servant of yours, or what? Before the lot of you moved in, Father and I enjoyed the pleasure of:

Sharing the same bed and a single pillow; and there was seldom a day when we did not sleep until breakfast time before getting up. The two of us were so fond of each other, we were:

Like sugar mixed with honey;⁴⁴
Like honey stirred with butter.

And there was scarcely anything in the household that did not pass through my hands. But ever since you arrived, you have:

Appropriated my honey jar,
And smashed it to pieces.

As a result, my marriage affinity has been forcibly disrupted, and I have been relegated to sleeping in the parlor on a cold bench, as though I were in a public shelter, and am no longer able to get so much as a taste of that thingamajig of my master's. I have no way of expressing the resentment this has caused me. Originally, when you were in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, you were merely his third concubine and were known by your personal name as Yü-lou, as if I didn't know all about it. Now that you're here:

You know it and I know it, and it would be better for everyone if you were to slack off a bit, instead of behaving officiously, putting on meretricious airs, or:

Summoning this one and calling for that.

Since when was I bought by you, and thus subject to your control?"

She did not realize it, but Meng Yü-lou in her room overheard this tirade and nearly fainted with anger, her face changing color and her hands trembling, but she did not venture to protest, or to tell the young squire about it.

One day, when the weather was hot, it turned out to be one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

In the evening, the young squire proposed to have Yü-tsan heat some water in the kitchen and bring a bathtub into the bedroom so he could bathe with Meng Yü-lou.

"Have Lan-hsiang heat the water for us," objected Meng Yü-lou. "Don't have her do it."

But the young squire refused to agree to this, saying, "I am making a point of having her do it because I don't want to pamper that slave any further."

When Yü-tsan saw that the young squire wanted the water so he and his wife could:

Bathe together in the orchid-scented bath, Emulate the pleasures of fish in the water, and Exhaust the felicities of connubial bliss,

she was not in the best of moods.

Carrying the bathtub into the bedroom, she plumped it down on the floor and then went back to heat a large cauldron of boiling water, while muttering to herself, "Whoever saw the likes of this wanton whore? What with her impulsive capriciousness she is always imposing on me. Though it's only that wantonly juicy cunt of hers, she never lets three days go by without requiring water to bathe it with. When I used to sleep with the master, I would let months go by without exposing mine to so much as a drop of water and never felt that my Buddha's eye had been contaminated; whereas this whore has imposed on me two or three times already."

This tirade of hers commenced while she was leaving the room, and Meng Yü-lou overheard it but did not respond. When the young squire heard it, however, he became enraged. Without finishing his bath, while still stark naked, he slipped on his sandals, picked up a stick from the head of the bed, and headed after her.

Meng Yü-lou tried to stop him, saying, "Let her curse away. While you're enraged this way, I fear that while your body is all hot, if you expose yourself to the breeze, you may come down with a chill. It's hardly worth the risk."

The young squire would not be appeased, however, and said, "Don't you interfere. This slave is guilty of gross impropriety."

So saying, he went forward, grabbed her by the hair with one hand, pulled her over onto the floor, lifted up his stick, and unleashed a series of blows that fell on her like rain. Despite the fact that Meng Yü-lou tried to restrain him from the sidelines, he delivered twenty or thirty strokes to her body, which threw the maidservant into a panic.

Li Kung-pi in a Fit of Rage Beats Yü-tsan

Getting to her knees, she appealed to him, saying, "Father, don't beat me any more. I have something to say to you."
 The young squire castigated her, saying, "You lousy slave! Go ahead and say it then."
 There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

Father, suppress your rage and abate your anger.⁴⁵
 Listen attentively to what I have to say to you.
 Originally, you spent eight taels of silver
 as a bride-price for me;
 Acquiring me so that I could take charge
 of your household,
 And deal with its sesame oil, salt, soy sauce, and vinegar.
 Every serving of food or tea
 that you consumed,
 Was prepared and cleaned up by me.
 After my mistress passed away,
 You promoted me to the position of a stand-in for her.
 The two of us came to share the same coverlet and the same bed,
 And had wonderful times together.

It was only because you put me in charge that I consented to do this.
How could I know that you would deceive me, saying you would not remarry;
Only to come up, today, with this nefarious scheme of yours,
Obliterating our past love, as if it had never happened?
I call out, "Father,
You are too cruel at heart.
I will no longer remain in your household,
But am prepared to marry
another husband.

When the young squire had heard her out, he grew even angrier and gave her another few severe strokes with the stick.

Meng Yü-lou remonstrated with him, saying, "As long as she is willing to go, there is no need for you to beat her any further. Don't let yourself get worked up into such a state."

The young squire, accordingly, ordered a servant to summon the go-between Old Mother T'ao to take Yü-tsan away, sell her off, and come pay him back. But no more of this. Truly:

When a mosquito gets slapped with a fan,

It is for hurting people with its mouth.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

When most kinds of birds chirp, people are happy to hear them;
But when it is crows that start to caw,
how do people react?
Those who see them are vexed, and those who hear them spit;
Only because they are much too garrulous
in front of them.⁴⁶

CH'EN CHING-CHI IS ENTRAPPED IN YEN-CHOU PREFECTURE; WU YÜEH-NIANG CREATES A STIR IN THE DISTRICT YAMEN

When one has occasion for self-esteem

THE STORY GOES that on that day, after the young squire Li Kung-pi had given Yü-tsan a beating, he summoned Old Mother T'ao to take her away, sold her for eight taels of silver, and used the proceeds to buy a seventeen-year-old maidservant named Man-t'ang to take charge of the kitchen in her place. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ta-chieh returned to Ch'en Ching-chi's residence and brought with her the beds and curtains, the items from her dowry, and the trunkloads of other goods:

Every third day they squabbled, and Every fifth day they quarreled.

Ch'en Ching-chi approached his mother, née Chang, to ask if he could borrow some money from her as capital with which to start a business for himself. His maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan had also borrowed fifty taels of silver from his mother, with which to seek a new position for himself. Ch'en Ching-chi, while drunk, got into a shouting match over this at the door of his uncle's residence, which so upset his uncle that he went elsewhere to borrow the money he needed in order to seek a new position and returned the money he had borrowed to Ch'en Ching-chi's mother. This had the effect of upsetting his mother, née Chang, to such an extent that she fell ill and took to her bed, taking medications all day long, and calling in doctors to treat her. Finding herself unable to resist his obstreperous demands, she finally weighed out two hundred taels of silver and turned it over to him so that he, with the help of their servant Ch'en Ting, could open up two rooms on the street-front of their property in which to launch a piece goods store.

Every day, he got together with his cronies Lu the Second, Yang the Elder, and other:

Foxy fellows and doglike companions,¹⁰ who forgathered in the shop to strum the balloon guitar, play at dominoes or backgammon, and drink until late at night, with the result that his capital was gradually diminished. Ch'en Ting told his mother, née Chang, that he was drinking and wasting his money every day, and she believed him, so that she trusted her son no longer. Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this by claiming that Ch'en Ting, who was responsible for getting the fabrics dyed, had been embezzling the money entrusted to him and forced him and his wife to leave the household and reside elsewhere. He then engaged Yang the Elder to be his manager.

This Yang the Elder, whose formal name was Yang Kuang-yen, and whose nickname was Iron Fingernail, was a past master at:

Peddling ephemera, like the wind and rain,¹¹

Telling falsehoods, fabricating fantasies, and getting hold of other people's money in order to spend it on himself. He was a native of Nobottom ward in Carryoff village of Makebelieve district in Nonesuch prefecture. His father was named Yang Pu-lai, or Poor-parent Yang, and his mother's maiden name was Pai. His younger brother was called Yang Erh-feng. He acquired the art of lying from the Taoist master known as the Barefaced Adept from the Fire Dragon Monastery in the Obdurate Grotto of the Vacuous Mountains. His wife was known as Miss Died-of-fright because his propensity to lie had literally frightened her to death.

Those to whom he makes promises, end up Catching at shadows and clutching the wind;
And bilking others of their due, he finds
As easy as groping for something in a bag.

Ch'en Ching-chi prevailed upon his mother to come up with an additional three hundred taels of silver, making a total of five hundred taels worth of capital, and trusted Yang Kuang-yen enough to propose that they go together to the canal port of Lin-ch'ing to purchase piece goods for their business.

Yang the Elder went home to collect his luggage, including a bottomless shoulder bag, filled with soft currency and "elm-pod cash."¹² Carrying a black-handled decorated bow, and riding a haughty high horse, he joined Ch'en Ching-chi in setting out for the dock at Lin-ch'ing in the hope of acquiring some hard-to-find goods.

After three li they fared by Nonesuch district;
After five li they came to Makebelieve village;

eventually arriving at Lin-ch'ing.

The large dock area of this river port of Lin-ch'ing was a bustling and flourishing place, where traveling merchants came and went:

A site at which river boats congregated;
An area where transport wagons gathered.

There were:

Thirty-two lanes lined with sporting houses; and Seventy-two taverns featuring singing girls.¹³

Ch'en Ching-chi was still a young man and allowed himself to be led by this Iron Fingernail, Yang the Elder, into:

Visiting brothels, and Exploring taverns;
Sleeping by daylight, and Dissipating at night;

while neglecting the purchases they had come to make.

While visiting a brothel one day, he encountered a painted face named Feng Chin-pao:

Whose demeanor was both romantic and alluring, and Whose beauty and talent approached perfection.

When he asked how old she was, the procuress said, "She is my own daughter, and my only source of livelihood. This year, she is just seventeen-years-old."

Ch'en Ching-chi no sooner set eyes on her than:

His heart and eyes were entranced, and he proceeded to pay the procuress five taels of silver for the privilege of spending several nights in a row with her. When Yang the Elder saw that he was infatuated with the painted face, and reluctant to leave her, he persuaded him with flowery words from the sidelines to take her home with him. The procuress started by demanding a hundred and fifty taels of silver for her but allowed herself to be bargained down to a hundred taels, whereupon he paid her the silver and took her home with him. She was carried the whole way in a sedan chair, while Yang the Elder and Ch'en Ching-chi escorted their cartload of merchandise:

Flourishing whips and prancing on their steeds,¹⁴

with satisfaction. Truly:

The sweetheart from the Swallows' Belvedere,¹⁵
Turns round her head in vain along the road.

He is carrying off an immortal from Wu-ling,¹⁶
To make her into a loving phoenix companion.

When his mother, née Chang, saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had not purchased much in the way of merchandise but had used his capital to buy a singing girl instead, she became so upset that:

Alas and alack;
She stopped breathing and died.

Ch'en Ching-chi had no alternative but to purchase a coffin, see that her corpse was dressed for burial, hold a scripture reciting ceremony, arrange for her to lie in state until after the first weekly commemoration was over, conduct a funeral procession to the ancestral graveyard outside the city, and bury her in the same grave with her husband. His maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, out of consideration for his mother, chose to make allowances for him.

When Ch'en Ching-chi came home after performing the ceremony of revisiting the grave three days after her burial, he set up her spirit tablet in the center of what had been her three-room suite and turned the other two rooms over to Feng Chin-pao to live in, while relegating his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to a side chamber. He also purchased a maidservant named Ch'ung-hsi to wait on Feng Chin-pao, put Yang the Elder in charge of the shop on the street-front of the residence, and indulged himself and the singing girl with:

Unlimited quantities of meat and wine.

Every night, he slept with the singing girl and no longer paid any attention to Hsi-men Ta-chieh.

One day, he learned that Meng Yü-lou had married Li Kung-pi, the son of District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, and taken a good deal of property with her; and that on the expiration of Magistrate Li's three-year term of office he had been promoted to the position of assistant prefect of Yen-chou prefecture in Chekiang and had taken his credentials and set out along the internal waterways to assume his new office.

This reminded Ch'en Ching-chi that on a former occasion he had picked up a hairpin of Meng Yü-lou's, that it had been taken from him by P'an Chin-lien while he was in his cups, that she had later returned it to him, and that he still had it in his possession. It occurred to him that, using this hairpin as a piece of evidence, he could take it with him to Yen-chou and claim that Meng Yü-lou had had an affair with him and given him the pin as a gift; and that the property she had taken with her on the occasion of her marriage to Li Kung-pi included the trunkloads of gold and silver that had been entrusted to his family by their relative Yang Chien when it was threatened with confiscation.

"This Assistant Prefect Li," he thought to himself, "is merely a civil official. What sort of standing does he possess? When he learns of this serious accusation, no doubt he will order his son to turn his wife over to me with both hands. If I then bring her home with me, she and Feng Chin-pao will make a pleasing pair for me to enjoy myself with."

Truly:

If his plan prevails, it will be like seizing
the jade hare in the moon;
If his plot succeeds, it will be like snaring
the gold raven in the sun.¹⁷

If Ch'en Ching-chi had not embarked on this scheme, all might have been well; but when he chose to do so, it was a case of:

A sleepy slugabed encountering the General
of the Five Ways;
A cold and hungry demon running into Chung K'uei.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

How can he ever start out for Yen-chou in pursuit of a jade damsel?
The human heart is difficult to fathom¹⁸ like a stone sunk in the sea.
To vanish inside a nobleman's gates is to be
as unreachable as the ocean depths;
From this point on, the amorous gentleman is destined to fall into a pit.

To resume our story, one day Ch'en Ching-chi went through his mother's trunks and took out a thousand taels of silver. He set aside a hundred taels to cover Feng Chin-pao's expenses during his absence and arranged for Ch'en Ting to move back in to look after the house and take charge of the piece goods store out front. He then set off with the remaining nine hundred taels of silver in hand, at the Mid-autumn Festival on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, together with Yang the Elder and his servant Ch'en An, for Hu-chou, where they purchased half a boatload of piece goods and silk floss, and then went on to the river's mouth at Ch'ing-chiang P'u, where they moored their boat at the dock, and put up at an inn the proprietor of which was called Ch'en the Second.

That evening, after the lanterns had been lit, he had Ch'en the Second slaughter a chicken and provide wine for them, and he sat down to drink with Yang the Elder, saying, "Manager, I would like you to keep watch over the boatload of merchandise, and stay here at Ch'en the Second's inn for a few days, while Ch'en An and I take some gifts with us and go to Yen-chou prefecture in Chekiang to pay a call on my sister, who is married to the son of the assistant prefect there. I should be able to get back in five days at the most or three days at the least."

"Brother," said Yang the Elder, "go ahead and go if you like. I will be happy to remain here and wait for you at the inn. When you return, we can set off together."

Ch'en Ching-chi, though he:

Never, ever, should have done it, set out one day, together with Ch'en An, taking some silver and presents with him, and traveled to Yen-chou prefecture, where they went into the city and found lodging in a monastery. Upon making inquiry, he learned that the Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i had assumed office a month ago, and that the boat with his dependents had arrived only three days earlier.

Ch'en Ching-chi did not dare to be remiss but purchased four platters of delicacies, two bolts of satin fabric, and two jars of wine, which he entrusted to Ch'en An to carry. He then dressed himself to befit the occasion, endeavoring to look his best, and headed straight for the prefectural yamen.

When he arrived there, he bowed to the gatekeeper, saying, "Please announce me. You can say that I am Meng the Second, a relative of the newlywed wife of His Honor Assistant Prefect Li's son, who has come to pay her a visit."

When the gatekeeper heard this, he did not dare to be remiss but promptly went inside to report his arrival. The young squire was in his study reading a book at the time.

When he heard that the visitor was a brother of his wife's, he ordered his attendants to bring the presents inside, adjusted his clothing, and said, "Invite him to come in."

He then conducted Ch'en Ching-chi into the reception hall of the prefectural yamen where they exchanged the customary amenities.

After they had assumed their positions as guest and host, he said, "How is it that, the other day, at our wedding ceremony, I did not see you, Brother-in-law?"

"I have been away for the past year," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "and have only just returned from a purchasing expedition to Szechwan and the Hu-Kuang region, so I did not know that my elder sister had married into your family. I am guilty of losing touch with her, but today I have respectfully prepared some meager gifts and have come to call on my sister."

"I did not know anything about you in the past," explained the young squire. "I apologize for my neglect. Forgive me. Forgive me."

A little later, after they had consumed a serving of tea, the young squire ordered his attendants to take the list of gifts and the presents inside and tell their mistress that her brother Meng the Second was there.

Meng Yü-lou, who was sitting in her room at the time, heard the gatekeeper come in and announce that Meng the Second was there.

"He hasn't returned home for the last year or two," she said. "Who else could it be? It must be that my brother, Meng Jui, has finally come home and has taken the trouble to traverse:

A thousand mountains and a myriad streams,
in order to come and see me."

When she saw that a servant had brought in the presents, along with a gift card that was signed, "Your relative, Meng Jui," she knew it must be her younger brother and said, "Invite him to come in."

After ordering Lan-hsiang to straighten up the rear reception room, Meng Yü-lou dressed herself up and prepared to come out and welcome him. When the young squire ushered him into the reception room, Meng Yü-lou was standing on the other side of the hanging screen looking into the interior, but:

Strange as it may seem,
it turned out not to be her brother, but Ch'en Ching-chi.

"I wonder what he is doing here?" she asked herself. "I'd better go out and see what he has to say. As the saying goes:

Whether a kinsman or not,
He is from my home place;
Whether palatable or not,
It is water from my home.¹⁹

Even though he is no brother of mine, he is my son-in-law."

So saying, she straightened her attire and came out to greet him.

"I did not know that you had married into this household," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so I have failed to call upon you."

Unexpectedly, while he was still uttering these words, the gatekeeper came in and informed the young squire that there was a guest waiting to see him outside.

"Pray entertain my brother-in-law," the young squire said to Meng Yü-lou, as he went out to meet his guest.

When Meng Yü-lou observed that Ch'en Ching-chi was about to kowtow to her, she hastily bowed in return, saying, "Son-in-law, you can skip the obeisance. What wind has blown you here?"

After they had exchanged the customary amenities, she offered him a seat and called for Lan-hsiang to bring out a serving of tea. When they had finished their tea, the two of them engaged in small talk together.

"How is Hsi-men Ta-chieh?" Meng Yü-lou asked.

Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to tell Meng Yü-lou all about how they had been forced to leave Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, and how he had tried to recover the trunks of valuables that his family had originally deposited there. Meng Yü-lou also told him about how they had visited the ancestral graveyard on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, and how they had encountered Ch'un-mei at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where she had gone to burn paper money at Chin-lien's grave site.

She also went on to say, "When I was still in the Hsi-men household, I constantly admonished the First Lady, saying, 'If you love your daughter, you should also love her husband. He is your own son-in-law, after all; it is not as though you are supporting a stranger.' But she believed the slander that petty people purveyed to her and consequently drove you out of the household. As for your later request to recover the trunks your family had entrusted to them, I know nothing about that."

"I will not attempt to deceive you," Ch'en Ching-chi said. "It is true that I was carrying on an affair with Sister Six, as everyone knew. But when the First Lady heard about it from those slaves of hers and drove her out of the household, she ended up being murdered by Wu Sung. If she had been allowed to remain in the household, that Wu Sung, even if he had possessed:

Seven heads and eight galls, would never have dared to break into the household and kill her. My enmity for the First Lady is as deep as the sea, and Sister Six, though dead in the Underworld, will also never forgive her."

"Enough of that," objected Meng Yü-lou. "It's something you can't do anything about. It has always been true that:

It is better to resolve an enmity than to contract one."²⁰

As they were talking, a maidservant set up a table, and put out wine, cups, and an assortment of delicacies until its entire surface was filled.

Meng Yü-lou then poured out a cup of wine and proffered it to Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "Son-in-law, you have exposed yourself to:

The wind and dust of a long journey,²¹ and gratuitously expended a considerable sum on me. Please accept this meager cup of watery wine."

Ch'en Ching-chi took the cup in his hand, bowed to her, and poured out another cup of wine to proffer to her in return. After she expressed her gratitude, they sat down together.

Upon noticing that the woman insisted on addressing him as Son-in-law:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,

"How is it that this whore refuses to recognize her vulnerability, but persists in addressing me as Son-in-law? I'd better sound her out gradually."

At the juncture, when:

Three rounds of wine had been consumed, and

Five courses of food had been provided, the two of them continued:

Talking back and forth, until the conversation started to warm up. By this time Ch'en Ching-chi's face was flushed with wine. As the saying goes:

The passions born of wine are as deep as the sea;

Giving rise to lustful daring

as big as the sky.²²

Seeing that no one else was present, Ch'en Ching-chi dropped several lines of suggestive language, saying, "Sister, your younger brother yearns for you:

Like a thirsty person longing for drink;

Like a parched person longing for coolness.

I remember, when I was residing in my father-in-law's household, how the two of us used to enjoy board games together, and play at dominoes, sitting across from each other, and feeling connected as intimately as the carapace to the turtle. Who could have guessed that today:

We would be apart from each other;²³

You to the east and I to the west?"

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this, saying, "Son-in-law, that's a fine way to talk! It has always been true that:

The clear is ever clear,

The turbid ever turbid;

As in time will be seen."

Ch'en Ching-chi responded with an ingratiating smile, groped out of his sleeve a package containing lozenges of fragrant tea in the shape of embracing couples, and gave it to the woman, saying, "Sister, if you have any feeling for me, take pity on your younger brother, and agree to consume this fragrant tea."

So saying, he proceeded to kneel down in front of her. As for the woman:

A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and the blood flew to her cheeks.

Taking the package of fragrant tea in her hand, she threw it onto the floor, saying:

"You wouldn't know a favor if you saw one.

I proffered wine to you with the best of intentions, and you turn around and play games with me this way."

So saying, she started to leave the table and head back to her room.

When Ch'en Ching-chi realized that she was not rising to his bait, he picked up the package of fragrant tea and called after her, saying, "I came to see you with the best of intentions, but you have apparently changed your mind about me. I dare say you think now that you have married a fine young man who is the son of an assistant prefect, you need not pay any attention to me; as though you never engaged in hanky-panky with me when you were the third concubine in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household."

He then reached into his sleeve, pulled out the gold-plated silver hairpin that he had formerly picked up, and held it in his hand, saying, "Who does this object belong to? If you never had sexual relations with me, how did this pin of yours ever fall into my hands? Your name is actually engraved on it. You and the First Lady have been in cahoots to divide up the eight trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, including jade girdles, jewels, and the like, that belonged to Yang Chien at court, and were deposited with you to avoid confiscation at the time of his impeachment, and have brought your share of them with you upon marrying your new husband. Never you fear, when we appear in court I'll have something to say to you."

When Meng Yü-lou heard his accusation and realized that the hairpin he held really was the gold-plated hairpin in the shape of a lotus petal that she had worn on her head, but had lost in the garden on a former occasion, she wondered to herself, "How could it ever have fallen into the hands of this short-life?"

Fearing that if she made a fuss about it the servants might overhear them, she promptly put on an ingratiating smile, came back inside, and took Ch'en Ching-chi by the hand, saying, "My good son-in-law, I was only kidding. There's no reason to get so upset."

Seeing that:

There was nobody about,
she murmured softly:

"If you've got a mind to it,
I've got the will."

The two of them then:

Without permitting any further explanation,
fell to embracing each other and kissing.

Ch'en Ching-chi:

Like a snake devouring a swallow, stuck his tongue into her mouth and told her to suck it, saying, "Call me your darling son-in-law. Only then will I believe that you really care for me."

"Keep it quiet," the woman said. "I fear that someone may overhear us."

Ch'en Ching-chi then whispered to her, saying, "I have bought half a boatload of merchandise which is waiting for me at the dock in Ch'ing-chiang P'u. If you deign to give yourself to me, thus and so, this evening, you can disguise yourself as a gatekeeper, surreptitiously make your way outside, and come home with me on the boat, so we can become man and wife. There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme. Your father-in-law is only a civil official, after all, and will seek to avoid trouble. He is scarcely likely to take the risk of trying to pursue or arrest you."

"In that case," the woman said, "so be it. Let us agree that tonight you will wait outside the rear wall of the yamen. I will let a bundle of gold and silver and other valuables down to you by a rope over the wall and then disguise myself as a gatekeeper, make my way outside, and go to embark on the boat with you."

Gentle reader take note: Truly:

If a beauty is well disposed,²⁴
Not even a barrier a myriad feet in height will serve to deter her;
If a woman is ill disposed,²⁵
Though seated next to one, she is separated by a thousand mountains.

If Meng Yü-lou had married a fool who was not the equal of Ch'en Ching-chi, this scheme of his might well have succeeded; but she had married the young squire Li Kung-pi, who had the prospect of a promising career before him and was also:

A man of romantic and engaging qualities,²⁶ still in the springtime of his youth, whose:

Loving devotion could hardly be surpassed.²⁷

Under these circumstances, how could he ever have thought he could seduce her? Aside from the fact that the two of them had not had any relationship in the past, the young gentleman was simply bound to fail in his endeavor. Having told the truth, and revealed his plans to her, he opened himself up to being deceived by the woman.

Truly:

Flowering branches, beneath their leaves,
conceal their thorns;
How can one ever be sure the human heart contains no poison?

At this juncture, after the two of them had consulted together for a while, and Ch'en Ching-chi had downed several cups of wine, he said good-bye and prepared to leave. Li Kung-pi, forthwith, escorted him to the gate of the yamen and saw him off, with Ch'en An following in his wake.

Li Kung-pi then asked Meng Yü-lou, "Do you know where your brother is staying? I will go tomorrow to pay him a return call and give him some gifts for the road."

"Since when is he any brother of mine?" responded Meng Yü-lou. "He is Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law and has come with the intention, thus and so, of inveigling me into absconding with him. I have already arranged for him to wait outside the rear wall of the yamen at the third watch tonight, in order to:

Counteract his plot with one of my own,²⁸ so we can have him arrested as a thief, and thereby eliminate any further trouble from him. What do you think?"

"How can that rascal act so outrageously?" the young squire responded. "It has always been true that:

He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.
It is not I who have sought him out,
He is seeking to find his own death."²⁹

So saying, he strode outside, called together a few trusted attendants, and instructed them, thus and so, on the preparations he wished them to make.

Meanwhile, Ch'en Ching-chi, who was quite unaware of the counterplot he was up against, during:

The third watch in the middle of the night, actually proceeded to take his servant Ch'en An with him, stand outside the rear wall of the prefectural yamen, and signal his presence with a cough. Meng Yü-lou coughed in response and then threw a length of rope with a large bundle of silver attached to the end of it over the wall to him. This silver consisted of two hundred taels that had been taken from the prefectural depository for money confiscated from criminals and levied in fines.

Ch'en Ching-chi was about to tell Ch'en An to pick it up and get out of the way when:

The sound of a watchman's clapper was heard,³⁰ and four or five men suddenly appeared out of the dark shadows, calling out, "Thief! Thief!"

Ch'en Ching-chi Is Entrapped in Yen-chou Prefecture

In no time at all, they bound Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An and reported the event to Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who ordered that they be incarcerated in the jail and brought before the bench the following morning.

It so happens that the presiding prefect of Yen-chou was a man named Hsü Feng, who was a native of Lin-t'ao prefecture in Shensi province, had passed the chin-shih examination in the year 1070 and was a man of absolute integrity and uprightness.

The next morning, he took his place on the bench, with two rows of lesser officials standing to either side, while Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i took the formal roll call, and the keeper of the repository reported on the theft, bringing Ch'en Ching-chi with him, and announcing, "Last night, during the third watch, the two initially unknown but now identified culprits Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An broke open the lock to the repository, stole two hundred taels worth of the money confiscated from criminals, climbed over the wall, and attempted to escape but were apprehended and are now ready to be brought before Your Honor."

Prefect Hsü Feng ordered that they be brought forward, and Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were, accordingly, hustled into the courtroom and made to kneel before the bench.

When the prefect saw that Ch'en Ching-chi was young and had a naturally clear-cut appearance, he questioned him, saying, "Where does this rascal come from, and why should he have come to this prefectural yamen of mine during the night, and stolen this amount of money confiscated from criminals from the government repository? What does he have to say for himself?"

Ch'en Ching-chi merely responded by kowtowing and protesting that he was being treated unjustly.

"Since you are guilty of larceny," said Prefect Hsü, "how can you claim to be treated unjustly?"

Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i bowed respectfully at his side and said, "Venerable sir, there is no reason for any further interrogation. The material evidence is before our eyes. Why do you not subject them to punishment?"

Prefect Hsü then ordered his subordinates to take them down and give them a flogging of twenty strokes with the bamboo.

Assistant Prefect Li remarked:

"Man is a miserable creature;

Unless you beat him he'll never confess.

Otherwise these thieves will try to wriggle out of it."

Thereupon, the lictors standing to either side took hold of Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An, turned them over, and began to beat them with the heavy bamboo.

Ch'en Ching-chi's only response was to curse, saying, "Who could have anticipated that that whore, Meng the Third, would try to ensnare me this way? It is unjust! It is bitter!"

Prefect Hsü Feng was an official with considerable experience in his prefectural office, and on hearing these cries, he thought to himself, "There must be something behind this."

After only ten strokes of the bamboo had been administered, he called out to the lictors, "That's enough for now. Take them back to the lockup, and we can continue the interrogation tomorrow."

Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i responded to this by saying, "Venerable sir, you ought not to let them off so easily. As the saying goes:

The human heart may be as hard as steel;

But legal prosecution is like a furnace.³¹

It may not matter if you let them off overnight, but it will give them an opportunity to concoct some alternative explanation."

"That will not be a problem," said Prefect Hsü. "I know what I'm doing."

Thereupon, the prison guards proceeded to take Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An back to the lockup.

Prefect Hsü Feng had some suspicions about the situation in his mind, so he summoned a trusted subordinate and instructed him, thus and so, to go to the lockup, endeavor to ascertain what lay behind the crime that had been committed, and then report back to him.

This man, thereupon, disguised himself as a prisoner, slept in the same cell with Ch'en Ching-chi that night, and asked him what had happened, saying, "Brother, you are still in the springtime of your youth and don't look like a criminal, but this day you have fallen into the clutches of the law and seem to be the victim of a miscarriage of justice."

Ch'en Ching-chi responded by saying:

"It's a long story.

I was originally the son-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing from Ch'ing-ho district. This woman, née Meng, who is the newly married bride of Assistant Prefect Li's son, was formerly a concubine of my father-in-law's, with whom I have had a sexual liaison. Now, on the occasion of her marriage, she brought with her ten trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, as part of her trousseau, that originally belonged to a relative of my family's, His Honor Yang Chien, who had entrusted them to my father-in-law's family for safekeeping. I came here with the intention of recovering them but have been double-crossed by her, thus and so, and ended up being arrested as a thief:

Severely beaten into making a confession,³²
and rendered no longer able to see the light of day. It's really intolerable."

Having heard this, his questioner made his way back to the rear hall of the yamen and reported it to Prefect Hsü, who said, "Just as I suspected, there was a reason why this man claimed to have suffered an injustice at the hands of this woman, née Meng."

The next day, when he took his place on the bench, with two rows of lesser officials standing to either side, Prefect Hsü Feng had Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An haled before him, directed that a record be made of their testimony, declared their innocence, and ordered them to be set free.

Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who was sitting beside him, did not know what was going on and objected repeatedly, saying, "Venerable sir, the guilt of these rascals is apparent. How can you let them go free?"

But Prefect Hsü, in front of his assembled subordinates, gave Assistant Prefect Li a severe dressing down, saying, "I occupy the senior office in this prefecture and derive my authority from the Emperor. It would not be right for me, on your family's behalf, to:

Abuse the law to avenge a private dispute,³³ and falsely accuse an innocent party of larceny. Your son has married the concubine, née Meng, of his deceased father-in-law, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who brought with her as part of her trousseau, trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, that are subject to confiscation by the authorities. As Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law, the accused has come here in the hope of recovering the said property. How can you bring yourself to frame him, have him arrested for a crime he did not commit, and then expect me to collaborate in this injustice on your family's behalf? As an official, one should:

Raise sons and raise daughters,

Hoping that they will become decent adults.

To allow them to act in this way, is a violation of justice."

In front of the court, he berated Assistant Prefect Li till his face turned red with embarrassment, and:

He hung his head in mortification,³⁴ not daring to utter another word. Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were then allowed to go free.

Not long afterwards, Prefect Hsü retired from the bench, and Assistant Prefect Li returned to his own quarters with his mind in a state of extreme turmoil.

When his wife noticed this, she said, "Sir, normally when you return from the courtroom, you act as though:

Nothing in Heaven or Earth could make you happier;

but today, you seem so unhappy. What's going on?"

"You're only a woman!" shouted Assistant Prefect Li. "What do you know about anything? You have given birth to a worthless son, and today, on his account, Prefect Hsü has subjected me to a severe dressing down in the open courtroom, in front of all the assembled subordinates. It's utterly enraging."

His wife was thrown into consternation by this response and asked, "What's it all about?"

Assistant Prefect Li merely called his son into his presence and shouted to his attendants, "Fetch a heavy bamboo cane. It's utterly enraging!"

He then addressed his son, saying, "You are responsible for bringing this woman into our household as your wife. And now, the son-in-law of her deceased husband has shown up, insisting, over and over again, that she brought with her as part of her trousseau trunkloads of gold and silver that belonged to the convicted court official Yang Chien and were entrusted to his father-in-law's family for safekeeping because they were subject to confiscation. He has come here in order to demand that you return them to him. He says that you surreptitiously removed government silver from the repository and used it to frame him as a thief. I didn't know a thing about this but have suffered a tongue lashing from Prefect Hsü in front of the entire contingent of other functionaries. This is something you have visited upon me when I have not even begun to exercise my authority for a single day. What use do I have for a worthless son like you?"

So saying, he ordered his attendants to begin beating him, and the strokes of the heavy bamboo fell on him like rain. Alas, the young squire was beaten until:

The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood spurted out.

When the prefect's wife saw that he was being beaten until he was scarcely recognizable, she wept on the sidelines and urged her husband to desist. Meng Yü-lou, also, eavesdropped on the scene from inside the postern gate to the residential quarters in the rear and wiped away her tears.

After he had been given thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo, Assistant Prefect Li ordered his attendants, saying, "Take the young squire into custody, and expel that woman of his from the premises at once. She can remarry anyone she chooses, and thereby avoid any further scandal, and allow me to reassert my integrity."

The young squire, Li Kung-pi, could not bear the thought of being separated from her, and fell to weeping and pleading before his parents, saying, "I would rather allow myself to be beaten to death by my father than relinquish my wife."

Assistant Prefect Li ordered that the young squire should be shackled with iron chains, confined in the rear quarters of the yamen, and not allowed out, with the intention of letting him die there.

His wife wept at this, saying, "Sir, in the course of your career as an official you have reached the age of more than fifty years, and this is the only offspring that you possess. If you confine him until he dies on account of this woman, in the future, when you grow old and retire from office, on whom will you rely?"

"But if I don't do so," said Assistant Prefect Li, "he will only continue to make trouble for me with my colleagues."

"If you don't wish to allow him to remain here," responded his wife, "why not send the two of them back to our ancestral home in Chen-t'ing prefecture?"

The assistant prefect allowed himself to be persuaded by his wife and consented to let the young squire go. He was given a limit of three days in which to arrange for transportation and set out with his wife for his native place in Tsao-ch'iang district, where he was to continue his studies.

To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were released from the yamen in Yen-chou prefecture, they returned to the monastery where they had been staying, picked up their luggage, and went straight back to the inn of Ch'en the Second in Ch'ing-chiang p'u.

When they asked for Yang the Elder, they were told, "Three days ago he went to the prefectural yamen to look for you and was told that you had been incarcerated in the lockup, so he came back, took charge of his boatload of cargo, and headed for home."

Ch'en Ching-chi could hardly believe this, so he went down to the waterfront to see for himself but came up empty-handed, being unable to find the boat.

"That god-damned creature!" he exclaimed. "How could he fail to wait for me, but simply take off on his own?"

On top of everything else, having just been released from the lockup, he had nothing in the way of traveling expenses at his disposal. He and Ch'en An had no recourse but to take passage on another boat, pawn their garments to cover the cost, and scrounge for food on their way home:

As flustered as a dog who has
lost his way home;
As flurried as a fish who has escaped the net.

Along the route, they sought for news of Yang the Elder but found no trace of him. At the time, it was already late autumn:

The trees were shedding leaves,
The metallic wind was turbulent, and the atmosphere was desolate. There is a poem of eight lines that describes the hardships suffered by travelers in the autumn:

Stem by stem the caltrop and the lotus wither;
Leaf by leaf the phoenix tree's foliage falls.
The crickets chirp in the decaying grasslands;
The wild geese come down upon the level sands.³⁵
Drizzling rain showers drench the green woods;
The frost is heavy as the weather gets colder.
Those who do not have to journey on the roads;
Are quite unable to savor the taste of autumn.³⁶

On the day that Ch'en Ching-chi finally arrived home, the servant Ch'en Ting was standing in the doorway. When he saw Ch'en Ching-chi arrive and noticed that:

His clothing looked disheveled,³⁷ and His face was dark with sunburn, it gave him quite a start. After ushering him inside, he inquired about the whereabouts of his boatload of merchandise.

Ch'en Ching-chi was so angry that it took him what seemed like half a day to respond, telling him about the trial he had endured in Yen-chou prefecture, and saying, "I am lucky that the presiding officer, Prefect Hsü Feng, set me free. Otherwise:

My life would have been in jeopardy.³⁸

And now, that god-damned creature Yang the Elder has made off with my merchandise, and who knows where he has taken it?"

The first thing Ch'en Ching-chi did was to send Ch'en Ting to Yang the Elder's home to see if he could find out anything, but they merely reported that he had not returned home yet. Ch'en Ching-chi then went in person to inquire about the situation but did not gain any information and came home and entered the house in a highly agitated state.

It so happens that Feng Chin-pao and Hsi-men Ta-chieh had proven to be incompatible:

One turning south and the other facing north.

Ever since Ch'en Ching-chi had embarked on his expedition, they had quarrelled with one another, right up until the day of his return.

Hsi-men Ta-chieh claimed that Feng Chin-pao had been secretly filching money to give to the procuress of the brothel from which she had been purchased, saying, "The servant from her place comes here all the time:

Surreptitiously acquiring things on the sly, and purchasing wine and meat for her, which she consumes in her own room, while the rest of us do without. She sleeps until noon all the time and refuses to buy anything for the household, simply leaving the rest of us to put up with it."

Feng Chin-pao, for her part, said, "Hsi-men Ta-chieh is so habitually lazy she will:

Neither pick up a bent piece of hay,
Nor glean a standing stalk of grain.³⁹

She pilfers rice to exchange for baked wheat cakes to eat, and marinated pork which she sneaks into her room to share with her maidservant Yüan-hsiao."

Ch'en Ching-chi believed this last accusation and accosted Hsi-men Ta-chieh, saying, "So, you lousy worthless whore! I guess you must be suffering from such:

Acute consumption or avid craving, that you can't help pilfering rice to exchange for baked wheat cakes, and marinated pork to share with your maidservant."

So saying, he gave Yüan-hsiao a beating and kicked Hsi-men Ta-chieh a few times.

Hsi-men Ta-chieh was so upset by this that she chased after Feng Chin-pao and confronted her, head to head, saying, "What an adulterous whore you are! I suppose that the money you have been filching on behalf of that procuress of yours doesn't matter; but you actually have the gall to allege to my husband that I have been pilfering rice and meat for myself. This is a case of:

The curfew violator arresting the watchman.
And you have even incited my husband to kick me. I'll put my life up against yours any day, you whore. After all, what is it worth anyway?"

"What a fine whore you are!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi. "You offer to put your life up against hers, do you? You're not even worth as much as one of the toes on her feet."

This was one of those occasions on which:

Something was destined to happen,
and it turned out to be a catastrophe.

Thereupon, Ch'en Ching-chi, grabbed Hsi-men Ta-chieh by the hair with one hand and proceeded to pound her with his fist, kick her with his feet, and beat her with a stick. He beat her until blood oozed from her nostrils, and it seemed like half a day before she regained consciousness. Ch'en Ching-chi then retired to the quarters of his singing girl and went to sleep with her, leaving Hsi-men Ta-chieh in her own lesser quarters, where she gave way to:

Sobbing and wailing, as she cried bitterly, while Yüan-hsiao retired to the adjacent room to sleep. Alas, in the middle of the night, Hsi-men Ta-chieh suspended a length of rope from the rafters, and:

Hanged herself until dead.

At the time of her death she was twenty-three years of age.

The next morning, when Yüan-hsiao got up, she tried to push open the door to her bedroom but could not do so. Ch'en Ching-chi and Feng Chin-pao, who were still in bed at the time, sent their maidservant Ch'ung-hsi to fetch a wooden basin from Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room, so they could wash their feet; but she, also, was not able to push the door open.

At this, Ch'en Ching-chi started to curse, saying, "That lousy whore! How can she still be asleep at this hour and refuse to get up? I'll go kick her door open and pull the hair off her head."

Ch'ung-hsi managed to look in the window and said, "She has already gotten up and is amusing herself in the room by swinging."

She then went on to say, "It looks as though she has suspended herself like a puppet on a string."⁴⁰

Yüan-hsiao also looked inside for what seemed like half a day before exclaiming, "Master, it's tragic. The mistress is hanging from the rafters over the bed and appears to be dead."

Only then was the young gentleman alarmed enough to get out of bed, along with his singing girl, kick open the door to her room, cut the rope by which she was suspended, lay her down, and attempt to revive her for what seemed like half a day. But there was not a breath left in her. There was no way they could tell when it had happened, but:

Alack and alas,
she had died. Truly:

Who knows to what place her true nature
may have flown;
Unless it is in the flying clouds and the autumn waters?⁴¹

When Ch'en Ting learned that Hsi-men Ta-chieh was dead, he was afraid of being implicated and went to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to inform Yüeh-niang of what had happened.

When Yüeh-niang learned that Hsi-men Ta-chieh had committed suicide by hanging herself, and that Ch'en Ching-chi had brought a singing girl into his household, her feelings toward him were truly an instance of the adage:

When the ice is three feet thick,
It is not due to one day of cold.

Taking with her seven or eight of her page boys, maidservants, and servants' wives, she made her way straight to his place. When she set eyes on Hsi-men Ta-chieh's corpse, stretched out straight and stiff, she began to scream with rage, grabbed hold of Ch'en Ching-chi, and had her servants beat him until his entire body looked as though it had been gored with an awl in innumerable places. The singing girl Feng Chin-pao tried to hide under the bed, but she too was dragged out and beaten to a stinking pulp. Yüeh-niang had them smash the doors, windows, and walls of the house until they were in a shambles:

All at sevens and eights;⁴² and also ordered them to ransack her room, and carry away the beds and curtains and other remains of her trousseau. When she arrived home, she invited her brothers, Wu K'ai and Wu the Second, to come and consult with her about the situation.

Wu K'ai said, "Sister, if you don't seize this occasion, when a member of your family has perished, to take the case to court, in the future, when he has trouble making a living, he will come back and demand those trunks from you once again.

If one does not take thought for the future,
One is sure to meet with present misfortune."⁴³

The best thing to do would be to take him to court and have the case settled once and for all, in order to:

Stave off any future catastrophe."

"Brother, what you say is right," responded Yüeh-niang, and they proceeded, forthwith, to set about drafting an accusation.

The next day, Yüeh-niang went in person to the courtroom in the district yamen and submitted her accusation.

It so happens that the newly appointed district magistrate was named Huo Ta-li. He was a native of Huang-kang district in the Hu-kuang region, a holder of the provincial graduate degree, and a person of upright character. When he learned that the case was a serious one, involving a human fatality, he promptly took his place on the bench and accepted the accusation, which read as follows:

Wu Yüeh-niang Creates a Stir in the District Yamen

The plaintiff, née Wu, is a thirty-three-year-old woman who is the widow of the deceased Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The target of her accusation is her unworthy son-in-law, who has taken advantage of her widowhood by crediting the accusations of a singing girl, and mistreating her daughter so egregiously that she has committed suicide by hanging herself. She importunes you to show her due consideration by undertaking a thorough investigation of this case, and thereby saving her from an early death.

The son-in-law in question, whose name is Ch'en Ching-chi, originally sought refuge by residing for some years in my husband's household because his family was implicated in a legal case. He is given to drinking to excess and becoming violent, is not the sort to abide by his lot, and is wont to take his cut of both outgo and income. For this reason, fearing legal entanglements, I expelled him from the household. I failed to anticipate that this Ch'en Ching-chi would harbor such hatred for me that he would constantly mistreat my daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, in his own home, and force her to put up with it for some time. Unpredictably, he also brought a singing girl from Lin-ch'ing named Feng Chin-pao into his home and gave her the master suite in which to reside. Believing whatever she said to provoke him, he resorted to humiliating his wife in every way, beating her, pulling her hair, and kicking her until her entire body was covered with bruises, and she could not bear it any longer, feeling as though she was about to die. This year, on the twenty-third day of the ninth month, during the third watch of the night, he drove his wife to commit suicide by hanging herself. If I had not brought an accusation against him, I fear that this Ch'en Ching-chi, with his fierce and uncontrollable nature, would take advantage of my widowhood, since he has actually threatened to attack me with knife in hand. These circumstances are intolerable.⁴⁴ I therefore implore that you have him arrested and brought before you in order to examine thoroughly the facts behind my daughter's death. If this case is pursued according to the law, potential felons will be deterred, law-abiding citizens will be able to live in peace, and the dead will be relieved of their sense of injustice. This is the reason why I have brought this accusation before you, as the presiding magistrate of this district, Lord "Azure Heaven," in the hope that you will act upon it.

The district magistrate, Huo Ta-li, in his position on the bench, read the accusation, and observed that Wu Yüeh-niang was attired in mourning garments, was the widow of an official of the fifth rank, and that:

Her countenance was upright and correct, and

Her bearing both nonchalant and elegant.

He then bowed toward her, rose from his seat, and addressed her, saying, "Lady Wu, please stand up. I see that you are the widow of a duly appointed official, and I understand the charges that are enumerated in your accusation. Please return home. There is no need for you to remain here any longer. In the future, it will suffice to have a servant from your household attend the court proceedings. I will issue a warrant for his arrest here and now."

Wu Yüeh-niang promptly bowed to the district magistrate, went outside, and rode home in her sedan chair, delegating Lai-chao to monitor the court proceedings for her.

The magistrate then signed the deposition and deputed two yamen runners with a bench warrant to take Ch'en Ching-chi and the singing girl Feng Chin-pao into custody, along with the neighbors to either side of his residence, and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, who were required to attend the court in person for the scheduled hearing.

Ch'en Ching-chi was at home at the time, engaged in making the funeral arrangements. When he heard that Wu Yüeh-niang had lodged an accusation against him, and that the district yamen had sent runners with a warrant for his arrest, he was so perturbed that:

His ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and

His material souls fled to the nine heavens.

Feng Chin-pao, for her part, had been so badly beaten that:

Her entire body was racked with pain,⁴⁵ and she was trying to recuperate by lying in bed. When she heard that runners had come to arrest her:

Her fear was so great,

She lost her bearings.

Ch'en Ching-chi impulsively offered money to the runners in order to treat them to wine and food, but they proceeded to truss him up, together with the singing girl, with a single length of rope, and drag them off to the district yamen, along with their next-door neighbors Fan Kang, who lived to the left, and Sun Chi, who lived to the right, and the head of the mutual security unit, Wang K'uan.

When the district magistrate Huo Ta-li saw that the wanted persons had been duly arrested, he promptly took his place on the bench, while Lai-chao knelt up front, and Ch'en Ching-chi, Feng Chin-pao, and the rest knelt at the foot of the steps.

After rereading the accusation, the district magistrate called Ch'en Ching-chi before him and said, "So you are Ch'en Ching-chi."

He then went on to ask, "Which of you is Feng Chin-pao?"

Feng Chin-pao replied, "I am Feng Chin-pao."

The district magistrate then proceeded to interrogate Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "What a despicable rascal you are. How could you have believed the allegations of that singing girl, and beaten Hsi-men Ta-chieh so severely that she hung herself? What have you got to say in your defense?"

Ch'en Ching-chi kowtowed to him and said, "I beseech Your Honor, Lord 'Azure Heaven,' to investigate the facts in this case. How could I have dared to beat her so severely as to cause her death? It is all because a manager of mine has absconded with the capital I entrusted to him, so that I arrived home in a bad temper and asked her to prepare a meal for me, which she refused to do, that I kicked her a couple of times. Then, in the middle of the night, she:

Hanged herself until dead."

"Since you have taken this singing girl into your household," exclaimed the magistrate, "why should you have imposed upon your wife to prepare a meal for you? It doesn't make any sense. The accusation lodged by the Lady Wu states that it was only because you had beaten her daughter nearly to death that she hung herself. Yet you still refuse to acknowledge it."

"The Lady Wu and I are enemies," protested Ch'en Ching-chi. "That is why she is falsely accusing me. I hope that Your Honor will investigate the facts of the case."

The magistrate was enraged at this and said, "The fact is that her daughter is dead. Who else do you propose to blame for it?"

He then ordered his attendants to take Ch'en Ching-chi down and give him twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo; and he had Feng Chin-pao haled before him, put into the squeezers, and given one hundred strokes on them. When these procedures had been carried out, the runners were ordered to take the culprits off and lock them up.

The next day, he deputed the docket officer Tsang Pu-hsi to take a clerk, along with the head of the mutual security unit, and the next-door neighbors, and proceed to Ch'en Ching-chi's home, where the corpse was brought out and subjected to a formal inquest. It was found that since Hsi-men Ta-chieh's entire body was covered with bruises, and there were rope marks around her throat, it must have been true that Ch'en Ching-chi had kicked and beaten her so severely that she could not bear it any longer and had:

Hanged herself until dead.

Depositions were taken, bond was posted for the witnesses, and the inquest report was duly filled out and submitted upon their return to the district yamen.

The magistrate was incensed at this and ordered that both Ch'en Ching-chi and Feng Chin-pao should be stripped and subjected to another ten strokes of the bamboo. He then issued a provisional finding that Ch'en Ching-chi, who was judged guilty of the crime of beating his wife to death, should be sentenced to strangulation; and that Feng Chin-pao should be sentenced to a hundred strokes of the bamboo and sent back to serve in the brothel from which she had come.

Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into a panic by this and wrote a note in his prison cell directing Ch'en Ting to scrape together the sum of a hundred taels of silver from the capital of his piece goods store and Hsi-men Ta-chieh's head ornaments, and deliver it secretly to the district magistrate.

That night, the district magistrate altered the deposition so that the provisional judgement read that the defendant had coerced his wife to death, which was only a miscellaneous capital crime, redeemable by five years of penal servitude, or commutation in return for a payment to be used for the transport of charcoal.

When Wu Yüeh-niang learned of this, she knelt in front of the yamen gate and pled for reconsideration of the finding.

The district magistrate responded by calling her before him and saying, "My lady, your daughter was found to have rope marks around her throat, so how can you claim that her husband is guilty of beating her to death? To do so is surely to make a travesty of justice. If you are afraid that he will continue to molest you in the future, I will issue a written injunction prohibiting him from ever visiting your premises again."

He then had Ch'en Ching-chi brought before him and enjoined him, saying, "I have chosen to spare your life today, but it is essential that you should:

Correct your faults and renew yourself.

You must never again make trouble for the household of the Lady Wu. If you are ever brought before me for doing so in the future, I will certainly not spare you. You must immediately purchase a coffin for your wife, see that her corpse is dressed for burial, arrange for a funeral procession, and take care of her burial. When you report back to me, I will then forward the necessary documents to the higher authorities."

Ch'en Ching-chi, having been spared execution, turned over the sum of money required to commute his sentence and returned home, where he had Hsi-men Ta-chieh's corpse encoffined, arranged for her to lie in state until the first weekly commemoration was over, held a scripture recitation in her honor, and had her taken outside the city to be buried. Altogether, he had endured incarceration for half a month, had been compelled to expend a considerable sum of silver, and had been deprived of the singing girl Feng Chin-pao. His belongings had been completely cleaned out, he had been forced to sell his home, he had barely escaped with his life, and he no longer dared to bring charges against his mother-in-law. Truly:

Disaster and good fortune have no gateways, people bring them on themselves;⁴⁶
One must be aware that when joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow.⁴⁷

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Storms may be stirred up in untroubled waters within domestic confines;
The value of rectitude and worth of kindness⁴⁸ should never be forgotten.
When the Blue Bridge was inundated by water⁴⁹
a meeting was expected;
But the three lovers have become separated like Orion and Antares.⁵⁰

WANG HSÜAN RELIES ON RIGHTEOUSNESS TO HELP THE POOR; ABBOT JEN IN THE DESIRE FOR PROFIT INVITES DISASTER

Who can say that in our mundane existence destiny is fickle?
Good luck and bad, misfortune and fortune, travel hand in hand.¹
It is only due to the lure of romance that we do ourselves in;
It is not the case that the human heart is straight as a needle.
One may assume one's official conduct to be devoid of injustice;
But how can one know what the Way of Heaven may reveal about it?²
If one learns early that success and failure are dictated by fate,
One may be able to walk freely even during the dark of night.

THE STORY GOES that Ch'en Ching-chi, from the time that Hsi-men Ta-chieh committed suicide, Wu Yüeh-niang took him to court, and the singing girl Feng Chin-pao was sent back to the brothel, felt that he had barely escaped with his life. He had been forced to put his house up for sale and had exhausted his capital, had disposed of his wife's head ornaments, and did not even have any furniture left. He also claimed, once again, that Ch'en Ting had been embezzling the money entrusted to him and dismissed him. He did not have enough money to cover his daily expenses, but merely:

Sat at home frittering away his resources.³

He also felt driven to visit Yang the Elder's home to inquire about the whereabouts of his half boatload of goods.

One day, upon arriving at the door of Yang the Elder's home, he called out, "Is Yang the Elder at home or not?"

Who could have anticipated that Yang Kuang-yen, having made off with Ch'en Ching-chi's half boatload of goods and sold them for cash, hid out in one place or another until he learned that Ch'en Ching-chi's wife had committed suicide in her home, that his mother-in-law had lodged an accusation against him in the district yamen, and that he had endured half a month of incarceration. At this, he promptly returned home, but did not venture outside.

When he heard Ch'en Ching-chi calling for him at the door, and demanding to know what had become of the boatload of cargo, he sent his younger brother Yang Erh-feng out to confront him, saying, "You persuaded my elder brother to accompany you on a business trip, and nothing has been heard of him for the last several months. I don't know whether you either threw him into the river, or drowned him in the canal, but you actually have the nerve to come here and demand to know what has become of the boatload of cargo. Is a human life more important, or that cargo of yours more important?"

This Yang Erh-feng had always been a tough customer, both a gambler and a "knockabout." His biceps were:

Bulging lumps of purple flesh;⁴

and his chest was covered with:

Tousled lengths of brown hair.

He was a "bare stick" pure and simple. Striding outside, he took hold of Ch'en Ching-chi with one hand and demanded to know the fate of his elder brother. Ch'en Ching-chi, in a state of panic, tore himself loose and started to run toward home.

Yang Erh-feng responded by picking up a three-cornered shard of tile and scratching open the skin on his skull with it, so that:

His face was covered with flowing blood.⁵

He then raced after Ch'en Ching-chi, yelling, "I'll fuck your mother's cunt! Since when have I ever seen any silver of yours? If you come farting around my place, I'll give you a real drubbing with my fists."

Ch'en Ching-chi fled homeward, as though:

Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,

There was no place for him to hide;

and saw to it that the main gate was:

Locked tight as an iron bucket, so that

Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through.
He then permitted Yang Erh-feng to roundly abuse his parents, and try to smash open the gate with a large brick, without allowing so much as the sound of a breath to escape from his nostrils. On top of everything else, he had hardly recovered from a lawsuit and was as nervous as a man who:

Dreams of a length of rope and fears it is a snake, so all he could do was put up with it. Truly:

Tender plants are afraid of the frost⁶
and frost fears the sun;
One wicked person will be ground down upon encountering another.⁷

Shortly after this, he managed to sell his spacious house for seventy taels of silver and bought a small dwelling in an obscure alley in which to live. Later on, he was compelled to get rid of one of his two maidservants, selling off Ch'ung-hsi, and retaining Yüan-hsiao to sleep with him at night. In less than half a month after this, he was forced to dispose of his smaller dwelling, and move into a boarding house. On top of this, his servant Ch'en An left him, since he no longer had any business to conduct, and Yüan-hsiao died. As a result, he found himself:

Completely on his own.

His household belongings and furniture had all been sold, leaving him:

As poor as though he had been utterly cleaned out.⁸

It was not long before he did not even have enough money to pay his rent and had to move into a homeless shelter in order to survive.

When the other beggars in the shelter observed that he was the profligate scion of a wealthy family, and that he had a naturally clear-cut appearance, they made room for him to sleep on the heated k'ang and gave him some baked wheat cakes to eat. The patrolman on duty that night happened to come in and offered him a job as a night watchman, sounding his clapper and ringing his bell.

It was already late winter in the twelfth month at the time. There was a heavy snowfall, and the wind was gusting, making it extremely cold. Ch'en Ching-chi, after sounding his clapper for a time, and letting the patrolman go, set out to ring his bell as he patrolled the local streets and alleys. What with the wind and snow, and the ice that had formed on the ground, he was so frozen that all he could do was to:

Hunch his shoulders and tighten his back, as he trembled and shivered with the cold. At the fifth watch, when the cocks crowed, he came upon an ailing beggar who was lying on the ground beneath a wall and feared that he might be dead. The local neighborhood head told him to keep watch over him, and to light a bundle of straw to keep him warm.

Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been sounding the watches all night long without any rest, promptly proceeded to sprawl out on the ground and go to sleep. Unexpectedly, he started to dream of the:

Glory and luxury, wealth and honor, he had enjoyed as a resident of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, and the fun and games he had indulged in during his affair with P'an Chin-lien. When he awoke from the dream with tears in his eyes, the other beggars asked him what he was crying about.

Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this query by saying, "Brothers, listen to my explanation."

There is a song suite beginning with the tune "Powdery Butterflies" that testifies to this:

During the ninety coldest days of winter,
Snow fills the sky and everything is frozen.
A wild wind shakes Heaven and agitates the Earth,⁹ Chilling me to the point that I am frozen stiff.
My heart is palpitating,
And I find it almost impossible to contend with.
I cannot bear the hunger in my stomach;
I cannot stand the coldness of my body.
Living thus, half exposed to the elements,
It is really cold.
I cannot bear this sense of desolation,
And would like to find a way to death,
But in this flustered state, I cannot spare my worthless life.

To the tune "Playful Children," Paracoda One

Before I know it, the evening bell sounds;
At the evening bell people begin to rest.
Who is it that is calling for me?
It is the neighborhood head Chang Ch'eng.
He calls for me urgently,
And I respond repeatedly.
"Who is going to sound the watches for me tonight?" he asks.
It would seem that I am in luck, for once,
For he is giving me some baked wheat cakes.

Paracoda Two

I am grateful to the neighborhood head for his concern over my exposure,
And giving me the task of sounding the clapper
to mark the watches;
So I am willing to let him use me this way.
As long as he is able to provide me with something to eat,
What do I care about the poor and humble nature of this task?
I am willing to engage in shouting the hour and ringing the bell.

Paracoda Three

When I sit for a while my hands and feet grow numb;
When I stand for a while my stomach begins to hurt.
The baked wheat cakes are cold, and I have to swallow them without any tea to wash them down.
Before the third watch is over, the patrolman on night duty demands that I light him on his way.
All I can manage is to pay him forty cash,
In order to bribe him into letting me off.

Paracoda Four

At the fifth watch when the cocks crow,
And people begin to walk along the streets,
Going hither and thither, every which way,
I happen to come upon an ailing beggar lying beneath a wall.
I am told to keep him warm without interruption,
And it is only when I detect a warm breath from his mouth that I can relax.
I no sooner close my eyes than I have an intimate dream,
From which I suddenly awake and weep until dawn.

Paracoda Five

The beggars ask me, "What are you crying about?"
And I tell them the story of my life from start to finish.
"My ancestors, for generations, have possessed substantial wealth.
If you were to mention the Ch'en family that deals in pine resin,
Who would not have been awestruck at the name?
They resided among the gentry;
My grandfather dealt in salt from the Huai region,
And my father devoted himself to forming influential connections.
But since he gave birth to me, I have been given to excessive drinking and fits of violence.

Paracoda Six

First I lost my grandfather, who used to discipline me,
And later I also lost my father.
My mother doted on me,
And let me do as I pleased.
I became proficient at every kind of drinking and gambling,
And was familiar with all the taverns and bawdy houses.
Everything I did was of this kind.
I had no sooner married than my relatives became implicated in a lawsuit,
And I fled to the home of my in-laws in order to avoid a heavier risk by seeking a lighter.

Paracoda Seven

While I was residing as a son-in-law in the Hsi-men household,
I manipulated the breeze and the moonlight,
seducing my mother-in-law.
In financial matters, I trusted someone who took advantage of me.
I also gambled away quantities of yellow gold and precious jade,
And provided rice and fuel to cover the expenses of the brothels.
After having beaten my wife to the point of death,

She committed suicide, and her family brought a suit against me.
I had to expend a great deal of money,
Before contriving to escape with my life.

Paracoda Eight

I sold my spacious home,
And bought a small dwelling;
Moved into a boarding house,
But could no longer afford it.
I took no thought for the future, or how to preserve what I had left.
Out of hunger, cold, and despair, my concubine fell ill,
And eventually died in my quarters,
unable to stay alive.
Everything I possessed was utterly cleaned out,
But I had not lost my taste
for wine and meat,
And had no alternative but to sell off my ancestral grave sites.

Paracoda Nine

I cannot carry the light,
Or support the heavy;¹⁰
Work as a laborer,
Or engage in farming.
Rather than undertaking anything, I am reluctant to make a move.
When at leisure with nothing to do,
all I hanker after is food;
When I fall asleep, I do not get up until the sun is already red.
My doglike nature is as adamant as steel.
I have grievously wronged all of my ten relatives and nine kinsmen.¹¹
So should I freeze or starve to death, who will bother to care about me?

Paracoda Ten

My landlord is unrelenting in demanding my rent,
And does not think I will be able to stay.
His earthenware pots and broken bowls are utterly useless;
And he has attempted repeatedly to drive me out the door.
My frozen bones and drenched flesh are without a refuge,
And I have felt compelled to commit myself to a homeless shelter.
If only my luck should ever happen to change for the better,
I would then never be able to forget the kindness of my benefactor.

For ages I have endured privation and pain
at the death of my wife;
I have no clothes on my back¹² and my mouth is without nourishment.
My horse is dead, my slaves have fled, and my home has been sold;
All by myself,¹³ I have been forced to move into unknown territory.
In the morning, I frequent the marketplace begging for leftovers;
At night, I sleep in the open, up against the dilapidated walls.
Since there is no other course open to me in the days to come;
I must live in a homeless shelter and beat the watchman's clapper."

To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi was reduced to spending his nights in the homeless shelter, and his days begging for food on the streets.

It so happens that inside the city wall of Ch'ing-ho district there lived an elderly gentleman named Wang Hsüan, whose courtesy name was T'ing-yung. He was more than sixty years old:

His family holdings were substantial;¹⁴ he possessed a charitable disposition; and he was:

Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with his wealth.

He had a wide circle of acquaintances, derived pleasure from his philanthropy, and devoted himself to:

Aiding the poor and rescuing the wretched;¹⁵

Enjoying goodness and respecting the gods.

His two sons had both:

Set up households and established themselves.

His eldest son was named Wang Ch'ien and had inherited the office of battalion commander of the local Horse Pasturage Battalion of the Court of the Imperial Stud. His second son was named Wang Chen and was currently a government student in the prefectural school. The old gentleman had hired a manager and set up a pawnshop on the street-front of his residence. Every day, what with:

His elegant clothing and ample diet,¹⁶

His leisure and lack of obligations,

he was free to:

Attend scripture readings in Buddhist temples,

Or discourse on the Way in Taoist sanctuaries.

When he had nothing else to do, he would situate himself at the gate of his residence and dispense medicine to the sick, or finger his rosary and recite the Buddha's name. Because there were two apricot trees in his rear garden, he called himself the Layman of the Apricot Hermitage.

Wang Hsüan Relies on Righteousness to Help the Poor

One day, he was standing at his gate wearing a double-layered scholar's cap on his head, and a patchwork Taoist gown on his body, when Ch'en Ching-chi happened to pass by and proceeded to go down on his knees and kowtow to him.

Wang Hsüan hastily bowed to him in return, saying, "Brother, who are you? Old and decrepit as I am, my vision is too blurred to recognize you."

Ch'en Ching-chi, trembling and shivering, stood to one side and said, "I would not deceive you, venerable sir. I am the son of Ch'en Hung, the dealer in pine resin."

The old gentleman pondered this for what seemed like half a day before saying, "So you are the respected son of Ch'en Hung are you?"

Noticing that:

His clothing looked disheveled, and

His countenance seemed haggard,¹⁷

he said, "My worthy nephew, how have you been reduced to such a state?"

He then went on to ask, "Are your father and mother well?"

"My father passed away in the Eastern Capital," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "and my mother is also dead."

"I have heard that you were living in your father-in-law's household," said Wang Hsüan.

"My father-in-law is dead," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and my mother-in-law expelled me from the household. When her daughter died, she lodged an accusation against me, and I was forced to endure a lawsuit. I have had to sell our home and have been robbed of what capital I possessed. As a result, I have been idle for some time, and unable to make a living."

"My worthy nephew," said Wang Hsüan, "where are you living at present?"

Ch'en Ching-chi hesitated for what seemed like half a day before saying, "I will not deceive you, venerable sir. The case is thus and so."

"How sad, worthy nephew," said Wang Hsüan. "So you have been forced to beg for your sustenance. I recall that your family was originally one of considerable substance. At the time when I was acquainted with your father, worthy nephew, you were still young, your hair was done up in a topknot, and you were going to school. Since then, you have fallen into such a state. How regrettable! How regrettable! Are you without any relatives who might be able to help you out?"

"That is the case," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "My maternal uncle Chang Kuan has not seen fit to visit me for some time, so I would not feel comfortable approaching him."

After questioning him for some time, the old gentleman ushered Ch'en Ching-chi into the parlor of his dwelling, ordered a page boy to set up a table and lay out some refreshments, and then urged his guest to eat his fill.

When he noticed how thinly clad he was, he got out a Taoist gown of black wool, a felt cap, a pair of felt stockings, and a pair of woollen shoes; weighed out a tael's worth of silver, along with five hundred copper cash; and gave them all to him, saying, "Worthy nephew, these clothes, and shoes and stockings, are for you to wear. These copper cash are for your living expenses, and ought to enable you to rent half a room to live in. This tael of silver can be used to start a little business of some kind, in order to feed you, and supply your daily expenses. That would be better than living in a homeless shelter, where you will have no chance of improving yourself. When your monthly rent becomes due, you can come to see me, and I will take care of it for you."

Ch'en Ching-chi got down on the floor and kowtowed to him in gratitude, saying, "Your humble nephew understands."

So saying, he took his leave but neither looked for a room to rent nor tried to start a business. Day by day, he spent the five hundred copper cash in taverns and noodle shops, until they were all gone. And as for the tael of silver, he had it melted down and compounded with baser metals and then tried to peddle it in the streets but was arrested by the police, accused of petty larceny, taken to the office of the local ward adjutant, and subjected to the squeezers and a beating. As a consequence, he was not only utterly wiped out, but also left with a buttocks completely covered with welts. In less than two days, he was compelled to pawn his woollen robe and stockings in exchange for something to eat and was reduced, as before, to begging in the streets.

One day, he happened once more to pass by the gate of Wang Hsüan's residence. Wang Hsüan, who was standing there at the time, looked on as Ch'en Ching-chi kowtowed to him and noticed that he was no longer wearing the robe and stockings he had given him, but had nothing but the felt cap on his head, that the feet in his sandals were bare, and that he appeared to be not only chilled but:

Both impoverished and emaciated.

The old gentleman addressed him, saying, "Master Ch'en, how is your business going? I imagine your rent must be due, and you have come here to get it from me."

Ch'en Ching-chi found himself to be:

At a loss for words, for what seemed like half a day; and it was only after he had been asked time and time again that he replied, saying, "Thus and so, I have been completely wiped out."

"Ai-ya! Worthy nephew," the old gentleman responded, "that is no way to support yourself. Since:

You cannot lift the light,

Or support the heavy,

engaging in some business, however insignificant, is better than having to beg for your food. That way you can avoid becoming a laughingstock to others, and bringing shame on the reputation of your ancestors. Why don't you do as I suggest?"

So saying, he once again ushered him inside and had his page boy An-t'ung provide him with enough food to eat his fill.

He also gave him a pair of trousers, a white cotton shirt, a pair of foot bindings, a string of copper cash, and a peck of rice and said, "Take these things with you, and be sure to start up a small business of some kind. You can sell kindling and charcoal, or beans and melon seeds, in order to make a living for yourself, which would be better than having to beg for your food this way."

Although Ch'en Ching-chi gave his verbal consent to these suggestions, took the money and rice in hand, and left the old gentleman's residence, it did not take more than a few days for him to consume it all, sharing the ready-cooked meat and noodles with his fellow beggars in the homeless shelter. He also gambled away the white cotton shirt and the trousers he had been given.

During the first month of the new year, he was once again out walking the streets, while wrapping his arms around his shoulders to keep warm. Although he was somewhat embarrassed at the prospect of seeing the old gentleman again, he went up to the wall under the gable of the old gentleman's gatehouse and stood there warming himself in the sun. The old gentleman regarded him with a sardonic eye but did not speak to him. Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded:

Hesitantly and punctiliously, to make his way forward, after which, he knelt down on the ground and kowtowed before him.

When the old gentleman saw that he looked just as destitute as before, he said to him, "Worthy nephew, this is not a viable plan for the future.

One's appetites are as deep as the ocean;
The days and months fly by like shuttles.¹⁸

How can one ever hope to fill up a bottomless pit? Come inside. I have something to say to you. There is a place that would not only provide you with undisturbed leisure, but also with a haven in which to stay. My only fear is that you may not consent to go there."

Ch'en Ching-chi knelt down and wept, saying, "If my venerable uncle should see fit to take pity on me, no matter where this place may be, if it will only accommodate me, I will consent to go there."

Wang Hsüan responded, saying, "The place in question is not far from our city. On the dock at Lin-ch'ing there is a Yen-kung Temple, a Taoist establishment dedicated to the worship of the river god Yen-kung.¹⁹ That is:

A location teeming with fish and rice,²⁰ where river boats congregate in large numbers. The temple is amply supplied with money and provisions, and endowed with a secluded and elegant atmosphere. Abbot Jen, the head priest of the temple, is an old acquaintance of mine, and he has two or three disciples and acolytes serving under him. I propose to provide appropriate gifts and escort you there in order for you to become a disciple of his and enter the priesthood. If you were to study the sacred texts, learn to perform religious music, and thus be able to confer blessings upon people, it would be a good thing."

"If my venerable uncle is willing to help me out that way," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "that would really be wonderful."

"In that case," said Wang Hsüan, "you can go now. Tomorrow is an auspicious day. If you come here early in the morning, I will escort you there."

After Ch'en Ching-chi had gone, Wang Hsüan promptly summoned a tailor and had him make up two sets of Taoist garments, a Taoist cap, and shoes and stockings for him.

The next day, Ch'en Ching-chi showed up as he had promised, and Wang Hsüan had him take a bath in an empty room, comb his hair, put on the Taoist cap, change into a new jacket and new trousers, don a black silk Taoist robe, and slip into felt stockings and a pair of shoes with cloud patterned toes. He also prepared four trays of preserved fruit, a jug of wine, and a bolt of fabric, and sealed up five taels of silver. He then mounted his horse, hired a donkey for Ch'en Ching-chi to ride, and, with his page boys An-t'ung and Hsi-t'ung following them, and two carriers bearing the gift boxes, set out for the Yen-kung Temple on the dock in Lin-ch'ing. It was only a day's journey of seventy li. By the time they arrived at the Yen-kung Temple, it had begun to grow late. Behold:

The image of the sun is about to sink;
The luxuriant shade has already fallen.
The sunset clouds, reflected in the water, dispense their red glow;²¹
The setting sun, as it crosses the hills, engenders bluish mists.
Amid the shadows of the verdant willows,²²
One hears the birds returning to the woods.
In the villages with their red apricots,
One sees the cattle herding into the fold.²³

Truly:

On the banks of the streams fishermen
head into the woods;
On the meadows the herd boys ride home
astride their calves.²⁴

Upon coming to the Lin-ch'ing dock, Wang Hsüan crossed the great bridge over the Kuang-chi lock, gazed at the innumerable boats that were moored on the canal, and arrived in front of the Yen-kung Temple, where he dismounted and prepared to go inside. Behold:

The verdant pines are luxuriant,
The emerald cypresses are dense.
To either side there are peaked red walls,
Upon the facade are three vermilion gates.

Truly, it was an imposing temple. Behold:

The gate of the temple soars aloft,
Its halls and porticos rise boldly.
Displayed on high is an imperial plaque in letters of gold;
And a picture of officials, leaving and entering the court.²⁵
The thirty-foot-wide great hall,²⁶
Contains effigies of the twelve Dragon Kings;
The two colonnades that flank it,

Have images of myriads of aquatic creatures.
Flagstaffs stretch up toward the heavens;
The words on the flags catching the wind.
In all four quarters and the eight directions,²⁷
The spring and autumn sacrifices are offered on schedule;
When rains are seasonable and winds favorable,
The common people perform sacrifices along the waterways.
The efficacy of a myriad years of burning incense²⁸ has been acknowledged;
In the four quarters both officials and commoners depend on it for peace.

The young servants beneath the gate of the temple had spotted the arrival of the visitors and went inside to report it to the abbot's quarters. Abbot Jen promptly adjusted his clothing and came out to receive them. Wang Hsüan directed Ch'en Ching-chi and the bearers of the gifts to wait outside.

In no time at all, Abbot Jen ushered Wang Hsüan into the reception hall of his quarters, known as the Pine Crane Studio, where he greeted him, saying, "Venerable layman, why has it been so long since you last came to my humble temple? What good fortune has led you to deign to visit me today?"

"It is only because I have been tied up with mundane matters at home," responded Wang Hsüan, "that I have been remiss in paying you a visit for so long."

After exchanging the customary amenities, they sat down in the positions of host and guest, and a young servant presented them with a serving of tea.

When they had finished their tea, Abbot Jen said, "Venerable layman, it is already late in the day, and you might as well stay overnight."

So saying, he ordered a servant to take his visitor's horse back to the stable in the rear and see that it was fed and housed for the night.

Wang Hsüan then said:

 "If I did not have a reason to do so, I would not visit the Hall of the Three Treasures.

It is because I have a favor to ask of you that I have come to pay you this visit. But I don't know whether or not you will agree to it."

"Venerable layman," responded Abbot Jen, "what would you like me to do? Just tell me what it is. I would not presume to reject your command."

"At present," said Wang Hsüan, "there is a young man named Ch'en Ching-chi, who is the son of an old friend of mine. He is just twenty-three years old, is clean-cut by nature, and is as clever as can be. The only problem is that his parents passed away too early so that he has not been properly brought up. His family was quite affluent, so he is not a person from an undistinguished background, and he came into a substantial inheritance, but lost everything as the result of a lawsuit and has been reduced to homeless destitution. Out of regard for my former friendship with his father, I would like to introduce him into your prestigious temple to become a disciple of yours. But I don't know what you may think of this proposal."

"Venerable layman," replied Abbot Jen, "whatever you suggest, I would not venture to oppose. But it has been my misfortune that, though I already have two or three disciples on hand, they are not very intelligent, and none of them are likely to succeed. This has been a source of constant annoyance for me. I wonder whether this young man is a straightforward person or not?"

"As for this young man," responded Wang Hsüan, "I would not deceive your reverence, but you don't need to worry; he is always serious and content to abide by his lot. He possesses a timorous disposition and is straightforward about everything. He would make a good disciple."

"When do you propose to bring him here?" asked Abbot Jen.

"He is waiting outside the temple gate right now," responded Wang Hsüan.

"I have also brought some paltry gifts. I humbly beseech you to accept them with a smile."

This flustered Abbot Jen into asking, "Venerable layman, why did you not say so before?"

He then went on to say, "Invite him to come in."

Thereupon, the bearers proceeded to carry in the gifts, and Abbot Jen saw that the card accompanying them read, "Respectfully presented with a bow by your pupil Wang Hsüan: a bolt of coarse satin, a jug of insipid wine, a set of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two boxes of fruits, and five taels of white gold."

Abbot Jen promptly bowed in gratitude, saying, "Venerable layman, what need was there for you to put yourself to the trouble of presenting me with all these lavish gifts? You put me in a position in which it would be:

 Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."

Whom should he see at this juncture but Ch'en Ching-chi, who wore a gilt-ridged Taoist cap on his head, a black silk Taoist robe on his body, a pair of shoes with cloud-patterned toes and white socks, and a silk belt around his waist. He had:

Clear-cut brows and sparkling eyes;
His teeth were white and his lips were red, and
His face looked as though it were powdered.

On coming in, he went up to Abbot Jen, knelt down on the floor, and proceeded to perform:

Four brace makes eight kowtows.

Abbot Jen asked him, "How old are you?"

"I was born in the year of the horse," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so next spring I will be twenty-three years old."

Upon seeing that he did indeed seem to be clever, Abbot Jen bestowed a Taoist appellation on him, so that he became known as Ch'en Tsung-mei.

It so happens that Abbot Jen already had two disciples at his command. The senior disciple was called Chin Tsung-ming, and the junior disciple was called Hsü Tsung-shun. So Ch'en Ching-chi took his place with them and was known by the appellation Ch'en Tsung-mei.

Abbot Jen called the other disciples out, and they exchanged greetings, after which he formally accepted the gifts he had been offered. A young servant then lit the lanterns, set up a table, and laid out the foodstuff, after which they fell to drinking wine. The surface of the table was covered with cups and platters, along with an assortment of foods including chicken, pig's trotters, goose, duck, fish, shrimp, and the like.

Wang Hsüan did not drink very much, although the abbot and his disciples took turns urging him to do so.

After a while, he said:

"I cannot handle the effects of the wine," excused himself, and went to his room, where a bed had been set up for him, and went to sleep for the night.

Early the next morning, a young servant brought water for him to wash his face in, and by the time he had combed his hair and performed his ablutions, Abbot Jen came in to offer him a serving of tea. Before long, breakfast was laid out, and they drank another two rounds of wine together.

After his horse had been fed, and the bearers had been paid for their efforts, Wang Hsüan prepared to make his departure and called Ch'en Ching-chi over in order to instruct him, saying, "While here, you must devote yourself to mastering the scriptures, and obey your master's instructions. I will come visit you from time to time and will see that you are supplied with new clothing and footwear at the change of seasons."

He also turned to Abbot Jen and said, "If he fails to obey your instructions, discipline him as you see fit. I will certainly not endeavor to defend his shortcomings."

He also admonished Ch'en Ching-chi in private, saying, "After I am gone,

I want you to:

Cleanse your heart and reform your ways.

You must devote yourself to the task at hand. If you fail once again to live up to my expectations, I will concern myself with you no more in the future."

Ch'en Ching-chi assented, saying, "Your son understands."

Wang Hsüan thereupon said farewell to Abbot Jen, went outside, mounted his horse, left the Yen-kung Temple, and set off for home.

From this time on, Ch'en Ching-chi led the life of a Taoist novice in the Yen-kung Temple. He observed that Abbot Jen:

Was elderly with a ruddy nose;
Possessed an imposing stature;
Had a clear, resounding voice,²⁹
And fully bearded countenance;
Was glib and devoted to drink;

and concerned himself only with:

Welcoming guests and seeing off visitors.

All other matters, both great and small, were left in the hands of his senior disciple Chin Tsung-ming.

At that time, the government had just completed the necessary repair work and reopened the Grand Canal. At Lin-ch'ing two locks had been constructed to control the water where the canal met the Wei River. Crew members from both government and private boats on the canal, on reaching the locks would come to the Yen-kung Temple, in order to seek the protection of the spirits, to fulfill their vows, to seek their fortunes by interpreting the hexagrams in the Book of Changes, or casting divining blocks.³⁰ There were also those who came in order to perform good deeds, by donating money and rice, contributing incense, lamp oil, paper money, and candles, or furnishing pine resin and rush mats.

Abbot Jen was in the habit of taking the surplus supplies from the temple treasury and assigning them to his disciples with which to set up shop on the dock, while keeping the profits from these transactions for himself. His senior disciple Chin Tsung-ming was also not one to be content with his lot. He was about thirty years old, was in the habit of maintaining singing girls from the local brothels as his mistresses, and was:

A libertine devoted to wine and sex.³¹

He also had two innocent young novices at his disposal, with whom he was accustomed to sleep at night, but as time passed he had become tired of them. When he encountered Ch'en Ching-chi and observed that:

His teeth were white and his lips were red,

His face looked as though it were powdered;
that he was:

Clean-cut, unusual, and;
Didn't miss a wink,

he arranged for them to share the same room. In the evening, he would ply him with drink for half the night until he was utterly soused, and then go to sleep on the same bed with him. At first, they slept head to foot and foot to head, but he objected to the smell of Ch'en Ching-chi's feet and had him come share the same pillow with him. But before they had been asleep very long, he complained about Ch'en Ching-chi's breath, and had him turn over so that his bottom ended up against his belly. Ch'en Ching-chi pretended to be asleep and paid no attention to him, but he went on to manipulate his organ until it rose up as hard and straight as a stick, rubbed some saliva on the head of his glans, and proceeded to thrust it into his anus. It so happens that when Ch'en Ching-chi had been residing in the homeless shelter, the beggar boss Hou Lin, whose nickname was Flying Demon, had sodomized him, so that his anus was already enlarged. As a result, Chin Tsung-ming's organ had penetrated him before he knew it.

Chin Tsung-ming Opts to Sodomize a Youthful Acolyte

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:
From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,
“This rascal is asking for it; he is trying to take such egregious advantage of me. Who does he take me for? I’ll give him something to savor in return and thereby make him pay for his fun.”

Ch’en Ching-chi, thereupon, made a show of crying out in protest, and Chin Tsung-ming, fearing that Abbot Jen would hear him, promptly put his hand over his mouth, saying, “Good brother, be quiet. Whatever you demand from me, I will agree to.”

“If you want to have a fling with me,” responded Ch’en Ching-chi, “and don’t want me to reveal it, you’ll have to agree to three conditions.”

“My brother,” responded Chin Tsung-ming, “not to mention three conditions; even if you impose ten conditions, I’ll agree to them all.”

“The first condition,” said Ch’en Ching-chi, “is that if you want to carry on with me, you will no longer sleep with those other two novices. The second condition is that I be given control over the keys to all the doors on the premises, both large and small. The third condition is that you will not raise objections to my going anywhere I want. If you agree to all these conditions, I will let you do what you wish with me.”

“That’s no problem,” said Chin Tsung-ming. “I’ll agree to everything.”

That night the two of them proceeded to:

Tumble and toss this way and that,³² for fully half the night. Ch’en Ching-chi had been a habitu   of the world of breeze and moonlight ever since his youth, so there wasn’t much he didn’t know about anything. On this occasion, what with:

Vows under the covers to be as faithful as the hills,

Promises by the pillowside to be as true as the seas;

Obscene noises and lascivious words,

Sucking at this and toying with that;

he managed to please Chin Tsung-ming to the point that:

His delight knew no bounds.

The next day, as promised, he turned over the keys to Ch’en Ching-chi, and he no longer spent the night with the other two novices, but slept on the same bed with him every day.

As time passed:

One day became two,

Two days became three.

One day, it so happened that Abbot Jen and his two disciples were scheduled to go to someone’s home to pray for blessings and perform good works, and the abbot chose to leave Ch’en Ching-chi behind to look after the temple as a crafty means of testing his integrity.

Abbot Jen thought to himself, “The venerable layman Wang Hs  an said that he was conscientious, and I would like to see whether he is conscientious or not.”

As he was about to go out the gate, he instructed him, saying, “You stay here and look after that flock of chickens I am raising in the backyard. They are actually phoenixes, and, before long, when I have:

Achieved merit and fulfilled my tasks,³³

I hope to ascend to Heaven upon one of them, and pay court to the Jade Emperor. Those crocks that are secreted in one of the rooms contain liquid poison. If any one of my disciples should commit a serious offense, I would not beat him, but merely give him a dose of this liquid poison to drink, which would cause him to pass away on the spot. You must conscientiously look after everything, and when I return after the midday repast I will bring you something to eat.”

When he had finished speaking, the abbot and his disciples left the temple.

Ch’en Ching-chi closed the door behind them and laughed to himself, saying, “How could he think that I would not see through these things; claiming that those crocks of glutinous millet wine are actually liquid poison, and that those few chickens in the backyard are phoenixes, on which he hopes to mount to Heaven?”

Thereupon, he proceeded to kill one of the fattest chickens, pluck it clean, and cook it in a pot; and then used a basin to dip up some of the wine and heat it on the fire. After which, pulling apart the limbs of the chicken with his hands, and dipping the flesh into a mixture of garlic and vinegar, he feasted until he might well have ejaculated:

“Is it not delightful?”

As he ate, he uttered four lines to describe his pleasure:

With a brass basin I scoop up the clear wine,

Like mist veiling the bright moon;

I dip the slow-cooked chicken

in garlic sauce,

Like wind sweeping away the clouds.

While he was eating, he heard his master Abbot Jen calling for him outside the gate, upon which, he hastily cleared away the utensils and went out to open the door for him.

Abbot Jen noticed that his face was red and asked him what had happened, but Ch’en Ching-chi merely hung his head in silence.

“Why don’t you speak?” Abbot Jen asked him.

“I will explain the situation to you, master,” said Ch’en Ching-chi. “After you left, one of those phoenixes in the backyard managed to fly away somehow, which left me in a state of panic. I climbed up onto the roof to look for it for what seemed like half a day, but could not find it. Fearing that when you came back you would give me a beating, I thought of slitting my throat with a knife but was afraid of the pain it would cause. I thought of hanging myself but was afraid the rope might break and I would fall down. I thought of jumping into a well but was afraid the mouth might be too small and would catch me by the neck. Unable to think of any viable alternative, I ended up by dipping out two bowls worth of the liquid poison in those crocks of yours and drinking them down.”

“How did you feel after drinking them?” Abbot Jen asked.

“Since drinking them down,” said Ch’en Ching-chi, “for what seems like half a day, I have felt;

Neither dead nor alive,
just as though I were drunk.”

On hearing this explanation, Abbot Jen and his two disciples laughed to themselves, saying, “He turns out to be straightforward after all.”

Consequently, Abbot Jen put up the money to buy an ordination certificate for him, so that from then on, as an ordained Taoist monk, he was free to do as he pleased. Truly:

You may peddle a load of truths for three days without making a sale;
While in a single day three loads of falsehoods may actually sell out.

As a result, Ch’en Ching-chi frequently took money in hand and went out to enjoy himself on the dock.

While there, he ran into a “cribber” from the licensed quarter named Ch’en the Third, who told him, “The madam of Feng Chin-pao’s establishment has died, and she has been sold to the Cheng Family Brothel, where she is known as Cheng Chin-pao. At present she is doing business in a large tavern on the dock. Why don’t you go take a look at her?”

As for the young scamp:

His old feelings for her had not changed.

Taking some silver in hand, he allowed Ch’en the Third to conduct him straight to the tavern. Nothing might have happened if he had not gone there, but since he did go, it was a case of:

Five hundred years ago, these lovers
were fated to meet;
After their affair of the past, they are to be reunited.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In this life one must not begrudge raiment of golden threads;
In this life one should not betray the years of one’s youth.³⁴
If you see flowers you would like to pluck, just pluck them;
Don’t wait till the flowers fall to pluck the bare branches.³⁵

It so happens that this tavern was the most prominent tavern in Lin-ch’ing and was called the Hsieh Family Tavern. It had more than a hundred rooms and was surrounded with green balustrades. It backed on a hill, overlooked the Grand Canal, and was known for:

The liveliness of the teeming crowds, and
The coming and going of boat traffic.
What did this magnificent tavern look like?
Sculpted eaves reflect the sunlight;
Painted rafters fly into the clouds.
Green balustrades connect beneath the balcony windows;
Kingfisher blinds are rolled high above the casements.
Those blowing pipes and playing flutes,
Are all noble scions or royal princelings;
Those holding cups and raising beakers,³⁶
Are bands of courtesans and dancing girls.³⁷
Barely visible to drunken eyes, Soaring into azure Heaven, are ten thousand mountainous clouds;³⁸
Stimulating to poetic thoughts,

Like tumbling drifts of snow, are the waves of mist-bound water.
By the white duckweed crossing,³⁹
One hears trawlers sounding their clappers;
By the red smartweed beachhead,⁴⁰
One hears fishermen beating their bulwarks.
By the tavern side, on the verdant willows,
the wild birds are crowing;
Before the gate, amidst the green poplars, piebald steeds are tethered.⁴¹

Ch'en the Third led Ch'en Ching-chi to an upper floor of the tavern, and into a room, furnished with an ebony table and red lacquered benches, where they sat down together. He then summoned a waiter to wipe off the table, supply cups and chopsticks, and lay out a serving of first-class wine and delicacies, after which he sent him downstairs to summon the powdered face for him. Before long, they heard footsteps on the stairs, and Feng Chin-pao came in, holding a little gong in her hand. Upon seeing Ch'en Ching-chi, she paid him a respectful obeisance.

As the saying goes:

When one lover meets another,
Before they know it, all of a sudden, they will shed two streams of tears.⁴²

Truly:

The sounds of a few amorous words are like warbling orioles;
Tears drop like a strand of pearls falling off their string.⁴³

Ch'en Ching-chi no sooner caught sight of her than he pulled her aside to sit down with him and asked, "Sister, where have you been all this time since I saw you last?"

Feng Chin-pao dried her tears and said, "After I was released from the district yamen, it was not long before my mother, having suffered from shock, fell ill and died. I was subsequently sold into Auntie Cheng the Fifth's establishment as a powdered face. In recent days, however, patrons have been few, and I have been forced to go out onto the Lin-ch'ing dock to seek for customers among the drinkers in the tavern. The other day, I learned from Ch'en the Third that you had come here and opened a money-changing shop. I have been wanting to see you but did not anticipate that you would turn up for a drink in the tavern today, so that I would be able to run into you. I have been longing to death for you."

So saying, she started to weep all over again.

Ch'en Ching-chi pulled a handkerchief out of his sleeve and proceeded to wipe away her tears with it, saying, "My sister, you can stop worrying. I am all right again. After emerging from that lawsuit, and losing all my property, I have sought refuge in the Yen-kung Temple, where I have taken orders as a Taoist monk. My master Abbot Jen has entrusted me with major responsibilities, and I will be able to come see you frequently in the future."

He then went on to ask, "Where are you residing now?"

"I am living just west of the bridge here," responded Feng Chin-pao, "in the place called My Own Tavern operated by Liu the Second. It has over a hundred rooms, and unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls from all over, including the licensed quarter, reside there. During the day, they come out to frequent the various taverns in search of business."

As they talked, the two of them moved closer to each other as they continued drinking. Ch'en the Third went to heat more wine and then came back upstairs with a balloon guitar in hand. Feng Chin-pao then proceeded to play her musical instrument and sing a song to the tune "The Whole Realm Rejoices" in order to entertain Ch'en Ching-chi as he drank his wine.

Tears fall in two streams;
Two streams of tears fall.

Three cups of parting wine;⁴⁴

Parting wine in three cups.

The male and female phoenixes are disunited;

Disunited are the male and female phoenixes.

Behind the mountain ridge the setting sun is gradually sinking;

Gradually sinking behind the mountain ridge is the setting sun.

The sky is growing dim and the earth dark.⁴⁵

Dillydallying, they are reluctant to part;

Reluctant to part, they are dillydallying.⁴⁶

When the two of them began to feel the effects of the wine, they could not help taking a small room and:

Doffing their clothes for the game of clouds and rain.

Ch'en Ching-chi had not had access to a woman recently and had thirsted for such an opportunity for some time. On reencountering Feng Chin-pao, he:

Exhausted himself to please her;

Addicted to the clouds and rain,
He was reluctant to call a halt.

Behold:

One of them stirs his jade arms into motion;
The other gently wriggles her willowy waist.
His pair of pupils spouts fire;⁴⁷
Her starry eyes look dissolute.
One of them, his chest soaked with sweat,
Strives mightily to win two or three bouts.
One of them, emitting cosmetic fragrance,
Moans with satisfaction thousands of times.
The engagement is protracted,
As the "divine turtle" penetrates deeply it is harder than ever;
As the conflict is prolonged,
The gush of his "silvery stream" spurts well into her interior.
Although he had often challenged singing girls in furious battles,
None of them had ever risen to the level
 of this one's intensity.

It was not long before their engagement was over, and they put their clothes back on. Ch'en Ching-chi saw that it was getting late and took his leave of Feng Chin-pao, after rewarding her with a tael of silver, and giving Ch'en the Third three hundred copper cash.

As he was leaving, he said to Feng Chin-pao, "Sister, I plan to come and see you as often as possible, and we might as well meet here in the future. If you should hanker after me, just send Ch'en the Third to summon me."

So saying, he went downstairs and paid Hsieh the Third, the manager of the tavern, three candareens of silver for the wine they had consumed, after which he returned to the temple. Feng Chin-pao accompanied him as far as the bridge before coming back. Truly:

People may wear out their eyes in the desire for money;
Or ravage their faces with tears
 for the sake of lucre.

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

LIU THE SECOND DRUNKENLY BEATS CH'EN CHING-CHI; SUN HSÜEH-O BECOMES A TROLLOP IN MY OWN TAVERN

When flowers bloom they do not disdain
the plots of the poor;
The moon shines on mountains and rivers
so that all are bright.
In this world the heart of man alone
remains vile;
In all things demanding that Heaven
show him favor.
The foolish, the deaf, and the dumb everywhere prosper;
While the clever and the intelligent suffer in poverty.
The year, month, day, and hour of birth determine it all;
However calculated, events are controlled by fate rather than man.¹

THE STORY GOES that, from the time that Ch'en the Third led Ch'en Ching-chi to the Hsieh Family Tavern where he met with Feng Chin-pao, the two of them resumed their former affair. From then on, no three days passed by without their getting together. If Ch'en Ching-chi happened to be tied up at the temple and failed to show up, Feng Chin-pao would send Ch'en the Third to deliver a gift, or a love letter, and request that he come, and he would reward her with five mace or a tael of silver. Later on, he also undertook to supply her with fuel and rice, and to pay her rent. When he returned to the temple, his face was often red. When Abbot Jen asked him where he had been drinking, Ch'en Ching-chi would tell him that he had been enjoying three cups of wine with the manager of the rice shop, in order to reward him for his labors. His fellow disciple Chin Tsung-ming would also cover up for him and continued, needless to say, to have his fun with him in the evenings. As the mornings and evenings succeeded one another, he managed to pilfer nearly half of the assets in Abbot Jen's strongbox without his being aware of it.

One day, it was one of those occasions when:

Something was destined to happen.

Liu the Second, the proprietor of My Own Tavern, who was known as the Turf-protecting Tiger, was the brother-in-law of Chang Sheng, a trusted servant in the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command. He specialized in operating brothels on the Lin-ch'ing dock:

Relying on his power to oppress the weak,² and acting as a loan shark. He would lend money to the singing girls in the brothels at thirty percent interest, and if they failed to pay up when due, he would renegotiate the contract, adding the unpaid interest to the original amount of the loan, and charging interest on the interest. He was:

Given to drinking to excess and becoming violent, so people did not dare to cross him. He was:

A foreman among the beaters of trollops;

A leader among the abusers of drunkards.³

Upon seeing that Ch'en Ching-chi, though still a white-faced youngster, was a disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple and was maintaining the powdered face Cheng Chin-pao as his mistress in Hsieh the Third's tavern, he drank himself into a stupor, proceeded to clench his bowl-shaped fists, and headed for the Hsieh Family Tavern, demanding to know the whereabouts of Cheng Chin-pao.

This threw Hsieh the Third into such consternation that he bowed hastily in response and said, "Uncle Liu the Second, she is residing in room number two on the second floor."

Liu the Second then proceeded, with giant strides, to ascend the steps. Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao were in the room at the time, drinking together, and enjoying each others' company. They had closed the door to the room and left the blind hanging outside.

Liu the Second tore down the blind with his hands and called out in a loud voice, demanding that Cheng Chin-pao should come out. This flustered Ch'en Ching-chi to such an extent that he was barely able to breathe through his nostrils.

Liu the Second then kicked open the door with his foot, and Cheng Chin-pao felt compelled to come outside, saying, "Uncle Liu the Second, what have you got to say to me?"

"You lousy whore!" said Liu the Second, "you owe me three month's rent and have been hiding out here in order to avoid me."

"Uncle Liu the Second," responded Cheng Chin-pao with an ingratiating smile, "you can go home, and I will have my procuress, Auntie Cheng the fifth, deliver the rent to you."

But Liu the Second proceeded to strike her a blow in the chest with his fist, knocking her to the floor, and banging her head on the steps until:

The flow of blood inundated the ground, saying, "You lousy whore! I will not wait to have it delivered to me but am demanding to have it right now."

In the Lofty Tavern Liu the Second Wreaks Havoc

Seeing that Ch'en Ching-chi was in the room, he strode inside and overturned the table, smashing the dishes to smithereens.

"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi. "Who are you to come in and wreak havoc in this way?"

"Fuck you, you 'sweetie'⁴ of a Taoist priest," cursed Liu the Second, whereupon, he proceeded to grab him by the hair and hold him down while he:

Struck him with his fists and kicked him with his feet, innumerable times. The other customers on the upper floor of the tavern were stupefied by what they saw.

The owner of the tavern, Hsieh the Third, on observing that Liu the Second was drunk, did not initially dare to interfere, but when he realized that he was beating someone until he was scarcely recognizable, he came upstairs and endeavored to intervene, saying, "Uncle Liu the Second, venerable sir, pray abate your wrath. He is unfamiliar with your reputation and has offended you by mistake. You would do well to make allowances for him and let him go, for my sake."

Liu the Second paid no attention to him but continued to beat Ch'en Ching-chi with all his strength until he had:

Rendered him senseless to the nth degree.⁵

He then summoned the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit and had them arrest Ch'en Ching-chi and the powdered face, truss them up together with a single length of rope, and lock them up for the night, instructing them to escort them to the yamen of the Regional Military Command early the next morning.

It so happens that Commandant Chou Hsiu had been ordered by imperial edict to protect his territory, apprehend thieves and bandits, and oversee the canals and waterways in his jurisdiction.

Meanwhile, the fact that Ch'en Ching-chi had been arrested was still unknown to Abbot Jen in the Yen-kung Temple, who thought that he was probably staying overnight in the rice shop, having chosen not to return.

To resume our story, the next day, the local constable, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, and the couriers who patrolled the Grand Canal took charge of Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao, hired donkeys for them to ride on, and set out early in the morning to escort them to the yamen of the Regional Military Command. Upon arriving there, they showed the relevant documents to the head servants Chang Sheng and Li An and explained that the culprits had been in a brawl with Uncle Liu the Second, and that one of them was a Taoist priest from the Yen-kung Temple named Ch'en Ching-chi, and the other a singing girl named Cheng Chin-pao.

The soldiers on duty demanded money of them, saying, "We are the corps of twelve personnel who are responsible for administering punishments and are prepared to accept whatever you choose to give us, but you cannot afford to regard the two head servants lightly."

"I did have money on my person," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "but last night while Liu the Second was beating me, someone made off with it. The clothes I was wearing have all been torn to tatters, so where could I conceal any money? All I've got now is the silver hairpin that holds my topknot in place. I'll pull it out, and you can present it to the two head servants."

The jailers took the hairpin and showed it to Chang Sheng and Li An, saying, thus and so, "He could not come up with so much as a candareen but merely presented us with this silver-plated pin."

"Call him to come here so I can interrogate him," said Chang Sheng.

In no time at all, the soldiers hustled him inside and made him kneel down before him.

"What disciple of Abbot Jen are you?" asked Chang Sheng.

"I am his third disciple," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

"How old are you this year?" he went on to ask.

"I am twenty-three years old," replied Ch'en Ching-chi.

"If you are as young as all that," said Chang Sheng, "you ought to be devoting yourself to your duties as a Taoist priest, and studying the scriptures, rather than going out whoring, and drinking, and creating disturbances. What sort of insignificant yamen do you take the commandant's yamen to be, that you should allow yourself to be brought here without any money in hand? This hairpin of yours is:

Hardly enough to discolor the water.

What would I want with it?"

So saying, he tossed it back to him and told the jailers, "Wait a little, until His Honor takes his place on the bench, and then see that this case is given priority. It is obvious that this servile cur of a Taoist priest is a penny-pinching sort himself, though he feels free to solicit money and provisions from:

The patrons in the four directions.

Quite aside from the fact that you have been brought here because you are accused in a law case, even if you were coming to have a drink or attend a feast, you would be expected to bring along a handkerchief with which to wipe your mouth. When the time comes to administer punishment, see to it that this rascal is beaten and subjected to the squeezers as severely as possible."

He also called Cheng Chin-pao before him, but she had been accompanied by the pimp from the Cheng Family Brothel, who had expended three or four taels of silver on the staff of the yamen, both high and low.

"Since you are a singing girl," said Chang Sheng, "it is only natural that you should go where the pickings are good in order to support yourself. That's no big deal. It all depends on the mood of His Honor. If he is angry, you may be subjected to a session or two with the squeezers; while if he is well disposed, he may simply let you go."

The jailer standing to one side said to her, "If you give me another mace of silver, should you be subjected to the squeezers, I will see to it that your two thumbs are spared."

Li An then said to the jailer, "You take her out of sight and wait. His Honor is about to take his place on the bench."

Before long, lo and behold, the cloud-shaped gong sounded and Commandant Chou Hsiu came in and took his place on the bench. The functionaries, soldiers, and jailers were neatly arrayed to either side in strict formation. Behold:

The walls are decked with crimson silk;

The tables covered with purple drapery.

At the head of the chamber are suspended

red hangings;

On all four sides there hang kingfisherhued screens.⁶

The judge adheres strictly to the law;
The admonitory stone tablet is incised with four lines in the Emperor's hand.⁷
The officers are meticulous and honest;
Beside the external abatisses are displayed two of the commandant's standards.
The soldiers and jailers stand sedately;
The functionaries are arrayed imposingly.
Holding their staffs, they stand before the steps ready to perform their duties;
With writing materials in hand, they wait on the sidelines to hear the judgment.
Though only the officers of one region;
They resemble a courtroom full of gods.⁸

On this occasion:

Without coincidences there would be no stories.

It was a case of:

Five hundred kalpas ago, these lovers
were fated to meet;
It is those who are predestined to do so who come together.

Ch'un-mei, after entering Commandant Chou Hsiu's household, had given birth to a son during the eighth month of the previous year, and the young squire was now half a year old.

His face was smooth as a jade cap ornament, and

His lips looked as though they were rouged.

The commandant cherished him as:

A pearl in the palm;

and valued him more than:

A priceless treasure.

Not much later, his first wife died, and the commandant formally raised Ch'un-mei to the status of his legitimate wife and moved her into the master suite of five rooms. He also bought two wet nurses to take care of breast feeding his infant son, one of whom was named Yü-t'ang, and the other Chin-kuei; and two maidservants to wait on his wife, one of whom was named Ts'ui-hua, and the other Lan-hua. He also had two singing girls as concubines, who were fifteen or sixteen years old, one of whom was named Hai-t'ang, and the other Yüeh-kuei, who also waited upon Ch'un-mei in her new quarters. His senior concubine, Sun Erh-niang, had only a single maidservant to wait on her, named Ho-hua. But no more of this.

At the time, the young squire enjoyed having Chang Sheng hold him in his arms and take him outside to play, and when Commandant Chou Hsiu was holding court, Chang Sheng would stand to one side and allow him to look on at the proceedings.

On that day, when Commandant Chou Hsiu took his place on the bench and ordered that the tablet announcing the category of cases to be heard should be hung up, the local constables brought in the prisoners from their jurisdictions for trial, and Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao were the first to be called before him.

When the commandant had read the deposition and saw that there were wounds on Ch'en Ching-chi's face, he said, "You rascal, you are a Taoist priest, yet you:

Do not abide by the Rules of Purity.

How can you indulge in sleeping with prostitutes, drinking, and creating disturbances in my jurisdiction?

This kind of behavior is unacceptable.

Lictors, take him down, give him twenty strokes of the bamboo, and revoke his ordination certificate. As for that singing girl, née Cheng, subject her to fifty blows on the squeezers, and have her sent back to work at the brothel from which she came."

The jailers standing to either side came forward, turned Ch'en Ching-chi over, stripped off his clothes, bound him with a length of rope, flourished their bamboo rods, and shouted for the beating to begin. At this juncture:

Strange as it may seem,

Chang Sheng was standing on the platform in front of the courtroom looking on, with the young squire in his arms, when the child broke away from him, approached Ch'en Ching-chi, and poked him out of a desire to be hugged. Chang Sheng fearing that the commandant would see what was going on, went over and picked him up, but the child started to cry out loud and continued to cry as he carried him back to Ch'un-mei in the rear compound.

"What is he crying about?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"His Honor is conducting affairs in the courtroom," responded Chang Sheng, "and had just ordered that the Taoist priest named Ch'en from the Yen-kung Temple should be given a beating, when the child went over and poked him out of a desire to be hugged. When I took him away, he started to cry.”

Upon hearing that the culprit was named Ch'en, Ch'un-mei:

Lightly moved her lotus feet,

Gently lifted her beige skirt, and made her way out to a position from which she could observe the proceedings from behind a hanging screen.

When she saw that the voice and the appearance of the person being beaten in the courtroom resembled those of Ch'en Ching-chi, she wondered, “Why should he have taken orders and become a Taoist priest?”

She then called over Chang Sheng and asked him, “What is this person's name?”

“According to the deposition of this Taoist priest,” responded Chang Sheng, “he is twenty-three years old, and his secular name is Ch'en Ching-chi.”

Ch'un-mei thought to herself, “So it really is him after all.”

She then turned to Chang Sheng and said, “Go ask His Honor to come see me.”

At the time, as the commandant presided over the court, Ch'en Ching-chi had only been given ten strokes of his sentenced beating, and Cheng Chin-pao was still being subjected to the squeezers.

When Chou Hsiu heard that his wife was calling for him, he ordered the jailers to suspend the beating and went to see her.

“That Taoist priest you are beating is a cousin of mine,” said Ch'un-mei. “Please forgive him for my sake.”

“My wife,” responded Chou Hsiu, “why didn't you let me know before? I have already had him given ten strokes, and there is no remedy for that.”

He then went back to the courtroom and ordered the jailers to let them both off, and to have the singing girl sent back to the brothel from which she came.

He then privately instructed Chang Sheng to call back the Taoist priest and also said, “Go ask your mistress if she would like to see him.”

Ch'un-mei was about to have Chang Sheng call him into the rear compound to see her, when she suddenly remembered something.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but

In her heart she thought to herself:

“If I am able to eradicate the obstacle before my eyes,

I may be able to replace it with the love of my heart;⁹

If the obstacle before my eyes cannot be eradicated,

How can I ever replace it with the love of my heart?”

Thereupon, she said to Chang Sheng, “You can let that person go for the time being. I will call him back another time.”

She also ordered him not to revoke his ordination certificate.

Ch'en Ching-chi, having endured ten strokes with the bamboo, left the commandant's yamen and hastily made his way back to the Yen-kung Temple.

How could he have known that someone had told Abbot Jen, “That disciple of yours, Ch'en Tsung-mei, has been maintaining the harlot Cheng Chin-pao as his mistress in the Hsieh Family Tavern, which has annoyed the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, the owner of My Own Tavern, into beating him into a stinking pulp. Along with the woman, he has been tied up and escorted to the yamen of the Regional Military Command. On the grounds that:

This kind of behavior is unacceptable,

the commandant is sending soldiers to hold you for interrogation, and revoke your ordination certificate.”

When Abbot Jen heard this, on the one hand, he was old and susceptible to fright, while on the other hand, he was suffering from obesity. When he opened his strongbox and found that it was nearly empty, he received such a shock that the phlegm in his heart rose up to choke him, and he:

Fell to the floor in a faint.

His disciples rushed to his assistance and engaged a physician to come and administer a dose of liquid medicine, but he remained:

Oblivious to human affairs.

Later that night, alas:

He stopped breathing and died.

At the time of his death he was sixty-two years old.

The day after this, when Ch'en Ching-chi arrived back at the temple, the neighbors on the left side said to him, “Do you still dare to go into the temple? Your master, on your account, thus and so, has suffered such a severe shock that he died during the third watch last night.”

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he was:

As flustered as a dog who has

lost his way home;

As flurried as a fish who has

escaped the net;

and made his way back to Ch'ing-ho district. Truly:

The case of the deer was one that the minister of Cheng was unable to solve;

Whether the butterfly was Chuang Chou, or vice versa, cannot be determined.¹⁰

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, when Ch'un-mei had seen Ch'en Ching-chi in the commandant's yamen, she had intended to keep him there, but an obstacle to doing so suddenly arose in her mind. She consequently sent Chang Sheng out to tell Ch'en Ching-chi to go his way for the time being. She then went back to her room, removed her headdress, took off her embroidered garments, and threw herself down on the bed, where she proceeded to stroke her chest and hug the covers, giving vent to moans and cries of pain. This had the effect of throwing the entire household, both high and low, into a state of consternation.

The commandant's secondary concubine Sun Erh-niang came in to see her and said, "First Lady, you have seemed to be in good health. What has happened to you?"

"You can go," responded Ch'un-mei. "Just leave me alone."

Later on, when the commandant came in from the courtroom and saw that she was lying on the bed and groaning with pain, he too became flustered, took hold of her hand, and asked, "What is it that is troubling you?"

When she did not reply, he went on to ask, "Has anyone been annoying you?"

Once again, she did not make a sound in response.

The commandant then said, "It must be because I have given your cousin a beating just now that you are upset."

Yet again, she did not respond.

The commandant:

At a loss for what to do,¹¹ went outside and took Chang Sheng and Li An to task, saying, "If the two of you knew that he was your mistress's cousin, why didn't you tell me about it before I had him beaten ten strokes, and thus made your mistress unhappy? I told you to keep him here so that he could meet with your mistress. Why have you let him go instead? I demand an explanation from the two of you."

"I reported the situation to the mistress," said Chang Sheng, "and she said that I should let him go for the time being. It was only then that I let him go."

So saying, he went into the room and wept bitterly as he pled with Ch'un-mei, saying, "Mistress, I beg you to say a word to His Honor on our behalf. Otherwise, he is bent on punishing us."

Ch'un-mei, thereupon:

Opening wide her starry eyes, and Raising up her moth eyebrows, called the commandant into her presence, and said, "It's just that I've been feeling out of sorts and has nothing to do with the two of them. It's only because that rascal:

Is not the sort to abide by his lot, and has gone so far as to go about masquerading as a Taoist priest, that I want to test his patience for a while before acknowledging him."

The commandant, upon hearing this, no longer held Chang Sheng and Li An to blame but, seeing that Ch'un-mei was continuing to groan with pain, sent Chang Sheng to summon a doctor to come and take her pulse.

The doctor said, "Your venerable wife is suffering from a condition engendered by the six desires and seven passions, that has produced a heavy feeling of congestion in the chest."

The medication he prescribed was prepared for her, but she refused to take it, simply letting it grow cold. Her maidservants did not dare to reproach her for this but brought the commandant in to try to get her to take it, whereupon, she did swallow one mouthful but refused to take any more.

When the commandant left the room, his concubine Yüeh-kuei brought the medication over to her again and said, "Mistress, please take the medicine."

But Ch'un-mei picked it up and threw it in her face, reviling her with the words, "You lousy wanton slave! Why should you keep on trying to get me to swallow this bitter liquid? There's nothing in my stomach."

She then made her kneel in penance before her.

Sun Erh-niang came in and asked, "What has Yüeh-kuei done that has caused the mistress to make her kneel this way?"

The concubine Hai-t'ang explained, "When she tried to get the mistress to take her medicine, the mistress said, 'My stomach is empty, so why should you try to force this medicine on me?' That's why she has made her kneel."

"Mistress," inquired Sun Erh-niang, "have you really not eaten anything today? Yüeh-kuei could not have known that. You ought not to beat her. Pray forgive her this once, for my sake."

She then said to Hai-t'ang, "Go into the kitchen and boil some congee for the mistress to eat."

Ch'un-mei then allowed Yüeh-kuei to get up from her kneeling position, while Hai-t'ang went into the kitchen and, carefully and conscientiously, prepared a small pot of thick congee made from nonglutinous rice, along with four saucers of side dishes. After putting the congee in a large bowl, and providing a pair of ivory chopsticks, she brought the steaming hot congee into the room.

At the time, Ch'un-mei was asleep on the bed, with her face to the wall, and she did not venture to disturb her but waited until she turned over before offering it to her, saying, "Mistress, the congee is here. Won't you eat some of it?"

But Ch'un-mei kept her eyes closed and did not respond.

Hai-t'ang appealed to her once again, saying, "The congee is getting cold."

Won't you get up, Mistress, and have some congee?"

Sun Erh-niang, who was standing by her side, said, "Mistress, you haven't had anything to eat for half a day. If you are feeling any better now, why not get up and have something to eat? It will help to maintain your stamina."

Ch'un-mei hastily crawled into an upright position, told the wet nurse to bring over a lamp, and took the bowl of congee into her hands. After swallowing only one mouthful, she shoved it onto the floor, but fortunately the wet nurse caught it in her hands, so that it did not break.

She then raised her voice and shouted at Sun Erh-niang, "You urged me to get up and have some congee for no good reason. Just take a look at the fine batch of congee that lousy slave boiled up. I'm not recuperating from childbirth, so why should she come up with such a thin batch of congee that I can see my face in it?"

She then said to the wet nurse Chin-kuei, "You give that slave four slaps in the face for me."

There and then, she actually did give Hai-t'ang four slaps in the face.

Sun Erh-niang then said, "Mistress, if you don't want to eat the congee, what would you like to eat instead, in order to relieve your hunger?"

"You want me to eat something," responded Ch'un-mei, "but my abdomen is feeling congested, and I can't keep anything down."

After a little while, she called over her junior maidservant Lan-hua and said to her, "I'd like to try some soup flavored with wing tips of chicken. Go into the kitchen and get that whore of a slave to wash her hands and make me a bowl of soup flavored with wing tips of chicken. Have her put in a good number of marinated bamboo shoots, and see that it is both sour and spicy."

Sun Erh-niang said, "Mistress, since you have told her what to do, she will go and have Sun Hsüeh-o make it for you. When you hanker after some particular dish, it will be as good as medicine for you."

Lan-hua did not dare to be remiss but went straight to the kitchen and said to Sun Hsüeh-o, "The mistress has ordered you to make some soup flavored with chicken wing tips for her. Hurry up and do it. She is waiting to have it."

Sun Hsüeh-o thereupon proceeded to:

Wash her hands and trim her nails,

after which, she killed two little chickens, plucked them clean, removed their wing tips, and cut them into slivers with a sharp knife. She then mixed in pepper, minced scallions, coriander, marinated bamboo shoots, oil, soy sauce, and the like, in order to make a clear broth, with which she filled two bowls, and placed them, while still steaming hot, on a red lacquer tray, for Lan-hua to take back to the master suite.

After looking them over by the light of a lamp, Ch'un-mei swallowed a mouthful but immediately cried out in an angry voice, "Go ask that whore of a slave what kind of soup she thinks she has made? It is as clear and flavorless as water and has no taste at all. You all may have been trying to get me to eat something, but all you are doing is making me angry, for no good reason."

This had the effect of causing Lan-hua to fear a beating, and she promptly returned to the kitchen, where she told Sun Hsüeh-o, "The mistress objects to the tastelessness of the soup and is ranting abusively about it."

Sun Hsüeh-o did not say a word, but proceeded to:

Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel,

as she put the pot back on the stove, made another bowl of soup, to which she added additional pepper, making it redolently fragrant, and gave it to Lan-hua to take back to the master suite. Ch'un-mei once again objected that it was too salty, and picking up the bowl she threw the soup onto the floor. Luckily, Lan-hua was quick enough to dodge out of the way, or it would have splashed all over her.

Ch'un-mei said irately, "You go and tell that slave that I know she is annoyed at having to cook for me, but if she doesn't do any better this time, she will have to answer for it."

When Sun Hsüeh-o heard this:

Though she never, ever, should have done it, she mumbled out loud, "Sister, since when did you become so high and mighty as to impose on other people this way?"

She did not anticipate that Lan-hua, upon returning to the master suite, would repeat this remark of hers to Ch'un-mei.

If Ch'un-mei had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard it, she immediately:

Pricked up her willow brows,

Opened wide her starry eyes, and Ground her silver teeth to smithereens,

As her powdered face turned bright red.

"Go drag that whore of a slave in here for me," she shouted.

In no time at all, three or four wet nurses and maidservants succeeded in dragging Sun Hsüeh-o into the room.

Ch'un-mei, in a rage, grabbed hold of her by the hair, tore off her headdress, and cursed her, saying, "You whore of a slave! How can you ask how I became so high and mighty? It was not the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing that elevated me to this status. I bought you in order to serve me, and you have been unhappy to do so. You were told to make me some soup, but what you produced was either too tasteless, or overly salty. Yet you have the nerve to ask in front of a maidservant when I became so high and mighty as to impose on other people. What further use do I have for the likes of you?"

She then sent for the commandant and had him force Sun Hsüeh-o to kneel in the courtyard, after which, she summoned Chang Sheng and Li An from the front compound and ordered them to strip off her clothing, and give her thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo. The servants, accordingly, lined up to either side and lit brightly shining lanterns, while Chang Sheng and Li An stood by with their heavy bamboos in hand.

When Sun Hsüeh-o objected to taking off her clothes, the commandant, who was afraid of angering Ch'un-mei, did not venture to intervene, but Sun Erh-niang, who was standing to one side, pled with Ch'un-mei, saying, "Mistress, order her to be beaten as many strokes as you like, but spare her the humiliation of having her underclothes removed. If she is stripped completely naked in front of the servants, it will not redound to His Honor's credit. I pray you, Mistress, to:

Lift high your gracious hand,
though it is true that she is at fault."

But Ch'un-mei refused this request and adamantly insisted that she be stripped naked to be beaten, saying, "If anyone should try to stop me, I will first dash my child to death, and then hang myself with a length of rope, leaving her behind in my place."

Thereupon, without ordering the beating to proceed, she threw herself to the ground, where she lay in a faint, stretched out at full length:

Oblivious to human affairs.

The commandant, in a state of panic, hastily lifted her up, saying, "Go ahead and beat her however you want. Don't get so upset over it."

Thereupon, the pitiable Sun Hsüeh-o was:

Forcibly turned over on the ground,¹² stripped of her clothing, and subjected to thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo. She was beaten until:

The skin was broken and the flesh was split.

Ch'un-mei then dispatched a young jailer to summon Auntie Hsüeh in the middle of the night and instructed her to take Sun Hsüeh-o off empty-handed and offer her for sale.

Taking Auntie Hsüeh aside, she said to her, "I want no more than eight taels of silver for her. Take this whore of a slave away, and do your best to sell her into a house of prostitution. I don't care how much money you make on the transaction, but if you dispose of her anywhere else, and I hear about it, I won't have anything more to do with you."

"Who else do I depend on for my livelihood?" said Auntie Hsüeh. "I can hardly refuse to do as you say."

That very night she took Sun Hsüeh-o home with her, where she continued to weep pitifully:

In sorrow and distress,
until the day dawned.

"There's no point in crying any more," Auntie Hsüeh urged her. It's just your bad fortune to have ended up in the hands of your enemy. His Honor is not ill-disposed toward you, but unluckily your old enemy, harboring her old resentment, is out to hurt you, and His Honor feels that:

The situation is out of his control.

Since she has borne him a son, he feels obliged to accommodate her every wish. Even his secondary consort Sun Erh-niang feels that she must give way to her. As the saying goes:

Even a worker who pilfers the rice will sometimes rise to become head of the granary.

There is nothing more to be said about it. You should swallow your resentment and stop crying."

Sun Hsüeh-o dried her tears and thanked Auntie Hsüeh, saying, "I only hope that sooner or later you can find a good customer for me, who will be able to support me."

"She ordered me repeatedly," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "to sell you into a house of prostitution. But I feel that:

Those who raise sons and raise daughters,
Should be governed by Heavenly principle.

I will endeavor either to find a monogamous match for you, so there will be but:

One husband and a single wife;

or marry you to a merchant with limited capital, who will be able to support you."

Sun Hsüeh-o thanked Auntie Hsüeh for this with:

A thousand thanks and ten thousand expressions of good will.

Two days later, Old Mother Chang, the proprietress of an inn next door to Auntie Hsüeh's residence, came over to see her and asked, "What woman are you harboring in your place that cries so piteously?"

Auntie Hsüeh invited her inside and said, "This is the lady in question. She comes from a prominent household but was unable to get along with her mistress and has been driven out and turned over to me to find her a husband. She is hoping for a monogamous match, involving but:

One husband and a single wife,

in order to avoid such rancorous conflicts in the future."

"There is a cotton merchant from Shantung lodging at my inn," said Old Mother Chang. "His name is P'an the Fifth, he is thirty-six years old, has several cartloads of cotton wool to sell, and often stays at my place. The other day he told me that he has a mother who is more than seventy years old and is unwell, and that his wife died half a year ago, so that he has no one to look after her. He has repeatedly asked me to arrange a match for him, but I have been unable to find anyone suitable. It seems to me that this lady is about the same age and would make a good wife for him."

"I will not deceive you," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but this lady comes from a prominent household and is adept at both rough and refined domestic work. As for needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, not to mention:

Skill with cooking pots and stoves,¹³

That naturally goes without saying.

In addition to which, she makes excellent soups. At present, she is just thirty-four years old, and her owner is asking only thirty taels of silver for her, so she ought to be a good match for him."

"Does she have trunkloads of personal belongings?" asked Old Mother Chang.

"She has only the clothing she is wearing and the hairpins and bracelets she has on," replied Auntie Hsüeh. "She is without any other luggage."

"In that case," said Old Mother Chang, "I will go back and tell him about her, and propose that he come over to see her for himself."

After concluding this discussion, and drinking her tea, she sat a little longer and then went home. That evening, she told her lodger about it.

The next day, after breakfast, she actually did bring her lodger over to see for himself. When he saw that Sun Hsüeh-o was both attractive and young, he promptly offered to pay twenty-five taels of silver for her, and to give Auntie Hsüeh an additional tael of silver as her go-between's fee. Auntie Hsüeh did not bother to bargain with him but proceeded to weigh the silver and write out a contract, allowing him to take her away that very night, so they could leave the next morning.

Sun Hsüeh-o Becomes a Trollop in My Own Tavern

After the transaction was concluded, Auntie Hsüeh had someone alter the wording of the contract, weighed out a mere eight taels of silver, and then had this amount delivered to Ch'un-mei in the commandant's household, and report that she had sold her into a house of prostitution.

P'an the Fifth took Sun Hsüeh-o back to Old Mother Chang's place to spend the night, and during the fifth watch the next morning he thanked Old Mother Chang and took his leave of her, after which, the two of them got into a cart and headed straight for Lin-ch'ing. It was the sixth month at the time, so the days were long, and the sun had just begun to set when they arrived at the dock and made their way to My Own Tavern.

This establishment had more than a hundred rooms, in which unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls from all over, including the licensed quarter, were housed. Sun Hsüeh-o was led into a half-sized chamber containing an earthen k'ang, on which there sat a fifty- or sixty-year-old woman. There was also a sixteen- or seventeen-year-old girl from the establishment waiting upon her, whose hair was done up in two curled knots on either side of her head, who was made up with white face powder and red lips, was garbed in soft damask clothing, and was standing by the k'ang strumming a balloon guitar.

When Sun Hsüeh-o saw this, she gasped in distress, for she realized that this man P'an the Fifth must be a white slaver, who had bought her in order to make her into a powder-faced singing girl. She was renamed Yü-erh and, like the other young girl, whose name was Chin-erh, was expected to make her living by taking a little gong with her every day, and frequenting the taverns on the dock in order to attract customers, and sing to them.

No sooner did she enter the door than P'an the Fifth:

Without discussing the pros and cons of the matter,¹⁴ proceeded to give her a beating, and restrict her to her bed for two days, while giving her only two bowls of rice to eat. She was then given instruction in how to play musical instruments and sing, and when she was not up to the mark, she was beaten again, until her body was covered with red and blue bruises. Only after she began to get the hang of it was she given fine clothing, properly made up, and made to stand by the gate:

Leaning upon the door with a smile,¹⁵ and Provoking attention with her brows.

Truly:

If one's real work had ever found favor in the eyes of one's contemporaries;

One would not have had to spend money on rouge

in order to paint portraits.¹⁶

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In straitened circumstances one has no place to run and no place to flee;

No matter whether one goes south or comes north¹⁷

it will all be to no avail.¹⁸

On this night where have the varicolored clouds ended up being scattered to?

One's dreams follow the path of the bright moon as it sinks above the brothel.¹⁹

While Sun Hsüeh-o was working in My Own Tavern, it just so happened, one day, that:

As providence would have it,

Commandant Chou Hsiu sent Chang Sheng to the canal port of Lin Ch'ing to purchase ten piculs of distiller's yeast, with which to brew homemade wine. When the proprietor of My Own Tavern, the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, saw that his brother-in-law Chang Sheng had come to pay him a visit, he immediately had one of his best rooms swept clean and furnished with wine and delicacies, table utensils, seasonal fruits of various kinds, vintage wine, and fresh fish for the occasion, and invited Chang Sheng to come in for a drink.

The wine steward who was in charge of the drinks knelt down in front of Liu the Second and inquired, "Uncle, which of the singing girls from downstairs should I invite up to serve the drinks?"

Liu the Second responded by saying, "Have Old Sister Wang, Chao Chiao-erh, and P'an the Fifth's two girls, Chin-erh and Yü-erh, the four of them, come up to wait on Brother-in-law Chang."

The wine steward assented and made his way downstairs. It was not long before they heard the sound of laughter coming from the stairwell as the four singing girls, made up as flowerlike beauties, and dressed in outfits of light silk and soft damask, came up the stairs and proceeded:

Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze;

Sending the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying, to kowtow four times before the guest, and then stand to one side.

When Chang Sheng opened his eyes wide and took a good look at them, he thought to himself, "One of these powdered faces:

Strange as it may seem,

looks just like that Sun Hsüeh-o who used to work in His Honor's kitchen until the young mistress drove her away. How did she ever end up here, engaged in this line of work?"

Sun Hsüeh-o, also, upon surveying the scene, recognized Chang Sheng but chose not to say anything.

Chang Sheng then inquired of Liu the Second, "Where do these powdered faces come from?"

"Brother-in-law," said Liu the Second, "there is no reason for me to deceive you. These two, who work for P'an the Fifth, are named Yü-erh and Chin-erh. This one is called Old Sister Wang, and the other is called Chao Chiao-erh.”

“I recognize Old Sister Wang,” said Chang Sheng, “and this Yü-erh from the P’an establishment also looks familiar to me.”

He then called Yü-erh over to him and whispered to her, “Are you not Sun Hsüeh-o from His Honor’s residence? How did you happen to end up here?”

No sooner did Sun Hsüeh-o hear his question than she began to:

Shed two streams of tears,
and said:

“It’s a long story.”

She then proceeded, thus and so, to explain what had happened, saying, “I was tricked by Auntie Hsüeh, who sold me for twenty-five taels of silver, only to end up here:

Entertaining at parties and endeavoring to sing:

Engaging customers and catering to their wishes.”

Chang Sheng had noticed how attractive she was in the past and felt himself drawn to her, while Sun Hsüeh-o did her best to cater to him as she served the drinks, and the conversation between them started to warm up. Sun Hsüeh-o and Chin-erh then took up their balloon guitars and proceeded to sing a song for Chang Sheng as he drank his wine, to the tune “Four Pieces of Gold”:

In my last incarnation, I imagine,
I must have owed him a love debt due in this life;
For he has abandoned me along the way,
So that our lover’s knot cannot be tied.
To speak of it floods my cheeks with tears;
When depressed, my sorrow is as deep as the sea.
As for our myriad oaths of fidelity,
What has become of them now?
You wretched scoundrel!
How can you ignore the love I have lavished upon you all this time?²⁰

After the song was finished, the two of them, what with:

The raising of glasses and passing of cups,
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,

continued to drink until they began to feel the effects of the wine. As the saying goes:

Worldly wealth, painted faces, and wine
in the sing-song houses;
Who is there who is not deluded
by these three things?²¹

Chang Sheng became enamored of Sun Hsüeh-o, and the two of them spent the night together in a room at the tavern. Sun Hsüeh-o, employing her mastery of the arts of the bedchamber, and whispering oaths of fidelity into his ears, gave herself over to Chang Sheng.

They exhausted themselves to please each other,
Like fish sporting in the water,

in ways that:

Were too multifarious to describe in detail.

The next day, by the time they got out of bed and performed their ablutions, Liu the Second had already brought up a serving of wine and delicacies in order to provide his brother-in-law with a pick-me-up. After they had sated themselves on this repast, served in:

Large platters and large bowls,

Chang Sheng got together his luggage, fed his horse, packed up the shipment of distiller’s yeast, and prepared to depart, along with his attendants.

As he was about to go out the door, he gave Sun Hsüeh-o three taels of silver and said to Liu the Second, “See that you look after her well, and don’t let anyone take advantage of her.”

From this time on, whenever Chang Sheng came to the canal port of Lin-ch’ing on business, he would get together with Sun Hsüeh-o in My Own Tavern; and afterwards, as he traveled back and forth, he agreed to pay P’an the Fifth a few taels of silver every month, in order to maintain her as his mistress, and prevent her from taking on any other customers. Liu the Second, out of a desire to please his brother-in-law, did not even demand any rent for her and went so far as to fleece his other customers in order to pay for her keep, and provide Sun Hsüeh-o with fuel and rice. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Who could know at the time the way in which he would indulge his desires?
Given to lust, and relying on his influence,
his acts are unconscionable.
Calamity does not seek people, they court it themselves;
Beauty does not delude people, they delude themselves.

P'ING-AN ABSCONDS WITH JEWELRY FROM THE PAWNSHOP; AUNTIE HSÜEH CLEVERLY PROPOSES A PERSONAL APPEAL

Some words of admonition:

If you are fortunate, do not expect to enjoy it forever;
When your fortune runs out, you will be poverty-stricken.
If you have authority, do not expect it to last forever;
When your authority runs out, you will face your enemies.
One's good fortune should only be relied on providently;
One's authority should always be exercised deferentially.
In this human world of ours, authority and good fortune;
May seem to begin well enough, but often end in calamity.¹

THE STORY GOES that Sun Hsüeh-o was sold into the life of a singing girl working out of My Own Tavern. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.

To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ta-chieh committed suicide, and Wu Yüeh-niang took Ch'en Ching-chi to court for it, Lai-chao, the head servant in the household, also passed away, and his wife "The Beanpole" took her son Little Iron Rod and remarried someone else. Lai-hsing was then made responsible for the gate. The maidservant Hsiu-ch'un left the household after being turned over to Nun Wang to serve as a novice. Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu had also died, and he had been some time without a spouse. The wet nurse Ju-i was in the habit of taking the baby Hsi-men Hsiao-ko into his quarters to play, and to enjoy snacks there. Lai-hsing would also provide wine and drink with her. The two of them flirted with each other, back and forth, until they ended up consummating an affair. This happened on more than one occasion, and when Ju-i returned to the rear compound, her face would be red.

When Yüeh-niang became aware of what was going on, she gave her a dressing down; but on the grounds that:

Domestic scandals should not be noised abroad,²

she presented her with an outfit of clothing, four hairpins, a silver brooch in the shape of the character for long life, and an ornamental comb for her hair; selected an auspicious day for the occasion; and gave her to Lai-hsing as his wife. During the day, she continued to work in the kitchen, look after Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, and serve in the rear compound; while at night, she would go out to his quarters in the front compound and sleep with him.

One day, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, it was Yüeh-niang's birthday, and Sister-in-law Wu, along with Wu the Second's wife, and the three nuns, came to celebrate it with her and were served drinks in the parlor of the master suite. That evening, arrangements were made for them all to stay overnight in Meng Yü-lou's former quarters on the other side of the courtyard, so they could listen to the nuns recite a precious scroll for them.

During the second watch, the maidservant Chung-ch'iu, who had been assigned to look after their tea, was called for by Yüeh-niang but did not respond. When Yüeh-niang went into the master suite to look for her, what should she see but Tai-an, who was making out vigorously with Hsiao-yü on the edge of the k'ang. Upon seeing her push open the door and come in, they became so flustered they hardly knew what to do with themselves.

Yüeh-niang chose not to say a word about it, merely remarking, "You lousy little stinker! Why haven't you gone to the kitchen and taken care of the tea? The nuns in the other room over there have been reciting a precious scroll all day long and need some tea to drink. What are you doing in here?"

"Chung-ch'iu has been tending the stove," responded Hsiao-yü, "and I told her to prepare the tea."

With her head hanging sheepishly, she then proceeded to make her way outside, while Tai-an headed through the ceremonial gate to the front compound.

Two days later, after Sister-in-law Wu, Wu the Second's wife, and the three nuns had returned home, Yüeh-niang had Lai-hsing vacate his quarters and refurbished them for Tai-an to reside in, while moving Lai-hsing into what had been Lai-chao's quarters, so he could take charge of the front gate. She then had two sets of bedding made for Tai-an, along with an outfit of new clothing, a newly blocked hat with a new hairnet, and a new pair of boots and stockings. She also allowed Hsiao-yü to put up her hair and gave her a fret to wear over it, while providing her with several gold and silver hair ornaments, four silver hairpins with gold heads, bracelets, pendant earrings, finger rings, and the like, along with two outfits of varicolored silk and satin clothing. After choosing an auspicious day for the event, she then gave her to Tai-an as his wife. During the day, she continued to wait on Yüeh-niang in the rear compound, but when the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds was about to be locked for the night, she would go out to sleep with Tai-an. This maidservant constantly secreted goodies of every kind and took them out for Tai-an to eat. Yüeh-niang saw what she was doing but pretended not to notice. As the sayings go:

Those who dote on another do not see clearly;
Those who are covetous can never be satiated.³
When veal and wine are not doled out equally;

Tai-an Seduces Hsiao-yü and Is Allowed to Marry Her

Even the finest teams will split and scatter.⁴
If the household is not governed impartially;
The male and female servitors will resent it.

To resume our story, when P'ing-an saw that Yüeh-niang had favored Tai-an by giving him Hsiao-yü as a wife, providing him with quarters of his own to live in, and bestowing new clothing upon him, he resented the fact that, though at the age of twenty-one he was two years older than Tai-an, she had not seen fit to provide him with a wife, or with quarters of his own.

One day, in the pawnshop, he was present when Manager Fu Ming accepted a set of gold head ornaments and a gilded buckle from a customer, in return for a loan of thirty taels of silver, which he agreed to redeem, with the added interest, in a month. Manager Fu Ming, along with Tai-an, then proceeded to stow them away in the shop's large storage cabinet.

What they did not anticipate was that P'ing-an:

On seeing their value, developed ideas, and surreptitiously made off with them, along with the box they were in, and made his way to the brothel of Wu Ch'ang-chiao, or Longfoot Wu, in the Southern Entertainment Quarter, where he patronized the two unlicensed prostitutes that worked there, one of whom was named Hsüeh Ts'un-erh, and the other Pan-erh, and spent two nights with them. When the pimp of the establishment observed that he was spending money so recklessly, that his box contained gold head ornaments, and that he was flaunting silver ingots in order to buy wine, and gifts for the proprietress, he reported him to the local constable, who confined him to his room, boxed his ears twice, and took him into custody.

It was one of those occasions when:

Something was destined to happen.

Who could have anticipated that just at this juncture, Wu Tien-en, who had recently been appointed to the position of a suburban police chief, happened to be riding by in the street, preceded by a pair of runners bearing placards announcing his office. When he saw what was going on, he asked who the shackled culprit might be.

The constable knelt down before him and reported, thus and so, saying, "The person in question appears to have stolen some things and fled to the Southern Entertainment Quarter, where he has been patronizing prostitutes, and paying for them with gold and silver head ornaments. Having found this suspicious, your humble servant has put him under arrest."

"Bring him along with you so I can interrogate him," ordered Wu Tien-en.

P'ing-an was then taken to the police headquarters, where Wu Tien-en took his place on the bench, with armed lictors arrayed to either side, and the local constable dragged his tethered prisoner before him.

P'ing-an recognized Wu Tien-en and thought to himself, "Since he was formerly a manager in my master's household, he is sure to let me go."

The first thing he said was, "Your humble servant is P'ing-an from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household."

"Since you are a servant from his household," said Wu Tien-en, "what have you been up to in this brothel with these gold objects?"

"My mistress," said P'ing-an, "had lent these head ornaments to a relative to wear and sent me to bring them back to her. I was late in returning, and the city gates were closed when I got there, so I went to that brothel to seek a place to stay overnight. I could not have expected to be arrested by the local constable."

Wu Tien-en derided him, saying, "Slave that you are, you're talking nonsense. Your household is amply supplied with this sort of head ornaments, and other objects of gold and silver. What reason would they have for turning over head ornaments like these to a slave like you in order to spend in a brothel? I imagine you must have stolen these things. You had better explain yourself if you want to avoid punishment."

"It is a fact," responded P'ing-an, "that a relative of the family borrowed these head ornaments, and the First Lady sent me to bring them back. I would not dare to tell a lie."

Wu Tien-en was enraged at this and reviled him, saying, "This slave is really a thief. Without a beating, he will not confess."

He then shouted at his attendants, "Put the squeezers on this slave for me."

The squeezers were then fastened onto him, and when they were applied he:

Howled like a stuck pig, calling out, "Your Honor, stop applying the squeezers to me. If you only let me do so, I will tell you the truth."

"If you tell me the truth," responded Wu Tien-en, "I will stop squeezing you."

P'ing-an then testified, saying, "Your humble servant actually did steal a set of gold head ornaments that someone had left at the pawnshop, along with a gilded buckle."

"Why did you steal them?" asked Wu Tien-en.

"I am twenty-one years old this year," responded P'ing-an, "and the First Lady had promised to find a wife for me, but she has not done so. Meanwhile, she has given one of the maids from her own quarters as a wife to another household servant named Tai-an, who is only nineteen years old. It was because I was so upset over this that I stole these head ornaments from the pawnshop."

"I imagine," pronounced Wu Tien-en, "that this page boy Tai-an must have been engaging in hanky-panky with Mistress Wu, and it must be for that reason that she has given her maidservant to him as a wife. Tell me the truth about it. Since it has nothing to do with you, I will let you off."

"I don't know anything about that," responded P'ing-an.

"You are not telling the truth," pronounced Wu Tien-en. "Subject him to the squeezers once again."

The attendants put the squeezers back on, which threw P'ing-an into such consternation that he called out inarticulately, "Your Honor, don't subject me to the squeezers again. I'll tell you all about it."

"Here we go again," said Wu Tien-en. "Simply tell me about it then. I dare say it has nothing to do with you."

The squeezers were then released, and P'ing-an said, "It is true that the First Lady has been engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an. He started out by seducing her maidservant Hsiao-yü, but when the First Lady discovered it, she chose not to say a word about it but actually bestowed a lot of clothing and jewelry upon her and gave her to him as a wife."

When Wu Tien-en heard this, he had the docket officer take a record of his testimony and make up a formal deposition. He then incarcerated P'ing-an in the police office to await the issuing of arrest warrants for Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, and Hsiao-yü, so that he could hold a hearing on the case.

To resume our story, one day, when it was discovered that the head ornaments in question were missing from the cabinet in the pawnshop, Manager Fu Ming, in a state of fear and consternation, questioned Tai-an about it.

"I have been looking after the wholesale pharmaceutical shop," responded Tai-an, "while you have been earning your livelihood over there. I don't know anything about it."

"I put that box of head ornaments in the storage cabinet," said Manager Fu Ming. "How could they have disappeared this way?"

He then proceeded to look all over for P'ing-an but could find no trace of him. This disturbed Manager Fu Ming so much that he took to:

Burning incense and swearing oaths;

and when the owner sent a servant to redeem the head ornaments he had pawned, Manager Fu could only say that he hadn't been able to find them yet.

When the servant had returned several times without being able to retrieve the head ornaments, he stood outside the door of the shop and made a fuss, saying, "Those things were left with you two months ago, and my master is prepared to pay you back both the original sum for which they were pawned and the interest; so how can you refuse to turn over the head ornaments and buckle to me? They are worth seventy or eighty taels of silver."

When Manager Fu Ming learned that P'ing-an had not returned home that night, he realized that he must have stolen the missing objects and sent people out to look everywhere for him, but they were unable to find him.

When the servant of the owner returned once again and made a fuss outside the door, Manager Fu suggested to Yüeh-niang that they should give him fifty taels of silver to settle the matter, but he refused to accept the offer, saying, "Those head ornaments are worth sixty taels of silver and the buckle, along with the precious stones and pearls with which they are inlaid, are worth another ten taels. So you should pay seventy taels of silver as compensation."

Manager Fu Ming offered to pay him an additional ten taels of silver, but he refused to accept it and insisted on continuing to wrangle with him.

Just as they continued to argue about it, someone showed up and reported, saying, "The page boy P'ing-an from your household stole the head ornaments in question and went off to the Southern Entertainment Quarter where he has been patronizing prostitutes. He has been arrested by Police Chief Wu Tien-en, who is currently holding him in detention. You ought to send someone as quickly as possible to identify the stolen goods."

When Wu Yüeh-niang heard that Wu Tien-en was now serving as a police chief, she recalled that he had originally been employed as a manager by their household, and she invited her elder brother Wu K'ai to come and consult with her about it.

They forthwith wrote out a claim certificate and sent Manager Fu Ming off with it, the next day, to retrieve the missing goods, saying to him:

"If the original objects are only recovered,

There will be no reason for further dispute;

or for anyone to continue farting around this way in front of our door."

Manager Fu Ming took the document with him and set out for the police office, expecting that Wu Tien-en, out of consideration for the fact that they had formerly been colleagues, would allow him to retrieve the head ornaments. He could hardly have anticipated that Wu Tien-en would, on the contrary, revile him as an old dog, and an old slave, order the lictors to drag him down for a beating, and strip off his clothing, so that his bare buttocks were exposed for what seemed like half a day.

Only then did he allow him to get up, before saying to him, "The page boy from your household has testified that your mistress, née Wu, has been carrying on an illicit affair with Tai-an. I have already reported this to the prefectural and district authorities and am planning to issue a warrant summoning her here to respond to his testimony. And yet, old dog bone that you are, you have the nerve to come here and attempt to retrieve the stolen goods."

After being reviled as a slave and an old dog a thousand, if not ten thousand times, Manager Fu Ming hastened home in a state of consternation as fast as he could go. Upon arriving there, he did not dare to conceal the truth of the matter but told Yüeh-niang, thus and so, all about it.

If Yüeh-niang had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard this account, truly, it was just as though:

The eight-boned structure of her skull had been split asunder;

Only to have poured into it half a bucketful of icy snow.

She was so upset that her hands and feet became paralyzed, on top of which, she observed that a servant of the owner of the head ornaments had come back to the door, where he engaged her in:

saying, "Your household has lost track of the head ornaments and has not only failed to return the original objects but has also failed to pay anything in compensation, while tricking me into running back and forth time and again. One day you trick me into coming to pick up the objects, and another day you tell me to wait until you have recovered them. But truly, where do you expect to recover them from? How can you be so unreasonable?"

Manager Fu Ming did his best to placate him, saying, "If you will just have patience for a few days, we will recover the head ornaments for you. And if we fail to do so, we are willing to pay double their worth in compensation."

The servant said, "Wait until I report back to my master," and then went his way.

As for Yüeh-niang, she:

Felt worry piled upon worry, and
Her eyebrows remained contracted.

After sending a page boy to ask her elder brother Wu K'ai to come consult with her, she suggested to him that he should pull strings on her behalf by speaking to Wu Tien-en and persuading him to drop the case.

"I'm afraid he is unlikely to respond to any string pulling," responded Wu K'ai. "The only thing that may move him is a bribe."

"It is thanks to us that he obtained his official position in the first place," said Yüeh-niang. "We gave him a loan of a hundred taels of silver at the time, for which my husband would not even accept a promissory note; and now he is:

Requiting kindness with enmity."

"Sister," said Wu K'ai, "it is pointless to say that. From time immemorial, he is scarcely the only one to:

Forget favor and break faith."

"Brother," responded Yüeh-niang, "I can only rely on you to do your best to find a way of handling this. Give him several tens of taels if you must, in order to recover those head ornaments and return them to their owner: thus preventing any further wrangling over it."

She then proceeded to offer Wu K'ai a meal, before sending him on his way. When Yüeh-niang saw her elder brother to the gate, by fortunate coincidence, she caught sight of Auntie Hsüeh, who was carrying her box of trinkets and leading a young maidservant, as she passed by on the street.

Yüeh-niang called her to a halt and asked her, "Auntie Hsüeh, where are you headed? And why have you not come here to visit for so long?"

"Venerable Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "that's a fine way to talk. I've been extremely busy the last few days and have had too much to do. The young lady, formerly from our household, has sent jailers or servants to summon me several times, but I have been too busy to go."

"Just look at you, Auntie," said Yüeh-niang. "What nonsense you talk. Since when has she become a young lady?"

"Right now," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "she is no longer the young lady, but has been promoted to the status of principal wife."

"How has she become a principal wife?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"Venerable Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "I guess you don't know about it yet. It was just her good luck that after she bore him a son, his first wife died, and His Honor the commandant moved her into the master suite and made her his legally recognized principal wife, superior in status to his secondary lady, Sun Erh-niang. He has purchased two wet nurses and four maidservants to wait upon her, in addition to which she is served by two former singing girls whom he has deflowered. If she wishes to punish any of them, she subjects them to the rod, and His Honor does not dare to interfere, not wishing to do anything that might anger her. The other day, for some unknown reason, she had Sun Hsüeh-o given a beating, plucked her hair out, and called for me in the middle of the night to take her away, after selling her to me for no more than eight taels of silver. At present, Sun Erh-niang has only one maidservant, named Ho-hua, to wait upon her, while Ch'un-mei has four or five, in addition to the two wet nurses, and still objects that she has too few. Sun Erh-niang doesn't dare to complain about this but merely addresses her as, 'Mistress this' and 'Mistress that,' all day long in order to placate her; and the other day, she said to me, 'Auntie Hsüeh, try to find another young maidservant to wait on me. I regret to say that the one I have isn't able to do much of anything except tend the stove.' Things are complicated in those quarters of hers. Today, while I was still asleep early in the morning, she sent a jailer over twice to summon me to her place as quickly as possible. She wanted me to supply her with a pair of ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays and inscribed with images of auspicious clouds, and a silver pin for holding her chignon in place, in the shape of nine phoenixes holding strands of pearls in their beaks, and with pendants of green and red precious stones set in plaques of gold. She gave me the sum of five taels of silver for this purpose, but I have managed to misplace it somewhere and have not yet given her the pieces she ordered. When I go to see her, she is sure to give me a dressing down. Right now, I'm on the way to deliver this maidservant to Sun Erh-niang."

"Come back to the rear compound with me," said Yüeh-niang, "so I can have a look at that ornament with kingfisher feather inlays."

So saying, she escorted Auntie Hsüeh back to the parlor in the rear compound and offered her a seat. Auntie Hsüeh then opened her box of trinkets and showed the pieces in question to Yüeh-niang. They were, indeed, exquisitely crafted. The first item was about four fingers wide, which was enough to cover a fret, with its gold and turquoise hues setting each other off, its kingfisher feather inlays protruding, and its back plated with gold. The item with the nine phoenixes holding strands of pearls in their beaks, and its gem-studded pendant plaques, was exceptionally well fashioned.

Auntie Hsüeh said, "This ornamental piece cost three taels and five mace of silver to make, while the other piece, inscribed with auspicious clouds, cost only one tael and five mace of silver, but I still haven't located the money she gave me."

As they were speaking, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came in and said to Yüeh-niang, "The man who is trying to retrieve those pawned head ornaments has come back again and is out front making a fuss about it. He says that the owner cannot wait any longer to get them, and that if they are still not forthcoming tomorrow, he will hold Manager Fu Ming accountable and will take him off somewhere to settle the matter. Uncle Fu the Second is so upset at the prospect that he has gone home, and the servant of the owner has also departed after delivering his threats."

"What is that all about?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.

Yüeh-niang gave a long sigh and then told Auntie Hsüeh, thus and so, "That slave of ours, P'ing-an, absconded with a set of gold head ornaments and a gilded buckle that someone had deposited in our pawnshop and fled to a brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter outside the city where he patronized a pair of prostitutes. He has been arrested by the police chief Wu Tien-en and is being held in the lockup there. The owner has sent someone to redeem the pawned head ornaments, but they are unavailable, so he has been making a fuss in front of the gate. The police chief Wu Tien-en is malevolently trying to shake us down by not letting us retrieve the stolen objects, and threatening our manager with a beating, with an eye to extorting money from us. I have been unable to come up with a solution to the problem. Ever since my husband died:

Misfortunes and losses have befallen me, and I have been taken advantage of by others. It is really hard to take."

As she spoke, tears fell profusely from her eyes.

"My Good Lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "There is a road open to you if you do not refuse to take it. If you will write a note to our young lady, I will also explain the situation to her, and she will get His Honor the commandant to issue an order to the police department, which should enable you to retrieve not just one set of head ornaments, but as many as ten, if need be."

"Commandant Chou Hsiu is a military officer," said Yüeh-niang. "I doubt if he has jurisdiction over the police department."

"Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "You may not know it yet, but the Emperor has recently issued an edict conferring a wide range of powers on Commandant Chou. He has the right to call the roll and issue commands to the personnel in charge of the local area, the rivers and canals, the troops and horses, and the stocks of money and grain throughout his jurisdiction. Moreover, the apprehension of bandits and felons both east and west of the Grand Canal is in his hands."

When Yüeh-niang heard this, she said, "If he does actually possess these powers, Auntie Hsüeh, I will indeed trouble you to convey my regards to Sister P'ang Ch'un-mei. Tell her that:

One guest does not trouble two hosts, and ask her to put in a word on my behalf with His Honor Chou Hsiu, requesting that he try to retrieve this set of head ornaments from the police department for me. If you will do so, I will reward you with five taels of silver."

"My good Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "it is not money that motivates me. When I saw how distressed you were just now, I could hardly bear it. Get someone to write out a note for you. I don't need any tea but will go straight to the commandant's household and speak to the young lady about it. If I am successful, you can give me whatever you want. Even if I am unsuccessful, I will come back and report to you."

Yüeh-niang then told Hsiao-yü to provide a serving of tea for Auntie Hsüeh.

"It's getting late," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I don't need any tea. Just get one of your senior servants to write out a note for you, and I'll take it with me. You don't know how busy I am."

"I understand," said Yüeh-niang. "You've been out and about for half a day already. Have a pastry before you go."

Hsiao-yü then proceeded to set up a table, and lay out a serving of tea and pastries. Yüeh-niang kept her company as she drank her tea, and Auntie Hsüeh gave two pastries to the young maidservant she had with her.

"How old is this maidservant?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"She is just eleven this year," replied Auntie Hsüeh.

It was not long before Tai-an, in the front compound, finished writing the note; and Auntie Hsüeh, having finished her tea, tucked it into her sleeve, said good-bye to Yüeh-niang, and went out with her box of trinkets. After exiting the gate, and:

Rounding bends and turning corners,
she made her way straight to the commandant's residence.

Ch'un-mei was still lying on a heated k'ang, not having risen yet, when whom should she see but her senior maidservant Yüeh-kuei, who came in and announced, "Auntie Hsüeh has come to see you."

Ch'un-mei then told her junior maidservant Ts'ui-hua to open the casements, so that the sunshine brightly illuminated the gauze covered windows.

Upon coming inside, Auntie Hsüeh remarked, "Young Lady, I see that you haven't gotten up yet."

She then put down her box of trinkets, got down on her knees, and kowtowed to her.

"There's no need for any of that," said Ch'un-mei. "What are you kowtowing to me for?"

She then explained, "I've been feeling out of sorts and have gotten up later than usual today," and she went on to ask, "Have you brought those ornaments with inscribed auspicious clouds and nine phoenixes that you have had made for me, or not?"

"My Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "those two ornaments took quite a lot of trouble to make. It was only last night that I was able to pick them up from the jeweler's shop. I was planning to deliver them to you today but did not expect you to send a jailer after them."

She then took them out and handed them to Ch'un-mei to look over. Ch'un-mei felt that the ornament with the kingfisher feather inlays and inscribed auspicious clouds was not as striking as she would have liked but put them back in their cardboard box and handed them to Yüeh-kuei to put away.

She then ordered a serving of tea for Auntie Hsüeh to drink. Auntie Hsüeh then called in the young maidservant she had brought with her and told her to kowtow to the lady.

"Where is she from?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"The Second Lady has spoken to me several times," explained Auntie Hsüeh, "telling me that Ho-hua is only able to cook, and asking me to find another young girl for her, whom she can teach to do needlework. That is why I have brought this youngster with me. She is the daughter of a country family and is only eleven years old this year. As trainable material, with the proper discipline it should be possible to teach her to do whatever is needed."

"If you had found her a girl from the city," remarked Ch'un-mei, "she might have turned out to be cleverer. What do these country girls know? Just the other day, a certain Old Mother Chang tried to sell me two young maidservants from the countryside. One of them was a ten-year-old, and the other eleven; and their names were Sheng-chin and Huo-pao; but neither of them turned out to be any good. Their parents wanted five taels of silver for each of them and were waiting outside to collect the money. I told the go-between to tell their parents to let them stay overnight, so I could test them out, and see how they responded; and have them come back the next day to collect their silver. I insisted on keeping them overnight, and my maidservants, just as though they: gave them some pork-ball soup and rice gruel to eat. Early the next morning, my maidservants started to kick up a fuss, and I scolded them, saying, 'What are you making such a fuss about?' It turned out that Sheng-chin had befouled her bedding with shit, and that Huo-pao had pissed in her pants till they were so stiff with dried urine that they could hardly be removed. It made me want to laugh on the one hand but also gave me the creeps; and when Old Mother Chang came back, I had her take them away."

Didn't know any better,

She then went on to inquire, "How much are you asking for this maidservant of yours?"

"Not much at all," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "Merely four taels of silver. Her father is planning to enlist in the army."

Ch'un-mei then said to Hai-t'ang, "Take her over to the Second Lady's room. We'll arrange to pay for her tomorrow."

She also said to Yüeh-kuei, "Bring that large flagon of Chin-hua wine, and pour some of it for Auntie Hsüeh in order to fend off the cold. And bring in a box of whatever pastries are available for her to eat. At this early hour in the morning it would never do to douse her with wine on an empty stomach."

"Sister Yüeh-kuei," said Auntie Hsüeh, "don't pour any wine for me until I've finished talking to your mistress. I've already had something to drink elsewhere."

"Tell me," said Ch'un-mei, "where have you been drinking?"

"Just now," said Auntie Hsüeh, "the First Lady detained me at her place and gave me something to eat and drink. She wept as she told me, thus and so, how the page boy P'ing-an has stolen a set of gold head ornaments that someone had left in the pawnshop, along with a gilded buckle, and run off to amuse himself by sleeping with prostitutes; only to end up being arrested by the local constable, taken to the police station, and forced to endure a beating in the squeezers. The original owner sent someone to retrieve the stolen objects and kicked up a fuss when he was unable to do so. She then sent Manager Fu Ming to try to recover the missing objects from the police station. The police chief, Wu Tien-en, formerly served as a manager in their household, and when her husband was still alive, he enabled him to gain his official position; but now he has turned against them ungratefully and subjected her page boy to the squeezers, in the hope of getting him to implicate her in some sort of misconduct. He not only refused to relinquish the stolen objects without being paid for them but also threatened Manager Fu Ming with a beating, which frightened him so that he is hiding out in his home. She asked me to come convey her respects to you. She doesn't know whether His Honor has any jurisdiction over the police station in question but hopes that you will take pity on her, since she is now all alone in the world, and ask His Honor if he can do anything about it. If he succeeds in recovering the stolen objects so she can return them to their original owner, the First Lady will come in person to express her thanks to you."

"Do you have a note explaining the situation with you?" asked Ch'un-mei. "It doesn't matter though; His Honor is out on duty right now, but when he comes home tonight, never fear, I will speak to him about it."

"I do have an explanatory note from her," said Auntie Hsüeh, as she pulled it out of her sleeve.

When Ch'un-mei had finished reading it, she casually placed it on the windowsill.

Before long, Yüeh-kuei brought in a tray with four dishes of delicacies, and, taking up a large silver goblet, proceeded to fill it to overflowing with wine, and present it to Auntie Hsüeh.

"I can't handle a thing as large as that," said Auntie Hsüeh.

"It's not as large as that thing of your husband's," Ch'un-mei said with a laugh. "Since you're able to handle that all right, why can't you handle this? No matter what, I want you to handle it for me. If you refuse, I'll tell Yüeh-kuei to hold your nose and pour it down your throat for me."

"You'd better let me have some pastries first," said Auntie Hsüeh, "in order to provide a lining for my stomach."

"Old Mother," responded Ch'un-mei, "all you do is tell lies. You just told me that you had been given something to eat where you came from, and now you claim that you need to line your stomach."

"The two pastries I had there," said Auntie Hsüeh, "were not enough to last until now."

"Auntie Hsüeh," said Yüeh-kuei, "if you will drink this large goblet of wine, I will give you some pastries to eat. Otherwise, my mistress will say I am of no use and is likely to give me a beating."

Auntie Hsüeh had no recourse but to let her pour the entire goblet of wine down her throat, which gave her the sensation that:

Her heart was hopping like a little fawn.

Ch'un-mei pursed her lips and told Hai-t'ang to pour out another goblet of wine and give it to her to drink.

Auntie Hsüeh pushed it aside and said, "My Good Lady, I can't drink another drop."

Hai-t'ang then addressed her, saying, "You managed to drink what Yüeh-kuei offered you. If you don't drink what I offer you, the mistress will beat me instead."

This threw Auntie Hsüeh into such a state of consternation that she got down on her knees, so her torso looked as though it were sticking straight out of the ground like a post.

"That will do," said Ch'un-mei. "Bring a pastry over for her to eat, so she can manage to get down the rest of the wine."

Yüeh-kuei did as directed, saying, "Auntie Hsüeh, no one is more considerate of you than I am. I have saved these corn flour pastries with rose-flavored stuffings for you to eat."

She then presented her with a large plateful of stuffed rose-flavored cream puff pastries.

Auntie Hsüeh ate only one of them, after which Ch'un-mei said to her, "You can tuck the rest into your sleeve and feed them to that cuckold of yours when you get home."

Auntie Hsüeh then drank the wine and endeavored to hide her embarrassment as she took the servings of smoked pork and salt-cured goose from the platter, wrapped them up, first in absorbent grass paper and then in cloth, and stuffed the package into her sleeve. Hai-t'ang obstinately insisted on getting her to drink another half goblet of wine. Only upon seeing that she was about to throw up did she desist and clear away the utensils.

Ch'un-mei then said to Auntie Hsüeh, "Come back to check on things tomorrow, and we will weigh out the silver for the young maidservant you brought with you."

She also sent Hai-t'ang to ask for Sun Erh-niang's opinion of her, and, upon returning, she reported, "She said she would like to keep the maidservant and requested that you would pay the asking price for her."

As Auntie Hsüeh was about to say farewell and go out the door, Ch'un-mei said to her, "Auntie, you must not persist in:

Pretending to be both deaf and dumb.

That pair of ornaments inscribed with auspicious clouds that you brought me is not well enough made. You should bring me a set of better ones to look at another day."

"I understand," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "My Lady, would you please have one of your maidservants accompany me, lest the dog should bite my leg."

Ch'un-mei laughed at this, saying, "Our dog knows what he is doing. He stops biting when he reaches the bone."

She then sent Lan-hua to escort Auntie Hsüeh as far as the postern gate.

To make a long story short, at sunset that day, Commandant Chou Hsiu came back from his round of inspection, accompanied by a squad of cavalry with their identifying insignia, carrying blue command standards, and followed by another contingent holding long spears with decorated handles. When he entered the rear hall, the attending maidservants took his official cap and outer garments, after which he went into the master suite to see Ch'un-mei and his young son and was:

Delighted in his heart,

as he sat down to join them. Yüeh-kuei and Hai-t'ang brought him a serving of tea, after which he recounted the events of his tour of inspection that day. Before long, a table was set up, and a meal was served; after which, the candles were lighted, goblets were brought out, and they proceeded to have a drink together.

Upon his asking if anything had happened that day, Ch'un-mei fetched the note and gave it to the commandant to read, saying, "It seems that over at Wu Yüeh-niang's place, thus and so, the page boy P'ing-an stole some head ornaments and has been arrested and incarcerated by the police chief Wu Tien-en, who has not allowed her to reclaim the stolen objects, and beaten the page boy in order to induce him to falsely accuse Yüeh-niang of engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an. In the hope of extorting money from her, he is threatening to forward the case to the prefectural and district authorities."

When the commandant had finished reading the note, he said, "This case falls within the jurisdiction of my office. How can he propose to forward it to the prefectural or district authorities? This rascal, Police Chief Wu Tien-en, is acting outrageously? I will issue a summons for him tomorrow and deal with him myself."

He then went on to say, "I have heard that this police chief Wu Tien-en used to work as a manager in their household. It was only because he was sent by his employer to deliver some gifts to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital that he was able to obtain this office. How can he do such an about-face and bring a false accusation against his former benefactors?"

"It is just as you say," remarked Ch'un-mei. "See what you can do to take care of the matter on her behalf tomorrow."

Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

The next day, he sent a message to Wu Yüeh-niang telling her to draft a written deposition on the matter and have it delivered to him. He then made out a certified document in the courtroom, written on stationery with decorative borders, and placed it in an envelope. The document read: "The Office of the Regional Military Command of Shantung, with regard to a case of larceny, requests the appearance of the relevant police chief and the culprit before his court. Delivered by the inspectors Chang Sheng and Li An. The above request is mandatory."

Wu Tien-en Acts Treacherously and Suffers Disgrace

The two of them, thereupon, took the document with them and proceeded to go first to Wu Yüeh-niang's residence. Yüeh-niang treated them to wine and food and gave each of them a tael of silver as a reward for their efforts. Since Manager Fu Ming was still confined to his bed at home, Yüeh-niang's brother, Wu the Second, agreed to accompany them to the police station.

Police Chief Wu Tien-en, on seeing that P'ing-an had been incarcerated for two days without anyone from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household offering to grease his palm about the situation, was in the very act of ordering a clerk to draft a document forwarding the case to the prefectural and district authorities, when the two emissaries from the office of the Regional Military Command showed up and delivered the certified document to him. When he saw that the inscription in red ink on the envelope indicated that both he and the culprit were ordered to appear before the commandant, and opened and read the enclosed deposition by Wu Yüeh-niang, he was thrown into a state of panic. Doing his best to placate Li An and Chang Sheng, he gave them each a tip of two taels of silver, wrote up a document about the case, and then took the accused with him as he made his way to the office of the Regional Military Command. Upon arriving there, he had to wait for what seemed like half a day before the commandant took his place on the bench, with soldiers and jailers lined up to either side, and ordered them to be brought before him.

Police Chief Wu Tien-en handed up the document he had drafted, and after the commandant had read it, he said, "This case is one that falls under the jurisdiction of this office. Why have you not forwarded it to me for a decision, but chosen to procrastinate this way, no doubt in the hope of obtaining a bribe? It is clear that you are guilty of malfeasance."

Police Chief Wu Tien-en pleaded, "Your humble servant was just in the process of drafting a document to forward to Your Honor when your summons unexpectedly arrived."

"You dog of an official!" the commandant cried at him. "This conduct of yours is detestable. How high an official are you to try to manipulate the law this way, in defiance of your superiors? I have been commissioned by the Emperor himself to protect this territory, apprehend thieves and bandits, command the military forces, and oversee the canals and waterways. My jurisdiction over these matters is clearly established. How can you feel entitled to arrest a suspect without reporting it to higher authorities, and have the culprit tortured and beaten in the endeavor to get him to falsely implicate innocent parties? It is obvious that you are guilty of malfeasance."

When Police Chief Wu Tien-en heard this accusation, he tore off his official cap and proceeded to kowtow before him at the foot of the steps.

"I really ought to prosecute you, you dog of an official," said the commandant, "but I will let you off this once. If you commit the same offense in the future, however, I will see to it that you are indicted and arraigned."

He then had P'ing-an brought before him and said, "You slave, you are not only guilty of stealing objects but have also given false evidence implicating your employer. If every slave were like you, people would not dare to employ servants."

Turning to his attendants, he said, "Give him thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo; and seal up the stolen objects so that their original owner can send someone to repossess them."

He then called Wu the Second before him and gave him a receipt entitling him to take custody of the objects in question, and gave a card to Chang Sheng to take back to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, indicating that he had performed the favor that had been asked of him. Wu Yüeh-niang gave Chang Sheng some wine and something to eat and rewarded him with a tael of silver, after which he went back to report to Commandant Chou Hsiu and Ch'un-mei.

Police Chief Wu Tien-en not only had arrested P'ing-an in vain but had lost quite a few taels of silver for his pains. Wu Yüeh-niang saw to it that the head ornaments and the buckle were returned to their owner, who recognized them as his original objects and took them away without saying a word. When Manager Fu Ming had arrived home, he came down with an acute intestinal fever and was bedridden for seven days when, because it was not properly treated:

Alas and alack,

he died. When Yüeh-niang realized how much trouble it had caused her, she directed that the pawnshop should accept the repayment and redemption of property that had already been pawned but should not pay out anything in return for pawned objects in the future. She merely had Wu the Second and Tai-an continue to operate the wholesale pharmaceutical shop at the front of their property and employed whatever proceeds were made from day to day to cover her household expenses. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

One day, Wu Yüeh-niang summoned Auntie Hsüeh and offered her three taels of silver as a reward for her successful intervention.

"I don't want it," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "I fear that if word of it gets to the commandant's household, the young mistress will think ill of me."

"I am much indebted to you," responded Yüeh-niang, "but:

Heaven would hardly condone letting you go unrewarded for your pains.

I will not mention it to her the next time I see her, that's all."

Thereupon, she bought four platters of delicacies, along with a freshly slaughtered pig, a jug of southern wine, and a bolt of satin fabric, and entrusted them to Auntie Hsüeh to deliver to the commandant's household as an expression of her thanks to Ch'un-mei. Tai-an donned a black silk jacket, put the card with the list of gifts into a gilt lacquer box, and accompanied her on her way to see Ch'un-mei. Upon arriving there, Auntie Hsüeh led him into the rear hall where Ch'un-mei came out, wearing a gilt-ridged cap, gold hairpins and combs, and the ornament with its nine phoenixes on her head, an embroidered jacket on her torso, and a brocade skirt, and accompanied on either side by the maidservants and wet nurses in her service. Tai-an promptly proceeded to kneel down on the floor and kowtow to her.

Ch'un-mei ordered a table to be set up and provided with tea and delicacies for Tai-an and then said to him, "What I did didn't amount to anything. Your mistress ought not to have done all this on my behalf. What need was there for her to take the trouble to send all these gifts to me? I am sure that my husband Commandant Chou will also refuse to accept them."

"My mistress says," responded Tai-an, "that the settlement of that problem caused by P'ing-an the other day was entirely owing to the efforts expended on her behalf by His Honor and Your Ladyship. This doesn't amount to anything. These:

Paltry and insignificant gifts, are proffered to the two of you to dispense as you see fit."

"I do not feel right about accepting them," said Ch'un-mei.

"Venerable Lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "if you refuse to accept them, the sender will hold it against me."

Ch'un-mei then invited the commandant to come in and consult with her, after which, they agreed to accept the pig, the wine, and the delicacies, but to return the bolt of fabric. They then gave Tai-an a handkerchief and three mace of silver for his pains and also rewarded the bearer who had carried the gift box with two mace of silver.

Ch'un-mei then asked him, "How is your mistress's infant son doing?"

"The little boy is a very playful sort," responded Tai-an.

She then went on to ask, "Tai-an, when did you put up your hair and start wearing a hair net; and when did you and Hsiao-yü get married?"

"It was during the eighth month," replied Tai-an.

"When you get home," said Ch'un-mei, "be sure to convey my greetings to your mistress, and tell her how grateful I am for her generous gifts. I would like to invite her to come by for a visit, but the commandant is going to leave on another tour of inspection sometime soon. Next year, during the first month, on her son's birthday, I intend to come pay her a visit."

"If you plan to do so," said Tai-an, "I will not only tell my mistress about it when I get home but also offer to come escort you there when the day arrives."

When they had finished speaking, Tai-an prepared to leave, and Auntie Hsüeh said to him, "You go ahead. The mistress wishes to say something else to me."

Tai-an thereupon escorted the bearer of the gift box on the way home and, on seeing Yüeh-niang, told her, thus and so, "The commandant accepted only the pig, the wine, and the delicacies but has returned the bolt of fabric. Ch'un-mei invited me back to the rear compound, gave me a serving of tea and something to eat, asked how Hsiao-ko was doing, and how things were going in the household, rewarded me with a handkerchief and three mace of silver, and the carrier of the gift box with two mace of silver, and asked me to convey her greetings to you, and thank you for your generous gifts. Initially, she refused to accept any of the gifts, but Auntie Hsüeh and I finally persuaded her to accept the delicacies, the pig, and the wine, although she insisted on my bringing back the bolt of fabric. She would have invited you to come by for a visit, but the commandant is due to set out on another tour of inspection in a few days. Next year, during the first month, on Hsiao-ko's birthday, she plans to come here for a visit."

He then went on to explain, "She occupies the master suite of five rooms; was wearing a brocade skirt, an embroidered jacket, and a gilt-ridged cap; looks plumper than she used to; and is waited on by a considerable number of maidservants and wet nurses."

"Did she really say that she is planning to come visit us next year?" asked Yüeh-niang.

"She really did say just that," responded Tai-an.

"When the day comes," said Yüeh-niang, "we will have to send someone to escort her here."

She then went on to ask, "Why has Auntie Hsüeh not appeared?"

"When I prepared to leave," said Tai-an, "she was still seated there engaged in conversation and told me to go on without her."

From this time forth, the two households resumed their social relations without interruption. Truly:

The way of the world responds to cold and warmth;

Human prestige is thereby enhanced or diminished.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Success and failure, flourishing and decay,
are controlled by fate;
Everything is determined by the year, month,
day, and hour of birth.
Those who harbor ambition in their breasts may achieve their goals;
But those whose purses are devoid of money cannot depend on talent.⁵

CH'UN-MEI ENJOYS VISITING THE POOLS AND PAVILIONS OF HER OLD HOME; COMMANDANT CHOU HSIU SENDS CHANG SHENG TO LOOK FOR CH'EN CHING-CHI

Households that are solid without but hollow within must cover their deficiencies;
In entertaining guests and responding to associates their expenditures are great.
When one's horses have died and one's servants fled it is hard to host a banquet;
When towers are foundering and buildings collapsing pipes and voices are silenced.
One's leased farmland and rented commercial outlets must revert to their owners;
One's collections of antiques, or gold and jewelry,
are given to female peddlers.
If one wishes to borrow something temporarily from some well-to-do household;
How can one ever hope to open one's mouth without suffering embarrassment?

THE STORY GOES that:

Light and darkness alternate swiftly;

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles, and, before long, it was the twenty-first day of the first month of the following year. Ch'un-mei, after consulting with Commandant Chou Hsiu, prepared a sacrificial table, replete with four kinds of preserved fruit, and a jug of southern wine, and sent their servant Chou Jen to deliver it to Wu Yüeh-niang. In the first place, it was the third anniversary of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; and in the second place, it was Hsiao-ko's birthday. Yüeh-niang accepted the gifts and rewarded Chou Jen with a handkerchief and three mace of silver; after which, she hastened to arrange for Tai-an to don his black livery and deliver an invitation to Ch'un-mei to come pay her a visit. The invitation read as follows:

Deeply moved by your bountiful gifts, our humble household has hastily prepared a meager potation as a deferential compensation for your generous largess. It is our ardent wish that you will deign to mount your elegant equipage and condescend to pay us a visit. Our gratitude for your favor will know no bounds.
Respectfully indited by the lady, née Wu, of the Hsi-men household and addressed to the dressing table of the virtuous and venerable consort of His Honor Chou Hsiu.

When Ch'un-mei had read the invitation, she waited until noon before setting out. When she did so:

Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, including gold phoenixes, hairpins and combs, and pearl earrings; her torso was clad in a full-sleeved scarlet robe, decorated with a motif of the four animals representing the cardinal directions paying homage to the ch'i-lin, over a skirt of kingfisher-blue variegated brocade, from which suspended jade pendants tinkled, and which was secured with a gold girdle; while on her feet she wore shoes of scarlet embroidery with high white satin heels. She rode in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers and invested with a black satin gold lamé canopy, escorted by soldiers holding rattan rods who shouted to clear the way, accompanied by servants and attendants carrying her dressing case, and closely followed by two smaller sedan chairs for her maidservants.

Wu Yüeh-niang had invited Sister-in-law Wu to join her and had also engaged the services of two singing girls to play their instruments and sing for the entertainment of her guest. Upon hearing that Ch'un-mei had arrived, Yüeh-niang, likewise, dressed herself elaborately in mourning garments in order to receive her. She wore a five-ridged cap with a number of gold and turquoise head ornaments on her head, two pearl earrings dangled beside her ears, and the two sides of her collar were clasped together with a gold chatelaine. On her torso she wore a white satin jacket, over a long trailing skirt of kingfisher-blue satin brocade; and on her feet she wore a pair of jade-colored satin high-heeled shoes. With Sister-in-law Wu, she then went out to the reception hall in the front compound to receive her guest.

Ch'un-mei's large sedan chair was carried all the way to the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds before she alighted from it and proceeded to the reception hall to proffer her greetings, with her servants accompanying her on either side. Upon arriving there, she kowtowed to Yüeh-niang:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.

Yüeh-niang promptly kowtowed in return, saying hastily, "The other day I put you to a great deal of trouble on my behalf, and yet you would not even accept the bolt of course fabric I offered you.

And now, deeply moved by your bountiful gift of a sacrificial table:

I will never be able to thank you enough."

"You embarrass me," protested Ch'un-mei. "My husband has nothing better than these paltry gifts to offer.

They are no more than tokens of our esteem.

I have wanted since some time ago to invite you over for a visit, but my husband was about to leave on a tour of inspection, so I failed to do so."

"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "when is your birthday? When the day comes, I would like to buy some presents and come to see you."

"My birthday is on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month," responded Ch'un-mei.

"I will be sure to come visit you that day," said Yüeh-niang.

When the two of them had finished with these amenities, and Ch'un-mei had accepted two obeisances from her, she insisted that Yüeh-niang should stand up; after which she proceeded to kowtow to Sister-in-law Wu, who likewise returned the courtesy.

"Sister-in-law Wu," objected Ch'un-mei, "you ought not to do that," and she helped her up with one hand so she could accept her obeisance.

"Sister," responded Sister-in-law Wu:

"The present cannot be compared to the past.

You embarrass this old body to death."

After accepting only half an obeisance from Ch'un-mei, she conducted her to the seat of honor. Yüeh-niang and her sister-in-law then sat down to keep her company in their positions as hosts. The servants' wives, the maidservants, and the wet nurse then came in to pay their respects to their visitor, and Ch'un-mei observed that the wet nurse Ju-i was carrying Hsiao-ko in her arms.

"Little Brother," said Yüeh-niang, "won't you come and kowtow to Sister Ch'un-mei, in order to thank her for coming to celebrate your birthday today?"

Hsiao-ko actually climbed off Ju-i's lap and went over to bow to Ch'un-mei.

"A fine little rascal you are," remarked Yüeh-niang, "refusing to kowtow to our sister, but merely offering her a bow."

Ch'un-mei responded by hurriedly pulling out of her sleeve a brocade handkerchief, as well as a gold brooch decorated with the eight auspicious symbols, which she had them attach to his cap.

"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "I have put you to even further trouble," and she bowed to her in gratitude.

After this, Hsiao-yü and the wet nurse Ju-i came forward and kowtowed to her. Ch'un-mei responded by giving Hsiao-yü a gold-headed hairpin, and Ju-i a pair of silver flower ornaments.

"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "you may not know it yet, but I have given our wet nurse to Lai-hsing as his wife. Lai-hsing's former wife Hui-hsiu became ill and died."

"She has always hoped with all her heart to remain in this household," remarked Ch'un-mei, "so that is appropriate."

A maidservant then brought in a serving of tea, and after they had consumed it, Yüeh-niang said, "Sister, please come back and sit in my parlor in the rear compound. It is cold in this reception hall."

When Ch'un-mei arrived in the rear compound, the first thing she saw was Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, before which lamps and candles had been lit, and the sacrificial table had been set up. Ch'un-mei burned some paper money before it and shed a few tears; after which, standing screens were placed around the company, the charcoal in the brazier was ignited, an Eight Immortals table was set up, and the tea service was laid out. This consisted of deftly prepared steamed shortcake, rare sweets, mouth-watering delicacies, and exotic fruits, in saucers with incised gold ornamentation, with ivory chopsticks, and high-grade tender leaf tea, served in snow-white cups. Yüeh-niang and Sister-in-law Wu kept Ch'un-mei company as she enjoyed her tea, after which, they led her into the interior of the master suite to change her clothes. When she had taken off her outer gown, the servants' wives who had accompanied her opened the dressing case she had brought with her, and she changed into a green jacket of patterned brocade, over a skirt of lilac-colored brocade, before sitting down with her hosts in Yüeh-niang's room, and chatting for a while.

"How is your young son doing?" asked Yüeh-niang. "Why didn't you bring him with you today?"

"I would have brought him with me," responded Ch'un-mei, "so he could kowtow to you; but his father pointed out that the weather is frigid and was afraid that he might catch a cold. He doesn't want to stay in his quarters but likes to have the servant on duty take him out to the courtroom, or carry him outside. The last few days he has been crying a great deal, but I don't know why."

"Doesn't he miss you when you are away?" inquired Yüeh-niang.

"Whatever happens," said Ch'un-mei, "he has two wet nurses who take turns looking after him."

"His Honor Chou Hsiu is well along in years," said Yüeh-niang, "and must be very pleased that you have borne him this little son. It is also your good fortune as a woman. I have heard that his secondary consort Sun Erh-niang has also borne him a daughter. How old is she now?"

"That child of Sun Erh-niang's is called Yü-chieh," responded Ch'un-mei, "and she will be four years old on her next birthday. This child of mine is called Chin-ko."

"I have heard," said Yüeh-niang, "that His Honor also has two other concubines at his disposal."

"Those two are really only maidservants who are learning to sing," said Ch'un-mei. "They are merely fifteen or sixteen years old and are constantly up to mischief."

"Does His Honor bother to sleep with them very often?" asked Yüeh-niang. "My Lady," said Ch'un-mei, "he hardly has the time to do so. He is:

Usually abroad, and Seldom at home.

At the present time, all over the realm, there have been:

Outbreaks of thieves and bandits;¹

and he has been ordered by imperial edict to be responsible for many things, including the protection of the territory within his jurisdiction, the policing of the canals and waterways, the arrest of thieves and bandits, and the training of infantry and cavalry. Consequently, he is constantly going out on tours of inspection and is utterly exhausted."

When they had finished speaking, Hsiao-yü brought in a serving of tea for them to drink.

Ch'un-mei then said to Yüeh-niang, "My Lady, would you please take me for a tour of my former mistress's quarters in the garden, beneath the artificial hill."

"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "the artificial hill and the garden are no longer the artificial hill and the garden that they used to be. Ever since my husband passed away, there has been no one to look after them, and they have been allowed to fall into a state of dilapidation. The stone markers have fallen over and the trees have died. Without a reason for doing so, I don't go there anymore."

"It doesn't matter," said Ch'un-mei. "I'd just like to go and take a look at my former mistress's quarters."

Yüeh-niang was unable to dissuade her and felt compelled to send Hsiao-yü to go fetch the keys to the garden gate and the gate of the grotto underneath the artificial hill. When the gates had been opened, she and Sister-in-law Wu accompanied Ch'un-mei for a tour of the garden, where they lingered for what seemed like half a day. Behold:

The encircling walls were tumbling down;
The terraces and kiosks were collapsing.
The painted walls to either side were covered with green moss;
The floriate tiles on the ground were hidden by verdant grass.
The rock formations before the hill,
Had been so damaged that they no longer looked impressive;
The summer bedsteads in the pavilions,
Had been leaked on until their frames had become wobbly.
The door of the rock grotto was covered with cobwebs;
The water in the fishponds was swarming with frogs.
Foxes frequently elected to sleep in the Cloud Repose Pavilion;
Squirrels scampered back and forth in the Hidden Spring Grotto.

Ch'un-mei Visits the Garden of Her Former Home

One suspected that for years it had not been visited by humans;
 But it was obvious that all day long it was frequented by clouds.²

After looking around for a while, Ch'un-mei made her way into the former quarters of Li P'ing-erh, where she saw that the second floor was littered with broken-down furniture, the rooms on the ground floor were locked, and the ground in the yard was covered with a tangle of uncultivated grass. Only then did she venture into her former mistress P'an Chin-lien's quarters, where she found that the second floor was still stocked with pharmaceuticals and incense, while the ground floor had only two clothes cabinets and did not even have a bed.

She then asked Hsiao-yü, "What has become of that bed of my mistress's? Why do I not see it?"

"When the Third Lady remarried," said Hsiao-yü, "she took it with her."

Yüeh-niang then came forward to explain the situation, saying, "When Father was still alive, he took that bed with retractable steps that the Third Lady had brought with her as part of her dowry and gave it to Hsi-men Ta-chieh when she married into the Ch'en family. Later, when the Third Lady remarried, I let her have your mistress's bed to take with her."

"I have heard," said Ch'un-mei, "that when you learned of Hsi-men Ta-chieh's death, you had that bed brought back to your place."

"As for that bed," said Yüeh-niang, "I was short of money and sold it for a mere eight taels of silver, which I had to spend on the lictors from the district yamen."

Upon hearing this, Ch'un-mei nodded her head and could not prevent her starry eyes from feeling sour.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but

In her heart she thought to herself,

"It was the disposition of my mistress to:

Contend for supremacy without conceding defeat, and she made a point of urging her husband to buy that bed for her. I had really hoped that I might be able to acquire this bed of hers as a souvenir, but it has unexpectedly fallen into someone else's hands."

Unable to control her distress, she asked Yüeh-niang, "What has become of that inlaid mother-of pearl bed of the Sixth Lady's?"

"It's a long story," responded Yüeh-niang. "Ever since my husband passed away, every day:

There are merely expenditures,

Without any sources of income.

As the saying goes:

If a family lacks a means of subsistence,

Even bushels of gold will not sustain it.

Being short of money, I had it taken away to be sold."

"How much did you sell it for?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"I only got thirty-five taels of silver for it," responded Yüeh-niang.

"It's too bad," remarked Ch'un-mei. "That bed, I remember Father's saying, originally cost more than sixty taels of silver; and now it has been sold for so much less. If I had only known that you were getting rid of it, I would have been willing to pay you thirty or forty taels of silver for it. I would have really liked to have it."

"My good Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "no matter how proficient people may be:

They cannot foresee future developments."

When they had sighed over this for what seemed like half a day, whom should they see but the servant Chou Jen from Chou Hsiu's household, who came to fetch Ch'un-mei, saying, "Mistress, His Honor would like you to return home as soon as possible. Your son has been crying after you."

Ch'un-mei promptly agreed to return to the rear compound, and Yüeh-niang ordered Hsiao-yü to lock the garden gate, after which she accompanied her back to the parlor in the master suite, where already:

Screens displayed their peacocks' tails,

Curtains showed off their mermaid silks,

a feast had been laid out, and two singing girls stood by, with their silver psalteries and balloon guitars, to play and sing for the company. Yüeh-niang proceeded to serve the wine and preside over the feast, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Ch'un-mei was ushered to the seat of honor but refused to occupy it by herself, insisting that Sister-in-law Wu share it with her. Yüeh-niang took her place as hostess and served the wine, as soup and rice, along with other delicacies, were laid before them, and Ch'un-mei directed her servant Chou Jen to reward the chef with three mace of silver. Words are inadequate to describe the scene:

Platters are piled with exotic viands,

And wine overflows with golden ripples.

Thereupon, what with:

The raising of glasses and passing of cups,

they continued drinking until the sun was about to set.

What should they see at this juncture but another servant from Chou Hsiu's household, who came with a lantern to escort Ch'un-mei on her way home. Yüeh-niang, however, would not let her go and ordered the two singing girls to kneel before her and play their instruments and sing, as a means of encouraging her to continue drinking.

"Select a good song," she told them, "with which to show your respect for Mistress Chou."

She also had Hsiao-yü pour out a large goblet of wine and place it before her.

Urging Ch'un-mei to drink, she said, "Sister, choose one of your favorite songs, and have the two of them perform it for you as you enjoy your wine."

"My Lady, responded Ch'un-mei, "I ought not to drink any more. I fear that my child is crying for me at home."

"Even if your little boy may be crying for you," said Yüeh-niang, "after all, his wet nurses are at hand to look after him. It's early enough yet, and I know you've got no mean capacity for drink."

Ch'un-mei then asked the two singing girls, "What are your names, and whose establishments are you from?"

The two of them knelt down before her and said, "One of us is the younger sister of Han Chin-ch'uan and is named Han Yü-ch'uan; while the other is the niece of Cheng Ai-hsiang and is named Cheng Chiao-erh."

"Can you sing any songs to the tune 'Reluctant to Paint Her Eyebrows?'" asked Ch'un-mei.

"If Mistress would like us to," responded Han Yü-ch'uan, "we can both do so."

"Since the two of you can sing what she has requested," said Yüeh-niang, "let us pour out some more wine for Mistress Chou to enjoy as the two of you sing for her."

Hsiao-yü, who was standing to one side, promptly poured out more wine, while the two singing girls, one of them playing the psaltery, and the other the balloon guitar, proceeded to sing:

My lover, when can I ever cease to care for you?
Having endured the spring, it has now come to autumn.
Who is there who understands what is in my heart?
Heaven!
You have caused me to become thin and emaciated.
Upon hearing anything of you, my
two eyes shed tears.
Ever since the beginning, we have shared our desires.
Who would have thought you could heartlessly abandon me?

When Ch'un-mei had drunk her wine, Yüeh-niang told Cheng Chiao-erh to pour another cup for her, at which Ch'un-mei said, "Venerable Lady, you must keep me company with another cup for yourself."

Thereupon, both of their cups were filled to the brim, and the two singing girls then continued to sing:

My lover, all on your account I am losing my allure.
Magpies are crying before the eaves,³ unwilling to stop.
There is no call for the deadly tone of their lively cries.
Heaven!
Nevertheless, they serve to stir up my dormant feelings;
Causing such desolation that my
two eyes shed tears.
Ever since he elected to go his way,⁴
I can't forget him.
Who would have thought you could betray my love and abandon me?

"My Lady," said Ch'un-mei, "you should get your sister-in-law to drink a cup of wine."

"My sister-in-law is not much of a drinker," responded Yüeh-niang. "But I'll have her down a small cup to keep you company."

She then said to Hsiao-yü, "Pour out a small cup of wine for my sister-in-law."

The two singing girls then continued to sing:

My lover, on your account I am suffering from a bout of depression.
I long for you as I sit, yearn for you as I walk,
and sorrow both day and night.
My fragrant flesh has become emaciated,⁵ and my geniality has declined.
Heaven!
I long to see you, but I am unable to do so,
Which causes me such grief that my
two eyes shed tears.
Originally we were inseparably attached to each other.
Who would have thought that this time
you could abandon me?

At this juncture, Ch'un-mei saw that Hsiao-yü was standing in front of her, and proceeded to pour out a large cup of wine for her to drink.

"Sister," remarked Yüeh-niang, "she can't handle it."

"My Lady," responded Ch'un-mei, "she can handle two or three cups. Have I not enjoyed drinking with her when I was a member of your household?"

Thereupon, having poured out the wine, she urged Hsiao-yü to drink it. The two singing girls then continued to sing:

My lover, on your account I am suffering from idle grief.
As I lie on the pillow of my sickbed,
it never seems to end.
With a breastful of sorrow, I cannot help puckering my eyebrows.
Heaven!
Though I try to forget, my memories always return.
Upon the sides of my cheeks, my two eyes shed tears.
Originally the two of us were indivisibly united.
Who would have thought that for over a year
you would opt to abandon me?

Gentle reader, take note: At this juncture, why did Ch'un-mei choose to have the singing girls perform this particular set of songs? For some time she had been preoccupied by the thought of Ch'en Ching-chi, who was still at large, so that:

There was no way for them to get together.⁶
The seeds of passion and sprouts of ardor,
Inevitably have an effect on the feelings,
And are commonly given melodic expression.

She had also observed that the two singing girls performed sweetly and cleverly and was:

Delighted in her heart, by the way they waited upon her assiduously, addressing her as "Mistress this," and "Mistress that."

She therefore summoned her servant Chou Jen and had him take out a pair of gift packets containing two mace of silver apiece and awarded one to each of them. The two singing girls responded by putting aside their musical instruments, and kowtowing to her:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
in order to express their gratitude for her largess.

In a little while, Ch'un-mei got up to leave, and Yüeh-niang was unable to persuade her to stay any longer. Accompanied by her attendants, bearing lanterns, she said good-bye, went out the gate, and got into her large sedan chair. The servants' wives who had come with her also got into their smaller sedan chairs, and they went their way, with four lanterns in front and behind them, and with soldiers shouting to clear the way. Truly:

When fortune comes, even the crudest iron looks shiny;
When luck departs, even the brightest gold lacks luster.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Daubing her lips with crimson rouge, she flaunts her jadelike beauty;
Like the phoenix flying down in response to the playing of the flute.
In front of the hall the speckled bamboo blinds are rolled up high; Revealing the swallows as they return to reoccupy their former nests.

To resume our story, after coming home from her visit to Wu Yüeh-niang's residence, Ch'un-mei longed to see Ch'en Ching-chi but did not know where he had gone. All day long she took to her bed and was not in the best of moods.

Upon finding out what was bothering her, the commandant said, "I imagine you must be worrying that your cousin:

Has not been able to find a place for himself."⁷

He then called in Chang Sheng and Li An and admonished them, saying, "I entrusted you some time ago with the task of locating the whereabouts of your mistress's cousin. Why have you failed to exert yourselves in order to find him?"

"We went looking for him all over the place some time ago," the two of them responded, "but were unable to find him. We have already reported this to our mistress."

"I will set you a time limit of five days," the commandant said. "If you fail to locate him during that period, you will have to answer for it."

Chang Sheng and Li An, upon receiving this command, wore worried expressions as they proceeded conscientiously to:

Reconnoiter the streets and explore the alleys,⁸ looking everywhere for him. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.

To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi had been beaten and let go from the commandant's yamen, he intended to return to the Yen-kung Temple, but someone told him, "Your master Abbot Jen, upon hearing that you had been sleeping with a prostitute and had been beaten up and taken to the commandant's yamen, went to check the contents of his strongbox and found it to be empty, which gave him such a shock that, later that night, he passed away. If you have the nerve to venture into the temple, his disciples are likely to kill you."

Ch'en Ching-chi was frightened by this and did not dare to enter the temple. He also did not have the face to go once again to appeal to the elderly Layman of Apricot Village, Wang Hsüan. By day, he drifted about scrounging for whatever he could pick up, and at night, he sought refuge in a homeless shelter.

One day, it was one of those occasions when:

Something was destined to happen.

Ch'en Ching-chi was standing in the street when he caught sight of the Iron Fingernail, Yang the Elder. He was wearing a new silk cap on his head, a white satin jacket on his torso over an undergown of jet-black damask, aloeswood-colored stockings, and a pair of shiny white loafers, and was riding on a donkey with ornate silver trim on the saddle and bridle, as he came down the street, with a page boy in attendance.

Perceiving that it was Yang Kuang-yen, Ch'en Ching-chi stepped forward, took hold of the donkey's bit with his hand, and addressed him, saying, "Brother Yang the Elder, it is some time since we have seen each other. The two of us were friends and went down river together to purchase piece goods for our business. But, while our boat was docked at Ch'ing-chiang P'u, I made a side trip to Yen-chou prefecture to visit a relative and was entrapped and taken to court. But you did not wait for me to return and absconded to who knows where with half a boatload of my goods. When I went to your house to ask after you, with the best of intentions, your younger brother Yang Erh-feng scratched open the skin on his head with a shard of tile and chased me all the way home, where he pounded on my gate. As a result, today, I have been reduced to the point of being:

As poor as though I have been utterly cleaned out, while you are able to swagger about and show off your wealth."

When Yang the Elder saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had been reduced to beggary, he laughed disdainfully, saying, "It's just my luck on this occasion to venture outside only to encounter a pestilential ghost. You lousy death-defying starveling of a beggar! Where on earth would the likes of you get half a boatload of goods for me to abscond with? If you don't let go of the bit, I'll subject you to a good whipping with my riding crop."

"At present," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "I am impoverished, while you are loaded with silver. Give me something to sustain me or I will take you to court."

When Yang the Elder saw that he would not let go of the bit, he jumped off his donkey and gave him a few strokes with his whip, while shouting to his page boy, "Drag this death-defying beggar aside for me."

The page boy, exerting all his strength, managed to push Ch'en Ching-chi onto the ground, whereupon, Yang the Elder stepped up and gave him a number of kicks with his foot, until he started to howl outlandishly. In no time at all, they were surrounded by a crowd of onlookers. At this point, a man emerged from the sidelines, who wore a high hat on his head, held in place with a kerchief, and was carelessly draped in a purple jacket, over a white cotton tunic. His two bare feet were clad in rush sandals. He had sunken eyes, broomlike eyebrows, an oversized mouth, and a three-pointed beard. His countenance was adorned with:

Bulging lumps of purple flesh;
while his wrists were lined with:
Swollen rows of blood vessels;

Yang Kuang-yen Abuses Ch'en Ching-chi Brutishly and he was stupefied with drink.

Raising his fists, he approached Yang the Elder and berated him, saying, "Brother, how can you be so unreasonable? He is only an impoverished youngster, so why are you bent on beating him this way? It has always been true that:

An angry fist does not strike a smiling face.

Moreover, he has done nothing to offend you. If you have the means to do so, give him something, out of consideration for your past relationship. If you lack the means, so be it. But there is no reason for you to continue beating him. It has always been true that:

When an injustice is witnessed on the road,
Someone will always try to shed light on it."

"You don't understand," responded Yang the Elder. "He falsely accuses me of absconding with half a boatload of his property. It is obvious that no one as impoverished as he is could have had half a boatload of property to begin with."

"I imagine," opined his interlocutor, "that he may originally have been the scion of a well-to-do family, who has since suffered the misfortune of becoming thus impoverished. Since you, Sir, are such a rich gentleman, I hope that you will comply with my request. If you have the means of doing so, give him something with which to support himself."

When Yang the Elder had heard him out, he actually unfastened the handkerchief in his sleeve, which contained an ingot worth four or five mace of silver, and handed it to Ch'en Ching-chi; after which he raised his hand in farewell to his interlocutor, mounted his donkey, and went nonchalantly on his way.

When Ch'en Ching-chi scrambled to his feet and looked at the man in question, he saw that he was not a stranger, but was the beggar boss, known as the Flying Demon, Hou Lin, who was currently the foreman of a gang of construction workers, and with whom he had formerly shared a bed when he was living in the homeless shelter. At present, he was in charge of a gang of fifty workers, who were engaged in repair work on the sanctuary of the Buddhist monastery outside the south wall of the city known as the Shui-yüeh Ssu, or Water Moon Monastery, presided over by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh.

Taking Ch'en Ching-chi by the hand, Hou Lin addressed him, saying, "Brother, had it not been for the few words of protest I confronted him with, he would hardly have come up with those five mace of silver for you. Louse that he is, at least he knew when to concede. If he had refused to concede, for better or for worse, I would have given him a drubbing with my fists. Come along with me. Let's go to a wine shop and have a drink."

They then made their way to a small meat-eating wine shop, sat down at a table, and ordered the waiter to bring them four dishes to go with their drinks, and two large flagons of wine. Before long, after the waiter had wiped their table clean, he laid out a selection of appetizers on four platters and four saucers, and two large jugs of the olive wine that was in vogue at the time. They were not provided with small cups but with large porcelain goblets.

Hou Lin then turned to Ch'en Ching-chi and asked, "Brother, would you rather eat noodles or rice?"

"The noodles are boiled in hot water," explained the waiter, "and the rice is polished white rice."

"I'll take the noodles," said Ch'en Ching-chi.

Before long, enough boiled noodles to fill two or three bowls were placed on the table. Hou Lin ate only one bowl of them, and Ch'en Ching-chi ate the other two. Only after that did they begin to drink the wine.

"Brother," said Hou Lin to Ch'en Ching-chi, "today you can come with me and spend the night at the establishment where I am staying; and tomorrow I'll take you south of the city to the Water Moon Monastery, presided over by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh. Repairs are under way there to the sanctuary and the two corridors of residence halls, and I am in charge of the fifty workers employed on the project. If you come there, you will not be given any heavy work to do, but merely put to carrying a few baskets of soil. You will be counted as one of the workers and will earn four candareens of silver per day. I can rent space in a side building outside the monastery where the two of us can sleep at night and prepare food for ourselves. I will entrust the lock to you and put you in charge of the place. How would that be? It would surely be better than having to reside in the homeless shelter while ringing your bell and sounding your clapper in place of that beggar of a night watchman, and it would be more respectable to boot."

"If my brother is prepared to show such favor to me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "I will be happy to accept. But I don't know how long this construction project is likely to last."

"It has only been going on for a month so far," responded Hou Lin, "and it may go on until the tenth month, or later, for all I know."

As the two of them talked together, what with:

First a cup for you,

Then a cup for me,

they managed to finish off the two large jugs of wine. The waiter calculated the bill to be one mace and three and a half candareens.

Ch'en Ching-chi offered to pay the tab and produced his ingot of silver to be weighed, but Hou Lin pushed it aside, saying, "You silly younger brother! Do you think I would let you pay for it? I've got the silver for it right here."

So saying, he pulled out his wallet and weighed out one mace and five candareens of silver for the manager, receiving one and a half candareens in change, which he tucked into his sleeve. He then leaned on Ch'en Ching-chi's shoulder as they made their way to the place where he was staying, and they spent the night together.

The two of them were both drunk, and during the night, Hou Lin enjoyed plucking the flower in Ch'en Ching-chi's rear courtyard all night long, exclaiming, "Dear brother! Dear daddy! Dear man! Dear father!" There were no endearments they did not lavish on each other.

Early the next morning, as he had promised, Hou Lin rented half of a side building outside the Water Moon Monastery south of the city, which was supplied with a heated k'ang and a wood-burning stove. He also bought all the cups, bowls, and other utensils that were needed. Later that morning, they reported for roll call at the construction site.

When the other workers saw that Ch'en Ching-chi was no more than twenty-three or twenty-four years old, and that he had a white face and was:

Bright-eyed and clean-cut, they realized that he was a catamite of Hou Lin's and teased him outrageously.

One of them asked him, "Youngster, what is your name?"

Ch'en Ching-chi responded, "My name is Ch'en Ching-chi."

"If your name is Ch'en Ching-chi," the worker continued, "I guess you are accustomed to being squeezed into."⁹

Another worker remarked, "As young as you are, even if you go in for such things, it's a wonder you can accommodate a pole of that size."

Hou Lin responded to this by shouting at them to leave him alone, saying, "You crazy beggars, what are you teasing him for?"

He then proceeded to distribute spades and shovels, baskets and carrying poles, to the assembled workers, who went about their respective tasks; some of them carrying earth, some of them mixing mortar, and others working on the foundations.

It so happens that Abbot Hsiao-yüeh had appointed a Buddhist follower known as Yeh the Ascetic as the chef in charge of cooking food for the workers on the construction project. This Yeh the Ascetic was about fifty years old and was blind in one eye. He was dressed in a long black gown, his feet were bare, and he wore a ragged woolen sash around his waist. He was incapable of reading the scriptures but was given to reciting the Buddha's name and was good at the physiognomic techniques of the Hemp-robed Master.¹⁰ People referred to him as Adept Yeh.

One day, after their morning work was finished, and the laborers had eaten their lunch, they were sitting, standing, or squatting about at their leisure, when they saw Ch'en Ching-chi come up and ask Yeh the Ascetic for some tea, to which he merely responded by looking him over from top to toe.

"Adept Yeh," one of the workers said to him, "this youngster is a newcomer. Why don't you physiognomize him?"

"Go ahead and physiognomize him," another said. "He looks like a catamite to me."

"I'd say he looks more like a hermaphrodite," said another.

Yeh the Ascetic asked him to step forward and looked him over for a while before saying:

"Your demeanor, I fear, is too tender,

as well as seductive;

Your seductive voice and tender nature

may prove your undoing.

If your demeanor is tender in old age

it invites trouble;

If your demeanor is tender when young

it will not endure.¹¹

You are bound to suffer because of the tenderness of your demeanor, though during your whole life it will prove attractive to women.

Throughout your eighth, eighteenth, and twenty-eighth years,

It will show from the bridge of your nose to the top of your hair.

Whether you make a living or not, you will lose at both ends;

At thirty, you can't allow evil forces to besiege your brow.¹²

Your glance may be captivating and your brain be quick-witted;

You may attract people, though ignorant of poetry and history.

Whatever you do, other people may find you to be charming,

Since the falsehoods you manipulate are made to seem true.¹³

Don't take offense at what I say, but during your entire life:

Your quick-wittedness and artfulness, will induce women to help you succeed. How old are you this year?"

"I am twenty-three years old," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

"It is amazing that you survived the events of the year before last," said Adept Yeh. "The fact is that:

If the room between your eyebrows is too narrow,

Your progeny will perish and your wife will die;

If the facial area under your earlobes is murky,

Your kinfolk will die and your household perish.¹⁴

If your lips do not cover your teeth,¹⁵

You will always provoke altercations.

If your nose looks like a stove-door,

Your family wealth will be dispersed.¹⁶

During that year did you experience:

The verbal interchanges of a trial; and

The loss of your family and wealth?"

"I experienced all those things," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

"There is another thing," said Yeh the Ascetic. "The bridge of your nose ought not to be abbreviated. The Hemp-robed Master has two lines that state it very well:

If the bridge of your nose is abbreviated you will soon be wiped out;

The wealth of your ancestors will be lost and your family destroyed.¹⁷

During your early years, no matter how much wealth you inherited from your ancestors, once it came into your hands, you managed to squander it all.

If the upper segment of your face is short and the lower segment long,¹⁸

it portends that you will have:

Many successes and many failures;¹⁹ and that you may spend all your money, and yet get it back.

But in the end:

Though you may manage to find a means of supporting yourself;
It will end up like ice and frost when exposed to the hot sun.²⁰

Be so good as to take a couple of steps for me to see.”

Ch'en Ching-chi took a couple of steps, as requested.

Yeh the Ascetic then went on to pronounce:

“If your head extends in front of your feet,
It portends that you may start out well but end up impoverished.²¹

If your heels don't come down on the ground,
You may have to sell off your property and move to another place,²²

since, during your lifetime, you have:

Failed to preserve your ancestral property.

In the future, you may be fated to have three wives. Have you already suffered the loss of a wife, or not?”

“I have already lost a wife,” responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

“You may still be fated to have three wives,” said Yeh the Ascetic. “After all:

Your face is as radiant as a peach blossom.

But you may have difficulty siring a son, since you are so:

Engrossed by the pleasures of wine and sex.²³

I fear, however, that there may be:

Misfortune lurking amidst your good fortune.

In their thirties, young men begin to lose their stamina and ought not to venture too often into the world of flowers and willows, but endeavor to moderate their desires.”

At this juncture, one of the workers interrupted him, saying, “Adept Yeh, you've got it all wrong. He is already playing the role of a wife to someone himself. What would he do with three wives?”

This had the effect of causing the rest of the company to fall all of a heap with laughter.

They then heard Abbot Hsiao-yüeh sounding his clapper, and the lot of them picked up their spades, shovels, baskets, and carrying poles and went back to work.

Under these conditions, Ch'en Ching-chi continued to work at the Water Moon Monastery for a month or so.

One day, during the middle decade of the third month, Ch'en Ching-chi, along with his fellow workers, had carried up a load of earth and was squatting at the foot of the wall by the door of the monastery, sunning himself, and picking the lice off his body, when he happened to see a man who was wearing a flat-topped cap, held in place with a hammered gold ring that floated at the back of his skull, who was dressed in a close-fitting black gown and a purple cummerbund over the belt around his waist, and whose feet were clad in long-legged boots. He rode astride a brown horse and carried a basket of fresh flowers in his hands.

Upon catching sight of Ch'en Ching-chi, he abruptly jumped off his horse, came forward, and made a deep obeisance, saying, “Uncle Ch'en, we have been searching everywhere for you without success, and it turns out that you are here.”

This gave Ch'en Ching-chi quite a start, and he promptly bowed in return, saying, “Brother, where have you come from?”

“I am Chang Sheng,” he responded, “a servant in the household of His Honor Chou Hsiu. Ever since he released you from the legal difficulties you were in and let you go, my mistress has not been feeling well, right up until the present time. His Honor sent me out to look everywhere for you, but I had no idea you were here. Had my mistress not sent me, this morning, to go to their country estate outside the city and bring her these herbaceous peonies, so that I had occasion to come by here, I would never have discovered your whereabouts. In the first place, this is an instance of your good fortune, venerable sir; and in the second place, it is lucky for me too. There is no reason for you to hesitate. Just get on my horse, and I will escort you to the commandant's residence.”

When the crowd of workers observed this, they could only:

Gaze at each other in astonishment, not venturing to utter a word. Ch'en Ching-chi, thereupon, handed the key to the room they had been sharing to Hou Lin, mounted the horse, and set out for the commandant's residence, with Chang Sheng following closely behind him. Truly:

When one's lover achieves his desires while in the prime of his youth;

There is no knowing where he will enjoy the bright moon on this night.²⁴

There is a poem that testifies to this:

White jade is concealed within coarse rock;
Yellow gold is buried beneath filthy mud.
The day a prestigious person
picks one up;
Is like a ladder going to the heavenly gates.²⁵

CH'EN CHING-CHI PLAYS A ROLE IN THE COMMANDANT'S HOUSEHOLD; AUNTIE HSÜEH PEDDLES TRINKETS AND PROPOSES A MARRIAGE MATCH

In this world one has a role to play for three score years and ten;
What need is there both day and night to overtax one's spirits?
The affairs of this world in the end
all eventuate in nothing;
The fleeting luxury that beguiles the eye is wont to prove unreal.
Poverty and want, wealth and distinction,
are allocated by Heaven;
Success and failure, flourishing and decay,
are but dust in a crack.
So why not let yourself go, enjoying pleasures as they come;
Rather than waiting for the messenger of death to seize you?¹

THE STORY GOES that when Ch'en Ching-chi arrived at Commandant Chou Hsiu's headquarters and dismounted, Chang Sheng preceded him inside to report his presence to Ch'un-mei. Ch'un-mei ordered that Ch'en Ching-chi should be taken to a duty room in the front of the compound and given a bath in a tub of fragrant water, so that his body would be washed clean. She also sent one of the wet nurses to take out a bundle of new clothes, a pair of boots, and a cap for him to change into. Chang Sheng took the tattered old garments that he had been wearing, tied them up into a bundle, and hung it up in the duty room, before reporting back to Ch'un-mei. At the time, the commandant had not yet retired from the courtroom.

Ch'un-mei then invited Ch'en Ching-chi into the reception hall at the rear of the compound, where she adorned herself elegantly before coming out to greet him.

Upon entering the door, Ch'en Ching-chi went up to Ch'un-mei and set out to perform:

Four brace makes eight kowtows, saying, "Sister, pray accept my homage."

Ch'un-mei only allowed him to perform half an obeisance, after which, they sat down facing each other and proceeded to talk over the weather, and the events that had befallen them since they were separated, which led them both to:

Shed tears from their eyes.²

Ch'un-mei was concerned that the commandant might retire from the courtroom and come in upon them, so, seeing that there was nobody else about, she gave Ch'en Ching-chi a wink and whispered to him, saying, "In the future, if he should raise any questions about yourself, say that you are a younger cousin of mine. I am a year older than you at the age of twenty-five, and I was born at noon on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month."

"I understand," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.

Before long, a maidservant brought in a serving of tea, and the two of them drank it together.

Ch'un-mei then went on to ask, "Why did you ever give up lay life to become a Taoist monk? When you were allowed to go from the yamen here, the commandant did not know that you were related to me. He had you beaten in error and greatly regrets it. I would have detained you here at the time were it not that Sun Hsüeh-o, that worthless creature, was also working here, and it would not have been possible to accommodate you without her making trouble. That's why I let you go. Afterwards, I got rid of that worthless creature and sent Chang Sheng to look everywhere for you, but he couldn't find you. Who could have known that you were working as a laborer outside the city and had fallen into such miserable circumstances?"

"I will not deceive you, sister," said Ch'en Ching-chi:

"It's a long story.

After the two of us were separated, I planned to marry Sister Six, but my father died in the Eastern Capital, which delayed my return, so I was unable to marry her, and she was killed by Wu Sung. I heard that, out of the kindness of your heart, you had her buried on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity. I also visited her grave site and burned paper money there on her behalf. At home, my mother also passed away, and it was not long after I had taken care of her funeral that someone made off with my capital. Upon my return home, my wife Hsi-men Ta-chieh also died, and that whore, my mother-in-law, not only took me to court over it but also reclaimed all of my wife's belongings. After the lawsuit against me, I had to sell my house and was left:

As poor as though I had been utterly cleaned out.

Fortunately, an old friend of my father's, named Wang Hsüan, and known as the Layman of Apricot Hermitage, came to my rescue and escorted me to the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing, where he arranged for me to become a Taoist acolyte. Unexpectedly, however, I was subsequently assaulted by a 'bare stick' and ended up being bound and transported to the commandant's yamen, where I was given ten strokes with the rod, and then released.

If I appeal to my relatives, they only ignore me;

If I appeal to my friends, they pay me no regard.

As a result, I ended up working as a day laborer at the Water Moon Monastery. I am profoundly indebted to my sister for caring enough to send your servant to look for me, with the result that I have been able to see you again.

Your kindness will be amply rewarded,

I will never dare to forget it."

As he related these pitiable events, the two of them both shed tears.

Whom should they see at this point but Commandant Chou Hsiu, who retired from the courtroom and came back to the rear compound. When his attendants lifted aside the portiere, and he entered the room, Ch'en Ching-chi came forward and knelt down before him.

This threw the commandant into such consternation that he promptly returned the salutation and said, "The other day, I did not know that you were a worthy young cousin of my wife, having been kept in the dark by my subordinates. I hope that you will forgive me for having treated you so offensively."

"Unworthy as I am," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "it is I who am at fault for having failed to keep in touch.

I can only hope that you will forgive me."³

So saying, he kowtowed once again.

The commandant helped him up with one hand and ushered him to the seat of honor. Ch'en Ching-chi, however, was sensitive enough to object to this and insisted on pulling the chair to one side before consenting to sit down on it. The commandant then assumed the role of host, and Ch'un-mei sat down facing their guest.

Before long, a new serving of tea was brought in, and when they had finished drinking it, Chou Hsiu asked, "Worthy cousin, how old are you? Why is it that I haven't met you before? And why did you leave lay life to become a Taoist acolyte?"

"I'm twenty-three," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "while my cousin is one year older than I am, and was born at noon on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month. A while ago, because both my father and mother passed away, my property became depleted, and my wife died, I left lay life to become a Taoist acolyte in the Yen-kung Temple. I did not know that my cousin had married into your household and have, consequently, been remiss in seeking her out."

"My worthy cousin," said the commandant, "ever since you were let go the other day, your cousin has worried about you, both by day and by night, and has been constantly upset, and given to:

Moaning and groaning, about it, right up until the present time. I have been sending men out to look for you for some time, but without success. Who could have anticipated that today we would get together? It is truly a case of:

An affinity extending to three lives."⁴

He then ordered his attendants to set up a table and provide them with wine. In no time at all, they laid out an assortment of cups and platters, containing chicken, pig's trotters, goose, and duck, which had been stir-fried, roasted, steamed, and deep-fried, along with soup and rice and other dainties, that filled the entire surface of the table.

Within silver flagons and jade goblets,

The wine overflows with golden ripples.

The commandant joined in their conversation and kept them company, feasting until the lanterns and candles were lighted that evening before breaking up.

The commandant ordered his servant Chou Jen to sweep out the library on the west side of the front courtyard, which was already furnished with a bed and bed curtains. Ch'un-mei then brought out two sets of bedding, complete with quilts and pillows, so that Ch'en Ching-chi would have a place to sleep; and also arranged for a page boy named Hsi-erh to wait on him. In addition, she supplied him with two more outfits of silk clothing, so that he would have something to change into when needed. Ch'un-mei also invited him to come into the residential compound for his meals every day. Truly:

At the time one meets with good fortune,

It owes nothing at all to one's efforts."⁵

Light and darkness alternate swiftly;

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

Behold:

No sooner do the plum trees blossom

at winter's end,

Than one encounters New Year's day in the first month.

Before one is aware of the apricots filling the branches,
It is time for new lotus blossoms to adhere to the water.⁶

When Ch'en ching-chi had resided in the commandant's household for more than a month, the time came for Ch'un-mei's birthday on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month. Wu Yüeh-niang prepared an assortment of gifts for her, consisting of a tray of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a tray of birthday noodles, two boiled geese, four fresh chickens, two trays of candied fruits, and a jar of southern wine. Tai-an, clad in black livery, delivered them. Commandant Chou Hsiu was sitting in the reception hall when the gate keeper came in to announce his arrival, and the gifts were carried inside. Tai-an handed over the note that accompanied the gifts and then got down on the ground and kowtowed.

When the commandant had read the note with its list of gifts, he said, "I am much obliged to your mistress for taking the trouble to send these presents."

He then told a servant, "Take these gifts inside, and bring out a serving of tea for this gentleman."

He also handed the gift card to a page boy, saying, "Deliver this to your uncle, and have him seal up a handkerchief and three mace of silver for this gentleman, and a hundred candareens for the bearer. Have him write a thank-you note as well to express our appreciation."

When he had finished speaking, Commandant Chou Hsiu donned his formal clothes and went out to make New Year's calls. Meanwhile, Tai-an waited in front of the reception hall for the return card.

What should he see at this juncture but a young man who was wearing a "tile-ridge" hat, a black silk Taoist robe, and sandals with white socks and came out through the postern gate, carrying the return card and gratuities in his hand, and gave them to the page boy, after which, he went straight back inside.

Strange as it may seem,
he looked just like son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, and Tai-an thought to himself, "I wonder what he is doing here?"

The page boy then handed the handkerchief and the silver to Tai-an and saw him to the door.

When he got home and reported to Yüeh-niang, she saw that the return card read, "Respectfully indited with straightened skirts by the lady, née P'ang, of the Chou family," and asked him, "Did you not see your sister Ch'un-mei?"

"I did not see my sister," replied Tai-an, "but I did see our son-in-law."

"You crazy jailbird!" laughed Yüeh-niang. "How could we have such an elderly son-in-law? The commandant is far too advanced in years for you to refer to him as our son-in-law."

"It was not the commandant I was referring to," responded Tai-an, "it was our son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi. When I first went in, His Honor Chou Hsiu was in the reception hall, and I handed him your card and kowtowed to him. He thanked me, saying, 'I have put your mistress to the trouble of sending these lavish gifts,' and then told a servant to bring me a serving of tea, and said to a page boy, 'Deliver this card to your uncle, and have him seal up a handkerchief and three mace of silver for this gentleman, and a hundred candareens for the bearer.' When he had finished speaking, His Honor Chou Hsiu put on his formal clothes and then set out on horseback to make New Year's calls. After I had waited for what seemed like half a day, the gentleman in question came out through the postern gate, handed the return card and gratuities to the page boy, and then went back inside, leaving me to take charge of the gift box and return home. If it wasn't him, who else could it have been?"

"You crazy little jailbird!" said Yüeh-niang. "Stop talking nonsense. Who knows where that stray lamb has ended up begging for his food? If he hasn't frozen to death, he has probably starved to death. Whatever would he be doing, for no good reason, in such a household? What would the commandant see in such a creature that would induce him to patronize him?"

"Mistress," said Tai-an, "would you like to make a bet with me about it? My identification of him is:

As certain as certain can be.

Even if he had been burned to ashes, I could identify his bones."

"How was he dressed?" asked Yüeh-niang.

Tai-an responded, "He wore a new 'tile-ridge' hat, held in place with a gold pin, a black silk Taoist robe, and sandals with white stockings; and he looked to be well-fed."

"I can't believe it," exclaimed Yüeh-niang, "I simply can't believe it."

We will say no more at this juncture about their conversation.

To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi reentered the rear compound, Ch'un-mei was still in her room, putting on her makeup and painting her eyebrows in front of her mirror stand.

Ch'en Ching-chi showed her Yüeh-niang's card and asked, "Why should her household be sending gifts to you? What reason could there be for it?"

Ch'un-mei then told him all about how, some time ago, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, she had run into Yüeh-niang at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city; how, later on, P'ing-an had stolen the hair ornaments from the pawnshop; how the police chief Wu Tien-en had subjected him to a beating in the squeezers and induced him to testify that Yüeh-niang had been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an; and how Auntie Hsüeh had come and appealed to her to intervene in the case, with the result that the commandant had exonerated her.

"Her household purchased gifts for us as an expression of their gratitude," she went on to say, "and during the first month, I went to her home to celebrate Hsiao-ko's birthday. We have been keeping in touch with each other ever since, and she promised that on my birthday she would purchase gifts and come pay me a visit."

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he gave her a look and said, "Sister, how can you be so irresolute? Don't you remember how that lousy whore forced the two of us to separate and sent Sister Six to her death?"

For a thousand years or all eternity,
it would be better if you:

Had nothing to do with each other,
either indoors or out.

But instead you actually intervened on her behalf. Why should you have been afraid to let Wu Tien-en torture that page boy P'ing-an into testifying that she had been engaging in hanky-panky, rather than letting that whore be taken into custody with a length of rope and allowing her to suffer humiliation in the courtroom? What's it got to do with us anyway? Actually, if she hadn't been engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an, why should she have given her maidservant Hsiao-yü to him as a wife? If I had been here at the time, I never would have let you intervene on her behalf. She has been an enemy of ours, so why have you agreed to maintain relations with her?

The sixth month is the rainy season;
So one can hardly expect to have fair weather?"

This tirade had the effect of temporarily reducing Ch'un-mei to silence, but she then went on to say, "Why not let bygones be bygones? As far as I'm concerned:

Good minds are not obsessed with old enmities."⁷

"At the present time," responded Ch'en Ching-chi:

"Even the best intentions go quite unrequited."

"Since she has already sent these gifts to me," said Ch'un-mei, "I can hardly agree to accept them without doing anything in return. She is expecting me to send someone to invite her."

"From now on," opined Ch'en Ching-chi, "there is no need for us to pay any attention to that whore. What reason is there for issuing her an invitation?"

"Not to invite her would be a source of embarrassment," said Ch'un-mei. "I'll just send her a card, and leave it to her whether she chooses to come or not. If she does come, you should confine yourself to the library where you are staying, and not come out to meet her. In the future, I won't bother with her, and leave it at that."

Ch'en Ching-chi was annoyed by this but did not say a word and went to the front compound to compose an invitation, which Ch'un-mei entrusted to their servant Chou I to deliver to Wu Yüeh-niang. Yüeh-niang, after dressing herself appropriately, set out for the commandant's residence, along with the wet nurse Ju-i, who held Hsiao-ko in her arms and rode in a smaller sedan chair, followed by Tai-an. When she arrived there, Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang, appropriately dressed, came out to welcome her and ushered her back to the rear reception hall, where they sat down together after exchanging the customary amenities, and Ju-i, while holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, kowtowed to them. Ch'en Ching-chi concealed himself in the library and did not come out; allowing Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang to entertain their guest with tea, preside over the feast, and proffer her wine in the rear reception hall. They had engaged the two singing girls, Han Yü-ch'uan and Cheng Chiao-erh, to play their instruments and sing for their entertainment. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

Tai-an, who was being entertained in an anteroom in the front compound, happened to see a young page boy emerge from the rear compound, carrying a tray of soup and rice, and other viands, and head for the postern gate leading to the library on the western side of the courtyard.

"Who are those things intended for?" asked Tai-an; to which the page boy replied, "They are for my uncle to eat."

"What is your uncle's surname?" asked Tai-an.

"His surname is Ch'en," replied the page boy.

Tai-an surreptitiously followed him toward the library on the western side of the courtyard, and when the page boy lifted aside the portiere and went inside, he cautiously peeked through the gauze-covered window and saw that it was indeed their son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi who was sprawled out on the bed in the library, and who promptly got up, upon seeing that his meal was provided, set up a table for it, and proceeded to eat. Having observed this, Tai-an surreptitiously returned outside and sat down in the anteroom where he had been before.

That evening, when the lantern bearers from her household came to fetch Wu Yüeh-niang, she took her leave and went home, whereupon Tai-an told her in detail what he had seen, saying, "It is indeed the case that our son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi is residing there."

From the time it was discovered that Ch'en Ching-chi had been taken into Ch'un-mei's household, the two families ceased to have any relations with each other. Truly:

Who could have known that the young scamp would face such adversities?
Even a single thought may turn out to be
the harbinger of resentment.⁸

Although Ch'en Ching-chi was now carrying on a clandestine affair with Ch'un-mei, no one else was aware of it. Whenever the commandant was not at home, Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi would eat together and drink together in her room. During their free time, while playing board games, or laughing and joking with each other:

There was no length to which they would not go.

When the commandant was at home, Ch'un-mei would send maidservants or page boys to take meals out to the library for him to eat. Even in broad daylight, she would frequently go to the library herself and keep him company for half a day before returning to the rear compound. The warmth of their feelings for each other was such that there is no need to describe it in detail.

One day, the commandant led his men and horses out on a tour of inspection. It was the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month, and Ch'un-mei had arranged for a celebratory feast in the ornamental pavilion beside the library on the western side of the courtyard. Together with Sun Erh-niang and Ch'en Ching-chi, the three of them enjoyed drinking realgar-flavored wine and eating festival tsung-tzu,⁹ while waited upon by maids and attendants. On that auspicious day in the fifth month, what did the celebratory scene look like? Behold:

Urns are planted with green willows,
Vases are studded with red pomegranates.
Portieres of beaded crystal furl their "shrimps' whiskers," Screens of inlaid mica display their peacocks' tails.
The irises are like sliced jade;
Smiling beauties proffer goblets of iridescent hue.
The tsung-tzu are like piled gold;
Waiting maids raise on high beakers made of chrysoprase.
Dainties are prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits are provided just in season.
Efficacious charms and artemisia tigers adorn their heads;
Variegated strands of yarn are fastened around their arms.
Each household celebrates the Dragon Boat Festival;
In every place people happily imbibe fragrant wine.
Journeying beyond the corporeal realm
in the universe of the drunk;
Thus does one dissipate the idle days within the Taoist's gourd.¹⁰

Truly, it is a case of:

Her ornate pendants tinkle, and her golden lotuses are tiny;
As she gently handles her silken fan with her slender fingers.

Ch'un-mei ordered the concubines Hai-t'ang and Yüeh-kuei to play their musical instruments and sing for their entertainment. That day, they continued feasting until:

The burning sun sank into the west, and
A gentle rain had a cooling effect.

Ch'un-mei kept raising a large gold goblet in the shape of a lotus blossom, and urging them to drink. After:

Several rounds of wine had been consumed,

Sun Erh-niang:

Could not handle the effects of the drink, and got up to return to her room in the rear compound, leaving Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi to continue drinking together in the ornamental pavilion:

Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits;
First a cup for you,
Then a cup for me.

Before long, the maidservants brought out the gauze lanterns, and the wet nurses Chin-kuei and Yü-t'ang put the baby Chin-ko to bed. After losing a game, Ch'en Ching-chi went into the library, where he tried to avoid drinking any more by refusing to come out.

Ch'un-mei first sent Hai-t'ang to invite him back out, and when she learned that he refused to come, she then sent Yüeh-kuei after him, saying, "You must drag him back out, no matter what. If you fail to do so, when you return I'll give you ten slaps on the face, menial creature that you are."

Yüeh-kuei went to the library and pushed open the door, where she found that Ch'en Ching-chi was lying sprawled out on the bed, where he pretended to be snoring and could not be moved.

"The mistress has sent me to invite you back," she said. "If I fail to do so, she has threatened to beat me."

"If she beats you it is none of my business," Ch'en Ching-chi muttered in response. "I'm drunk and can't drink any more."

Yüeh-kuei dragged him up with her hand and gave him a push, saying, "I'm going to drag you there no matter what. If you won't let me do so:

You hardly count as a stout fellow."¹¹

She then pushed and pulled Ch'en Ching-chi until he became so excited that, in the dark shadows, he pretended to be drunk and:

Half facetiously but in earnest, embraced Yüeh-kuei with his arms and gave her a kiss.

This only had the effect of encouraging Yüeh-kuei to:

Assume privileges above her station, saying, "I came to fetch you with the best of intentions, and you assume the right to treat me so disrespectfully. How can you do such a thing?"

"My child," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "who is it now that is putting on airs with the best of intentions?"

So saying, he gave her another kiss, and it was only after this that they arrived back in the ornamental pavilion.

"Mistress," said Yüeh-kuei, "you may have threatened to beat me, but I have succeeded in dragging uncle back here."

Ch'un-mei then had Hai-t'ang pour out another large beaker of wine, and the two of them continued to enjoy themselves playing board games together, with the loser having to down a cup of wine as a forfeit. Thereupon, what with:

First a game for you,

Then a game for me,

they continued playing until the maidservants fell asleep from exhaustion. Ch'un-mei then sent Yüeh-kuei and Hai-t'ang back to the rear compound to fetch them some tea. Once the two of them were alone in the ornamental pavilion:

Untying her girdle pendant, she discloses the jade of the Nymph of the Hsiang River;

Distending her ruby lips, she displays the cloves of the Han dynasty Secretariat.¹²

Truly, it is a case of:

Amid the flower shadows by the curved balustrade
the lamplight shines aslant;

Beside it there is a fallen hairpin along with a pair of phoenix-feather shoes.¹³

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The Spurious Cousins Resume Their Clandestine Affair

As they embrace inside the ornamental pavilion her cloudy locks are disheveled;
Her powdered sweat becomes congealed fragrance that permeates the crimson gauze.

In the secluded courtyards the days are long¹⁴ and nobody comes to disturb you;
One can simply look on as the yellow orioles peck away at the famous flowers.

At the time, just as the two of them were in the thick of things, the concubine Hai-t'ang came back with the tea and said, "Mistress, you had better return to the rear compound. Your son Chin-ko has just waked up and is crying for you."

Ch'un-mei kept Ch'en Ching-chi company in drinking another two goblets of wine, after which, she rinsed out her mouth with tea, took her leave, and returned to the rear compound. The serving maids were left to clear away the utensils, and the male servant Hsi-erh supported Ch'en Ching-chi on his way back to the library, where he went to bed. But no more of this.

One day, an imperial edict came down ordering Commandant Chou Hsiu to lead the infantry and cavalry under his command to join Chang Shu-yeh, the prefect of Chi-chou, in a campaign against the outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh led by the bandit chieftain Sung Chiang, and to set out as soon as possible.

The commandant said to Ch'un-mei, "You must stay at home and look after our son Chin-ko. You should also engage the services of a go-between to arrange a marriage for your cousin. I will put his name on my roster; and if we are fortunate enough to be successful in our campaign, the magnanimity of the Emperor may result in his being given:

An official post or even half of one,
which will also serve to enhance your reputation."

Ch'un-mei assented to this suggestion; and two or three days later, the commandant packed his gear, mustered his infantry and cavalry, and left Chang Sheng and Li An behind to look after the household, while taking only his servant Chou Jen to accompany him. But no more of this.

One day, Ch'un-mei summoned Auntie Hsüeh and said to her, thus and so, "My husband, on the eve of his departure, suggested that I engage the services of a go-between to find a wife for my cousin. See if you can locate a decent woman of:

Appropriate social and economic standing, for me. It doesn't matter if she is only fifteen or sixteen years old, so long as she is attractive, has dainty hands and feet, and is clever and adept, since he has a somewhat finicky disposition."

"Do you think I don't know that?" said Auntie Hsüeh. "There is no need for you to tell me about it. I recall that he was not even satisfied by the likes of Hsi-men Ta-chieh."

"If you come up with one who isn't up to snuff," said Ch'un-mei, "just see if I don't box your ears for it. After all, I'll have to address her as my young sister-in-law. It's not a matter to be treated lightly."

When they had finished speaking, Ch'un-mei had a maidservant bring in a serving of tea for her. Who should appear at this point but Ch'en Ching-chi, who came in to have something to eat.

Auntie Hsüeh stepped up and bowed to him, saying, "Brother-in-law, I haven't set eyes on you for a long time. Where have you been keeping yourself? You are to be congratulated. Just now, the mistress has directed me to find a nice wife for you. How will you repay me for doing so?"

Ch'en Ching-chi only frowned at this, without saying anything.

"You old beggar," said Auntie Hsüeh, "why do you have nothing to say?"

"Don't call him brother-in-law," said Ch'un-mei. "That's over and done with. Just address him as Uncle Ch'en, that's all."

"My worthless mouth deserves to be slapped," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "It is prone to make such mistakes. In the future, I will simply address you as Uncle."

On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi couldn't help breaking into a laugh, saying, "That really touches my heart."

Auntie Hsüeh, affecting a bout of silliness, ran up to him and gave him a blow, saying, "Just look at the fine way this old beggar talks. I'm not the one you're after. So how could I ever hope to touch your heart?"

Even Ch'un-mei broke out laughing at this.

Before long, Yüeh-kuei brought in a serving of tea and snacks for Auntie Hsüeh, after consuming which, she picked up her box of trinkets and prepared to go, saying, "I will do my best to locate an appropriate young woman for you, and if I do so, will come to let you know."

"We will not skimp," stated Ch'un-mei, "on the bride price, preserved fruit, festive red silk, gifts of wine, head ornaments, and clothing for her trousseau, as long as she is an attractive girl from a good family, who might appropriately become a member of our household."

"I understand," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I guarantee that she will live up to your expectations."

After some time, Ch'en Ching-chi finished his meal and went back to the front compound.

Auntie Hsüeh, who was still sitting there, asked Ch'un-mei, "When did that gentleman come here?"

Ch'un-mei then proceeded to tell her the story of how he had become a Taoist acolyte and went on to say, "It was I who located him, and have passed him off as a relative of mine."

"Wonderful! Wonderful!" exclaimed Auntie Hsüeh. "You really have an eye for the future."

She then went on to say, "I have heard that on your birthday, a while ago, the lady from his former household came to visit you."

"She took the initiative by sending gifts to me," said Ch'un-mei. "It was only then that I sent a card inviting her to come for a visit, and she sat around for the better part of the day before going home."

"I was busy on that occasion," said Auntie Hsüeh, "preparing the bridal chamber for one of my customers, which took me all day. I had wanted to come see you but was under such pressure I was not able to do so."

She then went on to ask, "Did Uncle Ch'en see the lady from his former household?"

"He would hardly have agreed to see her," said Ch'un-mei. "He got into quite a quarrel with me over the fact that I even invited her. I said that I had merely done a favor for her household, but he accused me of lacking resolution. He said, 'There is no reason to doubt that it would have been preferable if Wu Tien-en had been allowed to beat the page boy P'ing-an into implicating the First Lady in a scandal, so that she would have been dragged into court. What did it have to do with you, that you should choose to do her a favor, in spite of the fine way she treated us in the past?'"

"What you said makes sense," opined Auntie Hsüeh. "When you get right down to it, people:

Should not be preoccupied with old enmities."

"Since I had received gifts from her," said Ch'un-mei, "not to have invited her for a visit would have been unacceptable.

It is better to overlook another's unkindness,
Than it is to commit unrighteous acts oneself."

"It is no wonder," opined Auntie Hsüeh, "that you are blessed with such good fortune, when you possess such a good heart."

Thereupon, having chatted for what seemed like half a day, Auntie Hsüeh picked up her box of trinkets, took her leave, and departed.

Two days later, she came back and reported that Battalion Commander Chu, who resided inside the city, had a fourteen-year-old daughter, Miss Chu, whom he was prepared to marry off because her mother was dead. Ch'un-mei, however, felt her to be too young and was not interested. Auntie Hsüeh then suggested Ying Po-chüeh's second daughter as a possibility, and reported that she was twenty-one years old. Ch'un-mei rejected this suggestion as well, on the grounds that since Ying Po-chüeh was now dead, she would be in the hands of his elder brother, who would not provide her with anything much in the way of a dowry. She therefore told Auntie Hsüeh to return the cards with the horoscopes of these two candidates.

Several days later, Auntie Hsüeh returned with some artificial flowers in hand and pulled a card with the horoscope of another prospect out of her sleeve. The inscription on the crimson satin surface of the card read: "The eldest daughter of the prosperous dry goods merchant, surnamed Ko, who is nineteen years old, was born in the year of the cock, at midnight on the fifteenth day of the eleventh month, and her personal name is Ts'ui-p'ing."

Auntie Hsüeh then described her, saying, "She is as pretty as a picture, is petite in stature, has a face shaped like a melon seed, possesses a congenial and elegant disposition,¹⁵ is as clever as can be, and her mastery of needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments goes without saying. Her parents are both alive, and her father has the equivalent of ten thousand strings of cash in capital, operates a dry goods store on Main Street, and does business in Su-chou, Hang-chou, and Nanking. It is an incomparably fine family, and the beds and curtains, and the trunks containing her trousseau, are all manufactured in Nanking."

When Ch'un-mei heard this, she said, "If it's as good a match as all that, we might as well agree to it."

She then told Auntie Hsüeh to go ahead and transmit the needed documents, and she promptly set out to do so. Truly:

If you want to seek an alluring beauty

from a brocaded boudoir,

You must rely entirely upon a red leaf to be a good go-between.¹⁶

There is a poem that testifies to this:

The Weaving Maid, positioned at her loom, attaches the fragrant silk;
An affinity between widely divided people suffices to connect them.
In Heaven above, the Herd Boy is matched with the Weaving Maid;
In the human realm, the man of talent weds an alluring damsel.

When Auntie Hsüeh delivered the nuptial documents, and the family of Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's father, the prosperous dry goods merchant, saw that they came from the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, they were happy to accept the proposal and engaged another go-between named Auntie Chang to go with Auntie Hsüeh in order to arrange the match. Ch'un-mei, for her part, made up two parcels of tea leaves, dumplings, and candied fruit and sent off Sun Erh-ning in a sedan chair to deliver these betrothal gifts to the Ko family home and conclude the match by presenting Ko Ts'ui-p'ing with an engagement ring.

Upon her return, she said to Ch'un-mei, "She really appears to be a worthwhile young woman. She has an attractive demeanor, is as lovely as a flower, and her family is of an appropriate status."

Ch'un-mei thereupon selected an auspicious day for the formal betrothal ceremony, and prepared gifts including sixteen platters of preserved fruit, tea, and pastries; two platters of noodles to celebrate the putting up of her hair; two platters of pearls and trinkets; four jugs of wine; two sheep; a fret for her coiffure; a lavish set of gold and silver hair ornaments, pins, and bracelets; two velvet gowns; and clothing for the four seasons; in addition to bolts of cotton fabric; and a betrothal present of twenty taels of silver. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

The yin-yang master selected the eighth day of the sixth month for the wedding ceremony, when the bride would be brought over the threshold.

Before that date, Ch'un-mei asked Auntie Hsüeh, "Is her family going to supply any maidservants as part of her dowry?"

"They will supply beds and curtains as part of her trousseau," said Auntie Hsüeh, "along with gilt lacquer cabinets and so forth, but there will be no maidservants included in the dowry."

"It would be more convenient in that case," said Ch'un-mei, "if we were to purchase a twelve- or thirteen-year-old maidservant to serve in her room, empty the commode, pour bathwater, and so forth."

"I know of two families," said Auntie Hsüeh, "who are offering to sell their girls as maidservants. I'll bring one back with me tomorrow."

The next day, sure enough, she brought a young girl back with her and explained, "She has been working as a maidservant in the household of the merchant Huang the Fourth's son, and this year she is just twelve years old. Huang the Fourth and Li the Third, along with Lai-pao, who was formerly employed in your household, have all been imprisoned for misappropriation of official funds, until such time as they can make reparation. It is now more than a year since they were incarcerated, and they have been forced to dispose of their possessions, and sell off their houses. Li the Third has passed away, and his son, Li Huo, has been incarcerated in his stead. Lai-Pao's son, Seng-pao, has run away and is said to be serving someone as a groom."

"Are you referring to the servant we knew as Lai-pao?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"He is no longer known as Lai-pao," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but has changed his name to T'ang Pao."

"If this girl has been employed as a maidservant in Huang the Fourth's family," said Ch'un-mei, "how much do they want for her?"

"All they are asking for is four and a half taels of silver," said Auntie Hsüeh. "They are anxiously awaiting it in order to help them repay the misappropriated funds."

"Four and a half taels is too much," said Ch'un-mei, "but I am willing to pay three taels and five mace of silver for her."

She then paid over the sum of three taels and five mace worth of "snowflake" government silver, wrote out a contract for her, and changed her name to Chin Ch'ien-erh.

To make a long story short, on the eighth day of the sixth month, Ch'un-mei dressed herself up with a phoenix cap adorned with pearls and trinkets on her head, and a full-sleeved scarlet robe, encircled with a girdle featuring a plaque of green jade inlaid with gold. Riding in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers, and accompanied by drums and lanterns, she set out to fetch the daughter of the Ko family, preside over the bridegroom's ritual presentation of a goose to the bride's family, and bring her over the threshold in marriage. Ch'en Ching-chi rode on a large white horse with ornate silver trim on the saddle and bridle and was accompanied by soldiers who shouted to clear the way. He wore a scholar's cap on his head, a round-collared robe of black velvet, with a pair of white-soled black boots on his feet, and his head was adorned with two floral ornaments of gold. Truly, it was a case of:

The Legal Couple Openly Come Together by Candlelight

Encountering sweet rain after a prolonged draught;
 Meeting an old acquaintance when traveling abroad;
 Enjoying the candlelit night in a nuptial chamber;
 Finding oneself on a list of successful graduates.¹⁷

Each time such things are refurbished they will be as good as new.

When the wedding procession arrived back at the commandant's residence, and the bride descended from her sedan chair, she wore a scarlet gold-flaked bridal veil. Dressed in her wedding finery she accepted a ritual mouthful of rice, before entering the main gate, holding a "precious vase" in her arms. The yin-yang master then conducted her into a decorated hall where she proceeded to pay her respects before the family shrine, after which, she was taken to the nuptial chamber. Ch'un-mei saw to it that the two of them sat down together within the bed curtains, and then she came out again. After the yin-yang master had performed the ceremony of scattering auspicious symbols of fertility upon the nuptial bed, he left upon receiving his gratuity, and the drummers that had been hired for the occasion also went their ways.

After Ch'en Ching-chi had sat within the bed curtains with Ko Ts'ui-p'ing for a while, he mounted a horse and went to his father-in-law's home to thank him for the gift of his daughter. Upon his return he was quite drunk. That evening, being:

A woman of beauty and a man of talent;
They indulged their newlywed passions,
Enjoying the clouds and rain together.

Truly, it is a case of:

When spring touches the apricot and peach trees,
their new buds burst into red flower;
When the breeze plays among the willow fronds,
they are made to bend their green waists.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

To encounter close up such a paragon of feeling and romance;
Is a consummation that: "Without good fortune one cannot enjoy."
Wherever has Lieh-tzu allowed the wind to carry him;
When night after night the beauty of the moon shines in the willow branches.¹⁸

That night, Ch'en Ching-chi and the young lady Ko Ts'ui-p'ing found themselves to be highly compatible. The pair of them were like:

Mandarin ducks beneath the quilt;
Phoenix mates within the curtains.
Like fish sporting in the water,
They enjoyed sharing loving cups.

On the third day after the wedding, in the rear hall of the commandant's headquarters, Ch'un-mei prepared a feast, hung up decorative bunting, hired musicians to provide:

Drum music, pipes, and song, and invited friends and relatives to attend a wedding reception. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

Every day, Ch'un-mei invited the two of them to her quarters so they could share their meals, and they addressed each other as cousins, constantly:

Getting up and sitting down together.

Not a single one of the maidservants, wet nurses, or servants' wives chose to object to this. It so happens that Ch'un-mei had fixed up a suite of three rooms on the western side of the front courtyard to serve as his quarters. Inside, she had provided a curtained bedstead, replastered the walls so that the rooms were as spotless as snow grottoes, and suspended blinds. The library on the outside served as his study and was also furnished with a bed and a couch, tables and mats, and a collection of old books. The letters and calling cards sent and received by the commandant, as well as the documents presented by other bureaucratic offices, all passed through his hands and were either listed in registers, or stamped by him with official seals. The brushes, inkstones, and other appurtenances needed by a writer were all available to him, and the shelves were loaded with books. Ch'un-mei would come out to the library from time to time in order to sit down and talk with him, and they ended up engaging in intercourse with each other on more than one occasion. Truly:

In the morning he attends feasts in Golden Valley,
In the evening he favors beauties in ornate houses.
But do not consider these to be occasions for joy,
Time's flowing light only chases the sunset clouds.¹⁹

CH'EN CHING-CHI OPENS A TAVERN IN LIN-CH'ING; HAN AI-CHIEH ENCOUNTERS A LOVER IN A BORDELLO

If the heart is content even a thatched cottage seems ample;
If one's feelings are calm even vegetable roots smell sweet.
The fewer worldly desires one has the more beneficial it is;

When human relations are tepid they are more likely to last.¹
If one depends on others in order to attain one's ambitions;

In trying to avoid trouble one will deal with local tyrants.²
One may achieve an exalted level of distinction for the day;
But it will end with inevitable extinction in years to come.

THE STORY GOES that, one day, Commandant Chou Hsiu, and the prefect of Chi-nan prefecture Chang Shu-yeh, in command of their infantry and cavalry, completed a successful campaign against the outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh; and the thirty-six leaders of the band, under the command of their chieftain Sung Chiang, along with their more than ten thousand followers, agreed to accept the offer of an imperial amnesty, so that peace was restored in the affected territory. When this was reported to the throne, the Emperor was greatly pleased and promoted Chang Shu-yeh to the positions of censor-in-chief and pacification commissioner of Shantung, and Commandant Chou Hsiu to the post of commander-general of Chi-nan, with the responsibility for patrolling the waterways and hunting down the bandits in his jurisdiction. The Emperor also decreed that the meritorious officers who had participated in the campaign should all be promoted one grade. Since Ch'en Ching-chi's name had been listed in the roster, he was raised to the rank of counselor, with a salary of two piculs of rice per month, and the right to distinguish himself by wearing an official cap and girdle.³

During the middle decade of the tenth month, Commandant Chou Hsiu, with his imperial commission in hand, led the infantry and cavalry under his command on their way home and sent a messenger ahead to report the situation to Ch'un-mei and let the household know about it. Ch'un-mei was as pleased as could be and sent Ch'en Ching-chi, along with Chang Sheng and Li An, to go outside the city to welcome him. A feast was prepared in the reception hall of their residence, to celebrate his official promotion, and the number of his fellow officials and others who came to offer congratulations and proffer gifts was so great they could hardly be counted. When the commandant alighted from his horse and came back to the rear hall, Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang were there to receive him and pay their respects. Ch'en Ching-chi divested himself of his commoner's costume, put on a scarlet round-collared gown, an official cap, black boots, and a girdle with a rhinoceros horn plaque, and came out with his new wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing. When the two of them had paid their respects to him, and the commandant saw that she was a good-looking girl, he rewarded her with a set of clothing and ten taels of silver, which she could use to make head ornaments for herself. But no more of this.

That evening, as Ch'un-mei and the commandant enjoyed drinking wine together in their room, they could not avoid bringing up some mundane household matters, and Ch'un-mei said, "The arrangements for my cousin's marriage cost a good deal."

"Ai-ya," responded the commandant. "Your only relative is this cousin, who has sought refuge with you. If he were to be without a wife, it would not bode well for his future prospects. Even though it has cost us a few taels of silver, it has not been spent on some unrelated person."

"And now you have secured this prospect of advancement for him," remarked Ch'un-mei. "It is more than enough to distinguish him."

"The Emperor's edict has already come down," the commandant went on to say, "so that, any day now, I will have to go to Chi-nan prefecture to assume my office. I will leave you behind to look after the household, and you should provide your cousin with some capital so he can hire a manager, and open a business of some kind. Every third or fifth day, he can go to inspect the books, and he ought to be able to make enough in the way of profit this way to support himself."

"What you propose makes sense," responded Ch'un-mei.

That evening, the two of them enjoyed each other as husband and wife, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

The commandant remained at home for another ten days or so, but during the first decade of the eleventh month, he proceeded to get his baggage together and set out to assume his office in Chi-nan prefecture; taking Chang Sheng and Li An with him, and leaving his servants Chou Jen and Chou I to look after the household. He was seen off by Ch'en Ching-chi, who accompanied him as far as the Temple of Eternal Felicity south of the city before returning home.

One day, Ch'un-mei consulted with Ch'en Ching-chi and said, "The commandant suggested, thus and so, that you should open a business of some kind in the canal port of Lin-ch'ing, and hire a manager to run it for you, in the hope of making enough profit to help support the household."

On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi was as pleased as could be. One day, while he was walking along the street in the process of looking for a manager, it was one of those occasions when:

Something was destined to happen.

Unexpectedly, he ran into his old friend Lu the Second, or Lu Ping-i, who bowed to him and said, "Brother, why is it that I haven't seen you for such a long time?"

Ch'en Ching-chi responded by telling him about the death of his wife and continued, "That rascal Yang Kuang-yen made off with half a boatload of my goods, leaving me:

As poor as though I had been utterly cleaned out;

but I am all right again now. Luckily, my female cousin married into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and they arranged another marriage for me. I have subsequently been raised to the rank of counselor and granted the right to distinguish myself by wearing an official cap and girdle. Right now, I am engaged in looking for a manager to run a business for me. But I haven't been able to find one anywhere."

"That rascal Yang Kuang-yen," said Lu Ping-i, "after stealing your merchandise, hired a manager surnamed Hsieh and opened a large tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, known as the Hsieh Family Tavern. With the profits he makes he acts as a money-lender, making loans to the unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls who gather there from the four quarters in the effort to make a living, and collects substantial sums in the way of interest from them. Every day, he wears fine clothing, eats good meat, and rides around on a donkey. Every three or five days, he goes down to the dock to look over the accounts and collect his profits, while utterly ignoring his former friends. His younger brother, Yang Erh-feng, operates a gambling den in his home and engages in cock-fighting and the raising of dogs. Nobody dares to cross him."

"I ran into him last year," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and he not only turned against me without any feeling but started to give me a beating, from which I was lucky enough to be rescued by a friend. My hatred for him has infused the marrow of my bones."

He then pulled Lu the Second into a tavern by the side of the road, where they went upstairs to have a drink together.

During their discussion, he asked, "How am I to deal with him in order to vent this anger of mine?"

Lu Ping-i responded with the words, "As the saying goes:

He whose hatred is petty is no gentleman;

He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.

If we were to attempt to reason with him, since he is the sort of person who:

Before seeing his own coffin will not shed tears of repentance,

he is certain not to concede anything. But I have an alternative plan to propose. Brother, there is no need for you to engage in any other business activity. Simply write out a legal accusation against him and submit it to your commandant's yamen. If you are able to recover your stolen goods and silver, you should be able to take over this tavern of his, invest some additional capital in it, and form a partnership with the manager Hsieh the Third. I could then cooperate with Hsieh the Third in operating the business on the dock, and all you would have to do is visit the premises every three or five days to inspect the accounts. I am absolutely sure that in a single month you should be able to realize a profit of more than a hundred taels of silver. That would be preferable to trying to start any other kind of business."

Gentle reader take note: This suggestion that Lu Ping-i made at the time would have the result of causing several people to:

Die an untimely death.⁴

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:

The manner of his death would be altogether too tragic;

The manner of his demise would be entirely too grievous.⁵

The nature of his death was as terrible as that of Li Ts'un-hsiao of the Five Dynasties, and that of P'eng Yüeh of the Han Dynasty.⁶ Truly:

Though it may not be determined by fate;

It owes nothing at all to one's efforts.

When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this proposal, he promptly bowed to Lu Ping-i and said, "Worthy Brother, what you say makes sense. As soon as I get home, I'll take it up with my cousin and her husband. If this undertaking is successful, I'll put you and Hsieh the Third in charge of the enterprise."

Thereupon, when the two of them had finished their wine and gone downstairs to pay the bill, Ch'en Ching-chi said to Lu the Second, "Brother, be sure to keep this to yourself. If it should work out, I'll come to thank you for it."

"I understand," responded Lu the Second, and the two of them then went their separate ways.

When Ch'en Ching-chi had explained the proposal in detail to Ch'un-mei, he went on to say, "But His Honor is not here right now, so what are we to do?"

The senior servant Chou Chung happened to be standing by their side and said, "That's no problem. If Uncle will write out an accusation, indicating how much money and merchandise he lost, and include one of His Honor's calling cards with it, I will deliver it to the two officials at the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. When this Yang Kuang-yen is brought before the bench and subjected to a beating in the squeezers, there is no reason to fear that the rascal will not cough up the money.”

Ch'en Ching-chi was delighted by this proposal and proceeded at once to write out an accusation, seal it up in an envelope with one of the commandant's calling cards, and send the senior servant Chou Chung to take it to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.

The two officials were sitting on the bench at the time, in the process of conducting a hearing, when the gatekeeper came in and reported, “His Honor Chou Hsiu, the commandant of the Regional Military Command, has sent someone to deliver a document to you.”

The officials Ho Yung-shou and Chang Mao-te called for Chou Chung to come before them and inquired about His Honor Chou Hsiu's assumption of the office to which he had recently been promoted. After listening to his explanation, upon opening the envelope and examining the accusation and the calling card, they felt inclined to do Chou Hsiu a favor.

Agreeing forthwith to accept the case, they sent detectives and constables to the port of Lin-ch'ing to arrest Yang Kuang-yen and gave return cards to Chou Chung, saying, “When you get home, convey our regards to His Honor and his wife, and tell them that when we succeed in recovering the missing money, they can send someone here to collect it.”

Chou Chung took the return cards back to the commandant's yamen and told Ch'un-mei, “They agreed forthwith to send people to arrest him and said that as soon as they succeed in recovering the money, you can send someone to collect it.”

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the two accordion-bound cards read, “Respectfully presented by your pupils Ho Yung-shou and Chang Mao-te,” he was utterly delighted.

In less than two days time, the detectives, inspectors, and constables from the Provincial Surveillance Commission who had been dispatched to the port of Lin-ch'ing succeeded in arresting Yang Kuang-yen and his younger brother Yang Erh-feng and bringing them back to the yamen. The two officials there interrogated them on the basis of Ch'en Ching-chi's accusation and, upon subjecting them to a beating in the squeezers and several days of incarceration, succeeded in recovering the sum of 350 taels of silver, and a hundred bolts of porous ramie fabric. In addition, the tableware from the tavern was estimated to be worth 50 taels of silver. In Ch'en Ching-chi's accusation he claimed to be due a reparation of 900 taels of silver, so they were still short 350 taels. They sold their home for 50 taels of silver, but their property was then completely exhausted. Ch'en Ching-chi was thus allowed the right to take over his stake in the Hsieh Family Tavern, and he entered into a partnership with the owner Fatty Hsieh, or Hsieh the Third. Ch'un-mei also provided the sum of 500 taels of silver, so that he had a capital of a thousand taels of silver, and he appointed Lu Ping-i to be his manager. He also had the tavern entirely redecorated, repainting and varnishing it, and decorating it with pictures, so that:

The balustrades were sparkling,
The rafters appeared brand new,
The tables looked shiny bright,
The wine and food well ordered.

On the day that it reopened:

Drums and music resounded to the heavens,
Pipes and flutes were blown harmoniously;

attracting the patronage of itinerant merchants and singing girls from the four quarters. Ch'en Ching-chi celebrated the occasion by sacrificing a pig and burning paper money. As the sayings go:

If you unplug the jug, it will make three people drunk;
If you uncork the flagon, the aroma will spread far off.⁷
Spirits and immortals have deposited their jade girdles;
Ministers and councilors have pawned their golden sables.⁸

When Ch'en Ching-chi climbed to the top of the large tavern, he found himself surrounded by translucent latticed windows that could be pushed open, and balustrades embellished with green varnish.

In all four directions, clouded peaks rise in piles;⁹
Above and below, the sky and the water appear to meet.¹⁰
To the east, dimly appear the spiraling blue peaks of Mount T'ai;
To the west, impenetrable dark mists shroud
the imperial capital;
To the north, the red structures of wealthy homes rise in layers;
To the south, the Huai River's vast extent is like a strip of silk.

Above and below, the tavern had more than a hundred compartments.

Room after room houses the dancing
skirts of singing girls; Floor after floor reverberates with lively pipes and strings.¹¹

Words are inadequate to describe the scene:

The viands are piled as high as hills;
The wine flows as copiously as waves.

Truly, it is a case of:

The dancing continued till the moon in the pavilion
amid the willows hung low;
The singing went on until the breeze underneath the peach-blossom fans expired.¹²

It was the middle of the first month when Ch'en Ching-chi reopened the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock in Lin-ch'ing, and he cleared as much as thirty-five taels of silver per day. It was managed jointly by Fatty Hsieh and Lu Ping-i, who served together behind the counter. Every three or five days, Ch'en Ching-chi would ride a horse, accompanied by his servant Little Chiang, and go to the port of Lin-ch'ing to look over the accounts. Whenever he came, the two managers Lu Ping-i and Fatty Hsieh would prepare a clean room on an upper story of the building that was provided with a curtained bedstead, furnished with tables and chairs, and replastered so that it was as spotless as a snow grotto. They would prepare a feast for him there, and assign four good-looking powdered faces to keep him company. The "cribber" Ch'en the Third would look after seeing that he was supplied with wine.

One day, on the third day of the third month, when spring was at its most beautiful, and the landscape was suffused with floral fragrance:

With their green hues, the locusts and willows populate the banks;
With their rich reds, the apricots and peaches shine like brocade.

Ch'en Ching-chi, on an upper floor of the tavern, leaned over the green balustrade and contemplated the scene below, which was alive with activity. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Tossed by the wind, enshrouded in mist,
the brocade banner flutters;
During this era of great peace the days
are beginning to grow longer.
Wine is capable of enhancing the courage of even a stouthearted hero;
And is equally effective at alleviating
the depression of a beauty.
Deep within the three-foot long branches
on the willow-lined bank;
The tavern's signpost rises at an angle
beside the apricot trees.
The stalwart who has yet to accomplish
his lifelong ambition;
Is prone to sing haughtily as he enters the Land of Drunkenness.¹³

One day,¹⁴ Ch'en Ching-chi happened to look out the rear window of his chamber on an upper floor of the tavern that overlooked the canal and noticed that there were two barges moored there, loaded with trunks, tables, benches, and other household effects, which four or five workers were moving into an empty suite on the ground floor. There were also two women on the barges, one of whom was middle-aged and tall of stature, with a rosewood complexion; while the other was a young woman, given to:

Putting on rouge and applying powder, who had an attractive pale complexion and was about twenty years old. The two of them also proceeded to go into the empty suite below.

Ch'en Ching-chi approached Manager Hsieh and demanded to know, "Who are those people who, without asking our permission, are taking it upon themselves to move into our building?"

Ch'en Ching-chi Meets an Old Acquaintance in Lin-ch'ing

"They are two women who have come from the Eastern Capital," explained Manager Hsieh. "Having failed to locate their relatives, and being unable to locate a dwelling on such short notice, they asked our neighbor Old Man Fan if they could stay here for two or three days before moving on. I was planning to report this to you sir, but you have asked me about it before I was able to do so."

Ch'en Ching-chi was about to give vent to his anger when he saw the young woman approach him respectfully with straightened skirts and bow deeply, saying, "Pray abate your wrath, sir. Your manager is not at fault. It was we who took the liberty:

For lack of an alternative,¹⁵ of moving in before coming to ask your permission.

I can only hope that you will forgive us.
If you will permit us to remain here for three to five days, we will respectfully reimburse you upon moving out."

When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the young woman had a way with words, he proceeded to look her over from top to toe, while the woman glanced back at him with her pair of starry eyes.

Their mutual feelings were visible in their four eyes;

They found they were unable to control their emotions.

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but

In his heart he thought to himself,
“I must have met her somewhere before, she looks so familiar.”
The middle-aged woman who was tall of stature looked hard at Ch'en Ching-chi and said, “Sir, are you not Son-in-law Ch'en from the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing?”

Ch'en Ching-chi was startled by this and said, “How were you able to recognize me?”
“I will not deceive you,” the woman replied. “I am the wife of his former manager Han Tao-kuo, and this girl is my daughter Ai-chieh.”

“The two of you were residing in the Eastern Capital,” said Ch'en Ching-chi, “so how have you happened to turn up here? And where is your husband?”

“He is on one of the barges, looking after our belongings,” the woman replied.

Ch'en Ching-chi immediately responded by ordering a waiter to go invite him into his presence. Before long, Han Tao-kuo came in and greeted him with a bow. His hair and whiskers had already begun to turn gray.

He then went on to explain the recent events in the capital, saying, “At court, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, Defender-in-chief T'ung Kuan, Minister of the Right Li Pang-yen, Defender-in-chief Chu Mien, Defender-in-chief Kao Ch'iu, and Eunuch Director Li Yen, all six of them, have been impeached in a memorial to the throne by the national university student Ch'en Tung.¹⁶ His allegations have subsequently been supported by numerous other memorials from the supervising secretaries and censors. As a result, an imperial edict has come down, ordering them to be remanded to the Three Judicial Offices for interrogation, and they have been sentenced to perpetual military servitude in areas suffering from poisonous miasmas.¹⁷ The grand preceptor's son, Minister of Rites Ts'ai Yu, has been executed, and his property has been confiscated by the state. The three of us were forced to flee for our lives and made our way to my younger brother Han the Second's place in Ch'ing-ho district, only to find that his house has been sold, and that he has fled to who knows where. The three of us, consequently, hired barges and traveled here on the canal, but we scarcely anticipated that we would run into you here.

Such good fortune would suffice for three lives.”

He then went on to ask, “Son-in-law, are you still a member of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing's household?”

Ch'en Ching-chi explained the preceding events, saying, “I am no longer a member of his household but am serving as a counselor in the household of my cousin's husband Commandant Chou Hsiu and have been granted the right to distinguish myself by wearing an official cap and girdle. At present, I am supporting myself by operating this tavern on the dock with the help of two managers. Since you have run into me, there is no reason for you to move out. It will not be a problem if you choose to reside here for a while. Please feel free to do as you like.”

The woman and Han Tao-kuo both kowtowed to him in gratitude and, after finishing their conversation, went back to moving their belongings off the barges.

As he looked on, Ch'en Ching-chi was moved to tell his servant Little Chiang and the “cribber” Ch'en the Third to help them move some of their things, at which Wang Liu-erh said, “There is no need, Son-in-law, for you to go to such trouble on our behalf.”

They were both pleased at this exchange, and Ch'en Ching-chi went on to say, “After all, you and I were originally members of the same household. What need is there to quibble about it?”

When Ch'en Ching-chi noticed that:

The light was beginning to wane,
and that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon, he decided to go home and told his managers to take care of supplying their new tenants with boxes of tea and goodies in the morning. He then mounted his horse and set out for home, accompanied by his servant. All night long:

His every thought and every consideration,¹⁸ was concentrated on Han Ai-chieh, whom he could not put out of his mind.

After spending a day at home, on the following day, he got up early, dressed himself appropriately, and returned to the tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing, accompanied by his servant Little Chiang, where he proceeded to look on for a while as his managers conducted their business.

Han Tao-kuo happened to send a servant over to invite him to come to their quarters for a serving of tea. Ch'en Ching-chi had been hoping for a chance to see Han Ai-chieh again, so when the servant arrived with his invitation, he promptly got up and went inside.

Lo and behold, Han Ai-chieh came out to meet him and greeted him with:

Such a smile you could have plucked it off her face;
bowing to him, and saying, “Sir, please come in and take a seat.”

Ch'en Ching-chi went into the chamber and sat down, while Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh came out to keep him company. It did not take them long to finish a serving of tea, as they chatted back and forth about their memories of the past. While this was going on, Ch'en Ching-chi gazed continually at Han Ai-chieh, while Ai-chieh's pair of eyes, like autumn ripples, were fixed infatuatedly on Ch'en Ching-chi. It was clear that they both had the same idea in mind. There is a poem that testifies to this:

Her narrow and upturned shoe-tips are formed of florid silk;
Her fragrant flesh and creamy breasts resemble sculpted jade.
Her lovely person is hardly sustained by her lissome waist;

After a little while, Han Tao-kuo went outside, and Han Ai-chieh turned to Ch'en Ching-chi and asked, "Sir, how old are you?"

"I'm twenty-five," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "May I make bold to ask, sister, how old are you?"

Han Ai-chieh smiled at this, and said, "Sir:

We must have been fated to meet.²⁰

I, too, am twenty-five years old. We met each other as members of His Honor's household in the past, and now we have been fortunate enough to meet again. Truly:

Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li."

When Wang Liu-erh observed that the conversation between them had started to warm up, she sensed what was going on and made an excuse to go out herself, leaving the two of them sitting together face to face. Han Ai-chieh then resorted to the use of suggestive language in the endeavor to entice Ch'en Ching-chi. Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been familiar with such matters since his youth, could not fail to understand her intentions and started to get up and leave.

This Han Ai-chieh had colluded with her mother in plying this trade during their journey from the Eastern Capital; and while she had resided in the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, she had served as majordomo Chai Ch'ien's concubine. When it came to poetry, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies, as well as the works of the hundred schools, she was acquainted with them all, and there was little she was not familiar with.

Upon seeing Ch'en Ching-chi get up and prepare to go out, and observing that they were alone, she went up close to him and sat down, affecting the:

Coquetry and petulance of a spoiled child, as she said, "Sir, let me take a look at that gold pin in your hair."

Ch'en Ching-chi was about to pull it out for her, when Han Ai-chieh grasped the knot of hair on top of his head with her hand and pulled out the pin, whereupon she stood up and said, "Why don't the two of us go upstairs and have a word together?"

As she spoke, on the one hand, and walked out, on the other, Ch'en Ching-chi felt compelled to follow her up the stairs. Truly:

Though you may be as devious as any demon,
You'll drink the water she's washed her feet in.

Ch'en Ching-chi followed her upstairs and then said, "Sister, what is it you want to say?"

Han Ai-chieh responded by saying, "You and I have:

A predestined affinity for each other.²¹

There is no need for you to pretend otherwise.

Let us share our fervor on pillow and mat,²² Enjoying the pleasures of connubial bliss."

"I fear we may be discovered by the people here," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "That would never do."

Han Ai-chieh, displaying a variety of voluptuous airs, hugged Ch'en Ching-chi around the waist and proceeded to pull down his trousers with her dainty jade-white hands. Both of them felt that:

Their lascivious excitement burned like fire,
And it proved utterly impossible to suppress.²³

Han Ai-chieh felt driven to take off her clothes and recline face-up on the bed, where they proceeded to engage in intercourse with each other. Truly:

With lustful daring as big as the sky,
what is there to fear?
Amid mandarin duck curtains the clouds and rain:
a lifetime of passion.

In the course of their engagement, Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "What number are you known by?"

"I was born on the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month," responded Han Ai-chieh, "so I am known as Han the Fifth, but my personal name is Ai-chieh."

In no time at all, after:

The clouds dispersed and the rain evaporated, they sat down next to each other, and Han Ai-chieh proceeded to say to Ch'en Ching-chi, "Ever since the time that the three of us fled from the Eastern Capital but were unable to locate our relatives, we have been short of living expenses. If you have the silver on hand, I beg you to lend five taels to my father. I will take the responsibility to repay you with interest. Pray don't refuse this request."

Han Ai-chieh Entertains Her Lover in an Ornate Bordello

Ch'en Ching-chi agreed to her request, saying, "That's no problem. You have but to open your mouth, and I will weigh out five taels of silver for you."

When Han Ai-chieh saw that he had agreed, she returned his gold pin to him, and the two of them then went on to sit together for what seemed like half a day.

Fearing that they might be subject to gossip, they drank a serving of tea, and Han Ai-chieh invited him to have lunch with her, but Ch'en Ching-chi said, "I've got something to do elsewhere, so I won't eat anything, but I'll send you the money you asked for in a little while."

Han Ai-chieh went on to say, "This afternoon, I will prepare a meager cup of watery wine to share with you. Pray don't refuse my invitation, sir, but come back to see me, no matter what."

When Ch'en Ching-chi had eaten lunch in the tavern's office, he took a casual stroll in the street and happened to run into his former fellow disciple from the Yen-kung Temple, Chin Tsung-ming, whom he greeted with a bow and regaled with the story of his subsequent adventures.

"Worthy brother," responded Chin Tsung-ming, "I did not know that you had been acknowledged as a relative by the household of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu, or that you had opened a thriving business in that tavern.

I have been remiss in not coming to pay my respects.²⁴

Tomorrow, I will send a junior disciple to deliver a gift of tea to you. Please come to the temple for a visit when you have the time to do so."

Upon finishing their conversation, Chin Tsung-ming went back to the temple.

When Ch'en Ching-chi returned to the tavern, Manager Lu Ping-i reported to him, "That fellow named Han who is residing here has invited you for a drink, but I didn't know where to find you."

By a lucky coincidence, Han Tao-kuo's servant happened to come back at this point and said, "You are invited, sir, and your two managers are invited as well to keep you company. There are no other guests."

Ch'en Ching-chi, along with his two managers, then proceeded to go into their room, where a repast had already been neatly laid out, consisting of fish, pork, vegetables, fruits, and the like. Ch'en Ching-chi sat down in the place of honor, while Han Tao-kuo assumed the position of host, and Lu Ping-i and Fatty Hsieh were seated to either side. Wang Liu-erh and Han Ai-chieh sat down respectfully on the sidelines, while their servant came back and forth to serve the wine and refreshments.

After drinking a few cups of wine, the two managers, sensing what was afoot, said, "Sir, pray continue to drink at your leisure. The two of us will go back and man the counter."

So saying, they got up and left.

Ch'en Ching-chi was not accustomed to drinking heavily, but when he saw that the managers had left, he relaxed and downed another few cups of wine with the three members of the Han family, until he began to feel somewhat intoxicated.

Han Ai-chieh then ventured to say to him, "Sir, today there is no need for you to go home."

"It is already too late for me to return home by now," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "I might as well go home tomorrow."

When Wang Liu-erh and Han Tao-kuo had drunk with them for a while, they went downstairs, and Ch'en Ching-chi then pulled five taels of silver out of his sleeve and presented it to Han Ai-chieh, who went down and turned it over to Wang Liu-erh, before coming back upstairs. What with:

The sharing of glasses and passing of cups,

Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,

they then continued drinking together until the evening fell, at which point Han Ai-chieh:

Divested herself of her fancy attire,²⁵ and invited Ch'en Ching-chi to spend the night with her in her upstairs room. On this occasion, what with:

Oaths by the pillowside to be faithful as the hills,

Promises under the quilts to be as true as the seas;

Giving forth oriole's notes and swallow's cries,

They enjoyed to the full their mutual affection;²⁶

But it is impossible to evoke all that they did.²⁷

When Han Ai-chieh had gone to the Eastern Capital, where she resided in the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching and waited upon his elderly wife, she had learned to play musical instruments and sing, and also acquired the ability to read and write. Upon hearing about this, Ch'en Ching-chi:

Felt unable to constrain his pleasure,²⁸ and found himself as attracted to her, as he had been to P'an Chin-lien. Consequently, the two of them proceeded to:

Frolic together the whole evening,²⁹

And sleep together all night long.

As a result, they could not avoid sleeping until late the next day and did not get up until lunchtime, when Wang Liu-erh made a pick-me-up for them, containing eggs and pork meatballs, which the two of them consumed, along with several cups of warmed wine.

In a little while, one of his managers came in and invited Ch'en Ching-chi to join them for lunch, whereupon he put on his hairnet, performed his ablutions, got dressed, and went out to eat with them. When he had finished his meal, he came back to take leave of Han Ai-chieh before heading back home, but she did not want to let him go and made a show of shedding tears.

Ch'en Ching-chi responded by saying, "After I get home, I'll come to see you every three or five days. There's no reason for you to get upset."

When he had finished speaking, he mounted his horse and headed back to the city of Ch'ing-ho, accompanied by his servant.

Along the way, he said to Little Chiang, "When we get home you must not say anything about the Han family."

"I understand," responded Little Chiang. "There is no need for you to admonish me."

Upon arriving back at the commandant's residence, Ch'en Ching-chi claimed that business was so brisk at the tavern that by the time he had finished reckoning up the accounts it was too late to come home, so he had stayed overnight. He then handed over to Ch'un-mei the thirty-some taels of silver in the form of profits that had been realized since his last trip before going back to his own quarters.

When he arrived there, he was taken to task by Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who said, "What reason did you have for staying away overnight, unless you were out exploring:

The willow paths and flower lanes,³⁰ of the licensed quarter? You left me at home, all by myself in an empty room, without a thought for returning home."

Thereafter, she insisted on keeping Ch'en Ching-chi at home for seven or eight days in a row, without letting him return to the dock at Lin-ch'ing. For her part, Han Ai-chieh noticed that he did not return for some time but merely sent Little Chiang to collect the profits from the managers, who wrapped up the silver for him to take home.

As a consequence, Han Tao-kuo felt obliged to have his wife, Wang Liu-erh, entice familiar customers or traveling merchants into their quarters to drink tea or wine. For some time, Han Tao-kuo had enjoyed the convenience of being dependent upon his wife for his livelihood. Moreover, though Wang Liu-erh was forty-five or forty-six years old, and could be said to be middle-aged, she still retained her charm. And now they were lucky enough to have this daughter, who was prepared to take her place, so that the business that was the source of their livelihood would not be interrupted, and they could continue to practice it in the open.

It so happens that when people without any official position, or other source of livelihood, depended on their wives for their support, the latter were known as clandestine harlots, or what are now known as unlicensed prostitutes.

At this time, when Ch'en Ching-chi failed to show up, the wine steward Ch'en the Third arranged for the silk merchant Magnate Ho to patronize Han Ai-chieh. This Magnate Ho, who was about fifty years old and had a thousand taels worth of silk and other piece goods at his disposal, was quite willing to patronize her, but Han Ai-chieh, who was still infatuated with Ch'en Ching-chi, claimed that she was feeling out of sorts and refused:

On three times and five occasions,³¹ to come downstairs, which Han Tao-kuo found extremely annoying. But when Magnate Ho observed that Wang Liu-erh was tall of stature, with a rosewood complexion; had a face shaped like a melon seed:

Painted her eyebrows and dressed her hair,³²
so that she displayed long spit curls; possessed a seductive pair of starry eyes:

The glint in which suggested intoxication; and that her lips were daubed bright red, he surmised that she must be a past master at amorous liaisons; offered a tael of silver for the privilege of sharing a drink in her quarters; and ended up spending the night with her. Han Tao-kuo kept out of the way by sleeping in an outer chamber, while his daughter, Han Ai-chieh, on seeing that her mother was entertaining a customer, remained on the upper floor, without coming down.

From this time on, Magnate Ho was rendered so happy by Wang Liu-erh that the two of them were:

As hot for each other as burning charcoal; and he did not let more than two or three days go by without coming to spend the night with her. Han Tao-kuo, for his part, was thus able to pocket no small amount of his money.

When Han Ai-chieh saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had not come back to see her for more than ten days, she longed for him so that:

Each day was like three months of autumn;
Each night seemed like half a summer.
She couldn't help feeling affected by:
The eye alongside the wood, and
The heart beneath the field.³³

She therefore sent their servant to the commandant's residence in the city to find out what was going on.

Upon encountering Ch'en Ching-chi's servant Little Chiang, he confidentially inquired, "Why has your master not gone to see her?"

"For the last few days," responded Little Chiang, "he has been feeling out of sorts and has not ventured outside."

When the servant returned and told Han Ai-chieh what he had heard, she consulted with Wang Liu-erh about it and then purchased a set of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two fresh fish, and a box of cookies; after which, in her upstairs room, she:

Ground her ink and picked up her brush, Spreading out some flowered stationery,³⁴ and wrote out a note, which she entrusted to the servant to deliver to Ch'en Ching-chi.

She then placed the presents in boxes, turned them over to the servant to carry, and enjoined him, saying, "When you enter the city and see Master Ch'en, you must hand these things over to him personally, and ask him for an answering note."

The servant proceeded to tuck the note into his sleeve and take charge of the gifts, but of the events of his trip there is nothing to tell. Upon entering the city, he went up to the front of the commandant's yamen and sat down on the stone stylobate.

Who should appear at this juncture but the servant Little Chiang, who happened to come outside, and on seeing him asked, "What have you come again for?"

The Han family servant greeted him with a bow and then pulled him to an out-of-the-way spot, saying, "I've come to deliver some gifts to your master and have something to say to him. I'll wait for him here, if you will be good enough to let him know that I'm here."

Little Chiang promptly turned around and went inside, and it was not long before Ch'en Ching-chi swaggered into sight. It was the fifth month at the time, and the weather was swelteringly hot. Ch'en Ching-chi was dressed in an outfit of thin silk, wore a tile-ridged hat, held in place with a gold pin, on his head, while his feet were clad in sandals and white socks.

The Han family servant hastily bowed to him, saying, "Master, are you feeling somewhat better? Han Ai-chieh has commissioned me to deliver a note and some presents to you."

Ch'en Ching-chi accepted the note and said, "Is Han Ai-chieh well?"

"On observing that you have not visited her for so long," he replied, "she is suffering from heartache. She wishes to send you her regards and would like to know when you might come to see her again.”

Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to open up the note and saw that it read as follows:

RESPECTFULLY INDITED WITH STRAIGHTENED SKIRTS TO HER LOVER MASTER CH'EN BY HIS HUMBLE CONCUBINE HAN AI-CHIEH.

Ever since parting from your distinguished countenance,³⁵ my heartfelt admiration for you³⁶ has not abated even slightly,³⁷ but has remained suspended and unforgotten in my heart. Since you promised to return, I have been leaning on the door gazing fixedly into the distance³⁸ but have failed to see you deigning to visit my humble abode. The other day, I sent a servant to ask after you, but he returned without having seen you,³⁹ although he heard that you were suffering from some ailment. This has filled my breast with such regret that I remain depressed whether sitting or lying down. Alas, I am not able to sprout a pair of wings so that I might fly to your side. Since you possess a captivating wife to love you at home, you cannot be expected to think of me but have spit me out like the seed of a fruit. I am sending you some boxes of savory foods as a meager expression of my sincere concern for you, and I hope that you will accept them with a smile.⁴⁰ I trust my sentiments will be apparent as I am unable to express myself more fully.⁴¹

In addition I am providing a brocade perfume sachet embroidered with mandarin ducks, and containing a lock of my black hair,⁴² as a paltry expression of my heartfelt feelings.

The twentieth day of the middle month of summer.

Your humble concubine Han Ai-chieh salutes you.

When Ch'en Ching-chi had read the note, he looked over the perfume sachet and found that it contained a lock of black hair and was embroidered with the motif of two mandarin ducks, and eight characters that read:

Admiringly tendered to my lover,

I'll follow you wherever you go.

He then folded it up as before and concealed it in his sleeve.

There was a wine shop next door to the commandant's yamen, and Ch'en Ching-chi told Little Chiang, "Take the Han family servant into the wine shop to have a drink of wine while he waits for me to write an answering note."

He then went on to tell Little Chiang, "Take these presents into my room, and if the mistress asks anything about them, just say that they were sent to me by Manager Hsieh from our tavern in Lin-ch'ing."

Little Chiang did not dare to be remiss and proceeded to take the four boxes of gifts inside. Ch'en Ching-chi then went into the library and secretly composed an answering note; after which, he wrapped up five taels of silver and, going out to the wine shop, asked the Han family servant if he had enjoyed a drink or not.

"Thank you for the fine wine, sir," the servant responded. "I can't drink any more and am ready to be on my way."

Ch'en Ching-chi gave the silver and the answering note to the servant and said, "When you get home, convey my respects to Han Ai-chieh. These five taels of silver are meant as a contribution toward her living expenses. I will come to see her in the next two or three days."

The Han family servant then went downstairs, and Ch'en Ching-chi escorted him out the door of the wine shop and saw him off.

When Ch'en Ching-chi went into his living quarters, Ko Ts'ui-p'ing asked him, "Who was it who sent these gifts?"

"It was Fatty Hsieh, the manager of the tavern," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "He had heard that I was not feeling well and sent these gifts as an expression of his concern."

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing believed his explanation. The two of them then, after consulting with each other, sent the maidservant Chin Ch'ien-erh to take a platter with one of the roast ducks, one of the fresh fish, and half a set of the pig's trotters back to the rear compound for Ch'un-mei to eat. She told her that they had been sent by one of the managers of the tavern, and she did not raise any questions about it. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.

To resume our story, when the Han family servant reached the dock at Lin-ch'ing it was already late in the day, and on entering the door, he handed the silver and the answering note to Han Ai-chieh. On opening the note and perusing it by lamplight, she saw that it read as follows:

RESPECTFULLY ADDRESSED IN REPLY TO THE DRESSING TABLE OF HIS INAMORATA HAN AI-CHIEH.

I am much obliged to you for the generosity you displayed toward me at our previous meeting. The sentiments inspired by our love making, and the affection you displayed on pillow and mat, have not been forgotten. I have been intending to hasten to our expected reunion, but a temporary indisposition has forced me to disappoint your expectations. You have also sent someone to ask after me, and present me with these mouth-watering delicacies, for which my gratitude is impossible to contain. In the next two or three days I should be able to thank you in person. I am also sending you five taels of silver, and a silk handkerchief, as a meager expression of my regard, which I sincerely hope you will accept, and deign to appreciate.

Signed: Respectfully presented by Ch'en Ching-chi

When Han Ai-chieh had read the note, she saw that a poetic quatrain had been inscribed on the handkerchief, that read as follows:

The handkerchief of Wu silk is inscribed
with a palindrome;
From a flourish of my writing brush the ink is still fresh.
I have dedicated it to my affectionate
love Han Ai-chieh;
That we may enjoy the century-long love
of mating phoenixes.⁴³

When she had finished reading it, Han Ai-chieh handed over the silver to Wang Liu-erh, and mother and daughter gave vent to:

A thousand or ten thousand signs of joy, in anticipation of Ch'en Ching-chi's return. But no more of this.

Truly:

When a favored friend arrives, one's feelings
can never be satiated;
When a real confidant shows up, conversation
is mutually agreeable.

There is a poem that testifies to this:

Beneath the green gauze window ⁴⁴ I opened the seal of your letter;
The paper, with its cloud-soaring geese,
is redolent with perfume.
I know the flourishes of your brush are done with your jade hand;
But your loving thoughts are seen only in what is left unsaid. ⁴⁵

If you want to know the outcome of these events,
Pray consult the story related in the following chapter.

LIU THE SECOND DRUNKENLY CURSES WANG LIU-ERH; CHANG SHENG WRATHFULLY KILLS CH'EN CHING-CHI

Some words of admonition:

All of the forms of discontent,
Arise from lack of forbearance.
If you show patience to events,
Your perception will be bright.
Buddha's words reject argument,
Confucian texts abhor conflict.
This avenue leads to happiness,
But not many persons pursue it.¹

THE STORY GOES that Ch'en Ching-chi allowed two days to pass, since the third day, the twenty-fifth of the fifth month, was his birthday. On that occasion, Ch'un-mei prepared a feast in the rear reception hall to celebrate his birthday, and the entire household joined in the festivities.

Early the next morning, Ch'en Ching-chi said to Ch'un-mei, "It is some time since I have been to the dock in Lin-ch'ing. Since I am not busy today, I plan to go there. In the first place, I will be able to go over the accounts with the managers of the tavern; and in the second place, I can avoid the stifling summer heat, and come back after my excursion."

Ch'un-mei said in response, "You should go in a sedan chair, and avoid any overexertion."

He then set out in a sedan chair, borne by two soldiers, and accompanied by Little Chiang, and headed straight for the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock in Lin-ch'ing, but of the events of his trip there is nothing to tell.

That afternoon, when he arrived in front of the tavern, got out of his sedan chair, and went inside, his two managers came out to welcome him, saying, "Sir, are you feeling somewhat better?"

Ch'en Ching-chi, whose mind was preoccupied with Han Ai-chieh, merely responded, "I fear I have put the two of you to the trouble of worrying about me."

After sitting with them for a while, he got up; told them, "Write out a copy of the accounts so I can look them over"; and then headed for the interior. The Han family servant came out to meet him and announced his arrival to Wang Liu-erh and her mate. Han Ai-chieh was in her upstairs room:

Leaning on the balustrade and gazing abroad,

Flourishing her brush and expending her ink,

as she composed a set of poems;

In order to dispel her lingering depression.²

When it was suddenly reported that Ch'en Ching-chi had arrived, she:

Lightly moved her lotus feet

Gently lifted her beige skirt, and made her way downstairs, where mother and daughter greeted him with their faces wreathed in smiles, saying:

"The more eminent you are, the harder you are to see."³

What wind has blown you here today?"

Ch'en Ching-chi bowed in response to mother and daughter and then went into their room and sat down.

In a little while, Wang Liu-erh prepared a serving of tea for them, and when they had finished drinking it, Han Ai-chieh said, "Sir, please come upstairs and have a seat in my room."

Ch'en Ching-chi went upstairs as requested, and the two of them:

Just like fish in the water,⁴

Resembling lacquer and glue,⁵ did not fail to exchange words expressing:

Deep-felt love and intimate feelings.⁶

A sheet of flowery stationery was sticking out from under Han Ai-chieh's inkstone, and Ch'en Ching-chi picked it up to look at.

Han Ai-chieh explained, “Those are several poems that I wrote in my room up here while longing for you during my leisured hours, in order to:

While away my lingering depression.⁷

But I fear they may be unworthy of your distinguished eyes.”

Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to peruse them, and they read as follows:

Spring

Leaning languidly against the embroidered bed,

I'm too depressed to move;⁸

Languorously unfastening my embroidered sash,

I let my hair tumble down.

Ever since my jadelike lover has departed

I have had no news of him;

Throughout the twenty-four hours of the day

I can only yearn for him.⁹

Summer

From a high vantage point on the lofty tower

I gaze into the clear radiance;

The rose blossoms covering the entire arbor are clothed in rare fragrance.

I have spent idle hours leaning over every one of the twelve balustrades;¹⁰

As the perfumed breeze from the south has begun to penetrate my garments.

Autumn

Within the cold hibiscus-blossom curtains

I am unable even to dream;

Since my understanding lover has left me

I can only grieve for him.

The tears I shed upon my pillow are like the raindrops on the steps;

Outside the window they drip unceasingly right up till the day dawns.¹¹

Winter

Ashamed to face the caltrop-patterned mirror,

I retouch my unblemished makeup;

I have withered away on my loved one's account, losing the freshness of my complexion.

Closing the door, I am no longer concerned with the idle breeze and moonlight;

And will henceforth instruct the plum blossoms to do whatever they please.¹²

When Ch'en Ching-chi had finished perusing the poems:

Expressing the most fulsome admiration,

He praised them endlessly to the skies.

Before long, Wang Liu-erh prepared wine and delicacies and brought them upstairs, where she moved the mirror stand out of the way and laid them out on Han Ai-chieh's dressing table.

The two of them sat down next to each other, and Han Ai-chieh proceeded to pour out a cup of wine and proffer it to Ch'en Ching-chi with both hands, bowing deeply to him, and saying, “Sir, during the whole time that you failed to visit me, I could not get you out of my mind for even a moment. But when our servant returned with your contribution toward our living expenses, our whole family:

Felt they could not thank you enough.”¹³

Ch'en Ching-chi took the proffered wine in his hand and bowed in return, saying, “It was my trivial indisposition that prevented me from keeping our engagement. Please do not hold it against me.”

After downing his wine, he poured another cup and proffered it respectfully to Han Ai-chieh. When she had drunk it, they sat down together and prepared to enjoy some more. Wang Liu-erh and Han Tao-kuo also came upstairs to share a few cups with them but found excuses to go downstairs again in a little while, leaving the two of them to drink together, and share their experiences during the time they had been separated.

After some time, as they drank until they began to feel the effects of the wine:

Their lascivious excitement burned like fire, and they could not help recapitulating their former passion for each other.

As they engaged in intercourse,

Their affection knew no bounds.¹⁴

Getting up and putting on their clothes, they washed their hands and resumed drinking. After downing several more cups:

As their drunken eyes grew bleary,

Their residual lust had not faded.¹⁵

Ever since the last time they had met, the young man had been unhappy at home, and his mind had been so preoccupied with Han Ai-chieh that he had not engaged in intercourse with his wife. On this occasion, when reunited with his inamorata:

He was reluctant to call a halt,
after only one engagement. Truly, like:

Alive or dead predestined lovers,¹⁶

For the foregoing five centuries, they had finally been thrown together, and Ch'en Ching-chi's psyche was led completely astray by her. In a little while:

His lustful feelings rose again, and they engaged in intercourse a second time; after which, he felt that:

His body was so utterly fatigued,¹⁷

That he could carry on no longer.¹⁸

He had not eaten anything for lunch and simply collapsed onto the bed and went to sleep.¹⁹

It turned out to be one of those occasions when:

A disaster was destined to occur.

Unexpectedly, the silk merchant Magnate Ho showed up down below, and Wang Liu-erh entertained him with wine on the ground floor, while Han Tao-kuo went out onto the street to purchase vegetables, delicacies, and fruits to go with the wine. During his absence, the two of them engaged in intercourse, after which, Han Tao-kuo returned with the foodstuffs he had purchased, and the three of them drank several more cups of wine together.

About the time that the sun began to sink in the west, who should appear but the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, the proprietor of My Own Tavern, who was stinking drunk, and whose shirt was hanging open to reveal a torso of purple flesh.

With his fists raised on high, he strode into the ground floor of the tavern and shouted loudly, "Drag out the southerner Magnate Ho so I can beat him up."

This startled the two managers, who were afraid that Ch'en Ching-chi, who was asleep on the second floor, would hear him; so they hastily emerged from behind the counter, came forward, and bowed to him, saying, "Brother Liu the Second, Magnate Ho has not been here."

Liu the Second was not persuaded by this and strode into the interior in large strides, where he tore aside the portiere leading into Han Tao-kuo's quarters with one hand and found that Magnate Ho was inside, sitting shoulder to shoulder with Wang Liu-erh, and drinking wine.

Enraged by this, he cursed at Magnate Ho, saying, "You lousy servile dog! I'll fuck your mother! I've looked everywhere for you, but now I've found you. You've been maintaining two powdered faces in my tavern but have failed to pay them for their services on more than one occasion. In addition to which, you have not paid your rent for the last two months but have been coming over here to make out with another woman."

Magnate Ho hastily came outside and said, "Liu the Second, please go home. I'll come after you."

"You'll come after me, will you, you dog-fucked creature!" Liu the Second cursed at him.

Without any warning, he sent a clenched fist whistling his way that flew right into Magnate Ho's face, creating instantaneously a swollen purple bruise. When Magnate Ho got to his feet he managed to escape out the open door.

Liu the Second then knocked over Wang Liu-erh's table with a single kick of his foot, smashing all the utensils on it; at which Wang Liu-erh cursed at him, saying, "Who do you think you are, you death-defying, lousy, gallows bird, to break into my room for no good reason, only to let off your farts? I'm not the sort of woman who feels:

Inured to such alarms."

Liu the Second responded by stepping forward and giving her a single kick that knocked her flat on her back, and cursed at her, saying, "You whore, I'll fuck your mother! What are you but a nameless unlicensed prostitute, who did not come register yourself with me; as though I would let you get away with plying your trade in this tavern. You had better move out at once. If you delay, I'll subject you to a real beating with my fists."

"What sort of a 'bare stick' or 'knockabout' do you think you are?" retorted Wang Liu-erh. "Do you suppose I have no relatives of my own, so that you can get away with taking advantage of me? What do I want with this life of mine anyway?"

So saying, she plopped down on the ground and began to cry.

Liu the Second Drunkenly Beats Wang Liu-erh

"You whore!" Liu the Second cursed at her, "I'll kick you in the entrails until they break. You still don't seem to understand who I am."

The uproar they created was such that, in no time at all, the neighbors to either side, as well as the pedestrians in the street, gathered around them in considerable numbers.

One of the bystanders, who did not comprehend the situation, said to her, "Wang Liu-erh, you are a newcomer and do not know that he is the renowned Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, who is the brother-in-law of Inspector Chang Sheng on the staff of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu. He is the proprietor of My Own Tavern and is:

A foreman among the beaters of trollops;

A leader among the abusers of drunkards.

You would do well to cut him some slack, rather than acting as though you:

Don't know what is in your own interest.²⁰

No one around here dares to cross him."

"There are people even more powerful than he is," responded Wang Liu-erh. "What reason is there to worry about that gallows bird?"

When Lu Ping-i saw how rough Liu the Second was getting, he and Fatty Hsieh:

Resorting to both appeals and threats, succeeded in persuading him to leave.

Ch'en Ching-chi was still lying in bed at the time, and when he heard the disturbance on the floor below and got up to see what was going on, the sun was already setting in the west.

When he asked what was going on, Han Tao-kuo was nowhere to be seen, but he ran into Wang Liu-erh, who was coming up the stairs:

With disheveled hair and a soiled face,²¹ and said to him, thus and so, "Some gallows bird of a 'knockabout,' who is known as the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, who is the proprietor of My Own Tavern, and who claims to be the brother-in-law of Inspector Chang Sheng from the commandant's household, came looking for one of his customers, kicked and beat me for no good reason, and cursed me out before finally leaving. He also smashed our crockery and wine vessels to smithereens."

So saying, she started to weep out loud. Ch'en Ching-chi then called up the two managers to ask them what had happened, but the two of them could only:

Gaze at each other in astonishment, without daring to utter a word.

Finally, Manager Lu Ping-i, who had a glib tongue, explained, "It was the brother-in-law of the head servant Chang Sheng from the commandant's household, who came here looking for Magnate Ho. He claimed that he owed him two month's rent, and that he had also come to collect the unpaid fees for the services of the prostitutes he had been patronizing at his place. When he saw that he was in Wang Liu-erh's quarters drinking wine:

Without permitting any further explanation,
he tore the portiere aside and struck Magnate Ho a blow with his fist, which frightened Magnate Ho so much that he fled the scene. He then went on to quarrel with Han Tao-kuo's wife, kicking her over with his foot; and the rumpus thus created attracted the attention of all the pedestrians in the street, who crowded in to see what was going on."

Ch'en Ching-chi was worried about creating an incident this late in the day and ordered them to disperse the crowd. He then asked what had become of that rascal Liu the Second, and the two managers told him that they had persuaded him to leave.

On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi:

Made a point of remembering it;
and then did his best to placate Wang Liu-erh and her daughter, saying, "Leave it to me. There is nothing to worry about. The two of you, mother and daughter, can continue to live here. When I get home, I'll take care of it."

When the managers had calculated the interest earned since his last visit and turned the silver over to him, Ch'en Ching-chi got up to go, mounted his steed, and, followed by his servant, whipped up his horse and departed. By the time he made it inside the city wall, the sky was already dark, and he was not in a good mood. On arriving home, he went to see Ch'un-mei, turned the interest money over to her, and then returned to his own quarters. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.

The next day:

His every thought and every consideration, told him that he should tell Ch'un-mei what had happened, but as he contemplated it, he said to himself, "I'd better hold off on it, and wait until I can find some serious faults with Chang Sheng, and get my cousin to persuade His Honor to put an end to him. I cannot tolerate the fact that he has shown more than once that he is not to be trusted. He dares to point out that it was he who located me and knows the truth about my origins, so he figures that I am at his mercy." Truly:

Getting revenge on one's enemies is often accomplished this way;
When the opportunity arises, one does not need to seek far for it.
Though you wear out shoes of iron without finding what you seek;
In the end you may find it without making any effort whatsoever.²²

One day, Ch'en Ching-chi went back to the tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock and met with Han Ai-chieh and her mother to discuss the fright they had been exposed to on the previous occasion.

He also asked his Manager Lu Ping-i, "Has that rascal Liu the Second come back to bother you again?"

"Since he left the other day," responded Manager Lu, "he has not returned."

He also asked Han Ai-chieh whether or not Magnate Ho had come back for another visit.

After having something to eat, and checking over the accounts, Ch'en Ching-chi felt obliged to go back to Han Ai-chieh's room on the second floor, where the two of them spent some time engaged in heartfelt conversation and also indulged in a bout of intercourse.

Upon coming out, he took advantage of his free time to call the wine steward Ch'en the Third into his presence and interrogate him, thus and so, as to whether Chang Sheng or Liu the Second were guilty of any serious misdemeanors that he knew of. This Ch'en the Third:

Though he never, ever, should have done it, told him how Chang Sheng was keeping Sun Hsüeh-o, who had formerly been in his master's household, as his mistress in My Own Tavern. He also told him how Liu the Second lent money to the singing girls in the brothels at 30 percent interest and took advantage of His Honor the commandant's name to conduct his illicit business. Ch'en Ching-chi made a mental note of everything he had said.

After this, he gave two or three taels of silver to Han Ai-chieh for her living expenses, finished checking the accounts with his managers, wrapped up the money that had been earned as interest since his last visit, said farewell, mounted his horse, and set off for home. But enough of this idle chatter.²³ He had harbored the thought of revenge in his heart for some time. In the first place, it was a case of:

Two enemies confronting each other;
and in the second place, it was only to be expected that it might give rise to a catastrophe.

Unexpectedly, just at this time, in the Court in the Eastern Capital, Emperor Hui-tsung was confronted with the fact that the army of the Great Chin regime had crossed the borders of the realm and had penetrated far into the interior. The situation was urgent and the Son of Heaven was thrown into a panic. After consulting with his chief ministers, he dispatched an envoy to travel to the northern kingdom and sue for peace; expressing his willingness to pay an annual ransom of several million taels worth of gold and silver, and colored silk, in return for a settlement. He also abdicated his throne in favor of the crown prince, who changed the reign title from the seventh year of the Hsüan-ho reign period to the first year of the Ching-k'ang reign period and assumed the title of Emperor Ch'in-tsung. When his son had taken his place on the throne, the former Emperor Hui-tsung assumed the title Supreme Taoist Emperor Emeritus and retired to the Lung-te Kung, or Dragon Virtue Palace. The court then appointed Li Kang²⁴ to the post of minister of war, in charge of the armies of the various circuits; and Ch'ung Shih-tao²⁵ to the post of general-in-chief, responsible for military affairs both inside and outside the capital.

One day, an imperial edict came down, addressed to Chou Hsiu, the commandant of Chi-nan prefecture, promoting him to the post of commander-general of the Shantung region, in command of an army of ten thousand men, both infantry and cavalry, and ordering him to station his forces in Tung-ch'ang prefecture, where he should join forces with the grand coordinator and censor-in-chief Chang Shu-yeh in defending the territory and resisting the Chin armies.

Commandant Chou Hsiu was presiding in his yamen at the time, when his attendants came in and reported that an imperial edict had come down and invited him to formally receive it. Commandant Chou Hsiu did not dare to be remiss and knelt down before an incense stand in order to listen to the reading of the edict. The imperial messenger then proceeded to declaim it out loud, and the text read as follows:

The edict from the Emperor, whose sovereignty is ordained by Heaven, states:²⁶

We have heard that the civil arts establish peace in the country,²⁷ while military prowess serves to stabilize the realm. The Three August Ones relied on rites and music to establish their kingdoms; the Five Emperors²⁸ used military campaigns to secure their empires. Undertakings may go smoothly or with difficulty; men may be sagely or foolish.²⁹ We have inherited the unshakable foundation bequeathed by Our ancestors;³⁰ and the weighty position passed on to Us by Our predecessor. In performing Our myriad tasks We tremble with anxiety. In olden times, Shun subdued the four malefactors, and T'ang³¹ drove out the Miao barbarians. Had they not deployed their armies, they could not have been victorious; had they not employed military might, they could not have established peace. Armies are the teeth and claws of the nation; military power determines the security of the realm. At the present time, the central plain is in danger of collapse, and the barbarians are in revolt. The Liao bandits have encroached upon Our borders from the west; and the Chin rebels have launched a southern invasion with their cavalry. The common people have been greatly afflicted;³² and We are much concerned about their plight.³³ The military commissioner-in-chief of Shantung, Chou Hsiu, is a man of seasoned talent, and a commander capable of defending cities; who has repeatedly demonstrated extraordinary merit, and whose fidelity and courage are well-known. He deploys his troops strategically and knows how to lead them into battle. We hereby promote him to the posts of commander-general of the Shantung region, and defense commissioner of the four circuits. In concert with the grand coordinator and censor-in-chief of Shantung, Chang Shu-yeh, he is ordered to lead his infantry and cavalry to defend Kao-yang Pass; and to place the disposition of his forces and their battle orders under the jurisdiction of General-in-chief Ch'ung Shih-tao; in the hope of restoring peace to Our endangered society, and expelling the rebellious barbarians. Alas! The appointment of worthy men to office in order to set the country straight; and the willingness to put oneself in danger in order to protect the throne; are indications of the loyalty and sincerity of ministers and sons. Just as the recognition of the good and the rewarding of the worthy, in order to stimulate resistance toward the enemy, are among the important functions of the court.³⁴ Each of you should exert your loyalty to the utmost, in order to accomplish Our goals. This Imperial command must be obeyed.

Ordered on the stated day of the ninth month of the first year of the Ching-k'ang reign period.

When Commandant Chou Hsiu had listened to the reading of the edict, he sent the imperial messenger on his way. He then called in his two inspectors, Chang Sheng and Li An, and directed them to load up two carts with his trunks of luggage, valuables, and other belongings, and escort them back home.

It so happens that during the year he had served in office at Chi-nan he had amassed enormous sums of gold and silver, which he now stowed in his trunks of luggage and turned over to his two trusted servants, saying, "When you arrive home and have stored this material safely away, be sure to keep watch over the premises by day and by night. Some day soon, in conjunction with the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh, I will take charge of the infantry and cavalry from the four circuits and set out for the front from Ch'ing-ho district."

That very day, Chang Sheng and Li An took care of loading the carts as they had been ordered to do and set out ahead of their master, but of the events of their trip there is nothing to tell. When they arrived home some days later and had stored the material safely away, the two of them proceeded to patrol the premises, by day and by night, both inside and out. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi saw that Chang Sheng had escorted the carts and come home, and learned that Commandant Chou Hsiu had been promoted to the office of commander-general of the Shantung region and would arrive back before long himself, he decided to reveal what was on his mind to Ch'un-mei, so that when the commandant returned they would jointly be able to disclose the incriminating evidence he had discovered about Chang Sheng.

Unexpectedly, one day, when his wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing was away from home visiting her mother, he was sleeping all by himself in the library on the west side of the courtyard when Ch'un-mei came in to see him early in the morning. Upon observing that there were no maidservants about, the two of them took off their clothes and proceeded to engage in the game of clouds and rain with each other.

What they did not anticipate was that Chang Sheng, ringing his bell as he patrolled the premises, should pass by the postern gate, and overhear what sounded like female laughter coming from inside the library. He immediately silenced his bell and crept slowly up to the window in order to eavesdrop on what was going on.

He found out that Ch'un-mei was inside, engaged in intercourse with Ch'en Ching-chi, and overheard him saying to her, "I can't put up any longer with that rascal Chang Sheng, who is trying to keep me under his thumb by reminding me that it was thanks to him that I was located, and rescued from the plight I was in. He has run me down in front of the other servants more than once. Recently, when he learned that I had opened a tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, he encouraged his brother-in-law, the Turf-protecting Tiger, Liu the Second, to take advantage of your husband's prestige in order to get away with operating a brothel for unlicensed prostitutes, and exploiting them as a loan shark. He is also maintaining Sun Hsüeh-o as his kept mistress in a separate location, and keeping you in the dark about all these things. The other day, his brother-in-law Liu the Second actually forced his way into my tavern and drove the customers away. I have been keeping quiet about these things, not venturing to tell you about them, but now that your husband is on his way home, if we don't let him know about all this, I will not dare to continue doing business on the dock at Lin-ch'ing."

When Ch'un-mei heard this, she responded, "How can that rascal act so improperly? I sold that menial creature Sun Hsüeh-o into prostitution. How can he presume to maintain her in a separate location as his kept mistress?"

"He is not only taking advantage of me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but is taking advantage of you as well."

"When His Honor arrives home," pronounced Ch'un-mei, "I'll see that he gets rid of that rascal for good."

As the saying goes:

There are sure to be ears on the other side of the wall;
How could there not be someone hidden beyond the window?³⁵

The two of them were preoccupied with what they were saying to each other inside the room and were quite unaware that Chang Sheng, who was lurking outside the window, overheard what they said so clearly that he might well have ejaculated:

"Is it not delightful?"
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,

"Right now, they may be hatching a plot against my brother-in-law and myself, but I will act first by hatching a plot against them."

So saying, he discarded his bell, went out to the duty room in the front compound, where he picked up a steel-bladed dagger, and then:

Chang Sheng Eavesdrops on Ch'en Ching-chi

The telling is slow, but
 What happened was quick;
 he sharpened the blade on a whetstone and strode into the library.
 Who could have known that:

As providence would have it,
 Ch'un-mei was not fated to die at his hands.

Lan-hua, her junior maidservant, had suddenly come out in a state of consternation and interrupted them, saying to Ch'un-mei, "Your son, the young squire Chin-ko, has come down with a fit of convulsions, and you had better go back to see how he is."

This alarmed Ch'un-mei so much that:

Covering two steps with every one,
 she had rushed back to the rear compound to look after her child.

No sooner had she left than Chang Sheng burst into the library with dagger in hand, where he failed to see Ch'un-mei but found Ch'en Ching-chi lying under the bedcovers.

Upon seeing him come in, Ch'en Ching-chi cried out, "Ai-ya! What are you coming in here for?"

"I've come to kill you," Chang Sheng announced angrily. "How could you bring yourself to tell that whore that you intended to do me in? Was it not I who was responsible for rescuing you from your earlier predicament? And now you are:

Requiting kindness with enmity.

As the saying goes:

A black-headed beetle is not safe to rescue;³⁶

If rescued it will end up eating your flesh.

Don't try to escape, but have a taste of my dagger.

This day a year from now will mark the anniversary of your death."³⁷

Ch'en Ching-chi, whose body was stark naked, had no place to hide, and tried to wrap himself in the quilt; but Chang Sheng tore it aside and jabbed him with the dagger, which penetrated between his ribs, causing his fresh blood to spurt out. When Chang Sheng saw that he was still struggling, he jabbed him in the chest once again, which left him:

No longer able to make a move;³⁸

at which point, he grabbed him by the hair and cut off his head. Truly:

So long as one has three inches of breath,

one uses it a thousand ways;

But when the messenger of death shows up,

everything comes to an end.

It is pitiable, but Ch'en Ching-chi was no more than twenty-seven years old when he was made to:

Die an untimely death.

Chang Sheng, with his dagger in hand, proceeded to circle the room and look behind the bed for Ch'un-mei but could not find her, whereupon, he headed out toward the rear reception hall in large strides. When he reached the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds, he ran into Li An, who was carrying his watchman's bell and patrolling the premises.

No sooner did Li An see Chang Sheng come charging in like an avenging spirit, with dagger in hand, than he asked him, "Where are you headed?"

When Chang Sheng refused to respond and continued to charge ahead, Li An blocked his way, and Chang Sheng attempted to stab at him with his dagger.

Li An laughed sardonically at this and said, "My uncle is the famous military instructor known as the Shantung Yaksha Li Kuei, but there is no need for me to avail myself of the skills I have acquired from him."

As he spoke, his right foot shot up and kicked the dagger in his antagonist's hand to one side with a clattering sound. Chang Sheng was thrown into a panic by this, and the two of them fell to grappling with each other. But Li An tripped him up with his foot, so that he fell facedown to the ground, and then took off the belt around his waist and tied him up with it in no time at all.

The noise created by their struggle was overheard by Ch'un-mei in the rear compound, and Li An explained it to her, saying, "Chang Sheng came inside with a dagger in hand, but I have succeeded in subduing him."

Ch'un-mei had only just succeeded in coaxing Chin-ko back to consciousness, and when she heard these words she:

Turned pale with consternation, and rushed out to the library, only to find the dead body of Ch'en Ching-chi lying there, with his:

Fresh blood flowing everywhere,³⁹ at which she couldn't help starting to weep out loud.

She then sent someone to report the situation to his wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who hurried home as quickly as possible. When she saw the slain corpse of Ch'en Ching-chi, she:

Fell to the floor in tears,

Oblivious to human affairs.

Ch'un-mei helped her up until she regained consciousness; after which, she had the corpse removed, purchased a coffin in which it could be prepared for burial, and had Chang Sheng incarcerated in the lockup, while she waited for the commander-general to come home and deal with the affair.

In no more than a few days, since the military situation was urgent, and he had received orders to make haste, Commander-general Chou Hsiu managed to finish rounding up the infantry and cavalry from the various circuits and heard that the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh had already arrived in Tung-ch'ang prefecture and was waiting for him to join him there.

When he arrived home, Ch'un-mei told him how Ch'en Ching-chi had been killed by Chang Sheng, and Li An laid the murder weapon before him and knelt down to tell him what had happened. The commander-general was enraged by this and, taking his seat on the bench, had Chang Sheng brought before him, and:

Without discussing the pros and cons of the matter, ordered his soldiers to give him a hundred strokes with the bamboo, taking turns as they beat him five strokes at a time. In no time at all he was beaten to death. He then lost no time in dispatching flag-bearing couriers to proceed to the Lin-ch'ing dock, take the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second into custody, and bring him back in fetters.

Sun Hsüeh-o, on seeing that Liu the Second had been arrested, feared that she might be taken also, and going into her room:

Hanged herself until dead.

When the flag-bearing couriers brought Liu the Second back to the yamen, Commander-general Chou Hsiu ordered that he also should be given a hundred strokes with the bamboo, and he was beaten to death that very day. As a result:

The district of Ch'ing-ho was dumbfounded;
The prefecture of Lin-ch'ing was much disturbed.

Truly:

One who spends his life doing evil and defying Heaven;
Will, one day, suffer retribution from Heaven itself.⁴⁰

There is a poem that testifies to this:

In being a person one should never engage in deceit;⁴¹ Hovering three feet over one's head
there are the gods.⁴²
If the doing of evil deeds received no retribution;
The cruel people of this world would devour each other.⁴³

At the time, the commander-general, by ordering these two men to be beaten to death, succeeded in ridding the neighborhood of their harmful influence. He then ordered Li An to take care of returning the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing to its original owner, and recovering the capital that had been invested in it. He also instructed Ch'un-mei to hold funeral services for Ch'en Ching-chi on the seven weekly commemorations of his death, and then to select an auspicious day on which to bury him on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city. He decided to leave Li An and Chou I to look after the household during his absence, and to take Chou Chung and Chou Jen to serve him at his military headquarters.

That evening, Ch'un-mei, along with Sun Erh-niang, hosted a farewell feast to see him off, at which, before she knew it, all of a sudden, she began to:

Shed two streams of tears, and said, "Once you have set out, sir, there is no knowing when you will return. You must be careful when going into battle.

The barbarian troops are ruthless, and They cannot be lightly confronted."⁴⁴

"The two of you," responded the commander-general, "while you remain at home, must:

Cleanse your hearts and reduce your desires,⁴⁵ while devoting yourselves to caring for my son. There is no need for you to worry about me. Since I have been the recipient of the Emperor's rank and emolument, I must:

Expend my loyalty to requite my country."⁴⁶

As for:

Fortune or mischance, survival or death,
I can only leave them to Heaven."

When he had finished admonishing them, he went to bed for the night.

The next day, the infantry and cavalry under his command were all assembled outside the city wall waiting for him; and when the commander-general set out at their head, the men and horses were all in excellent order. Behold:

Signal flags flutter amid embroidered banners;
Painted drums resound along with bronze gongs.
Three-pronged pitchforks,
And five-pronged pitchforks,
Glitter like autumn frosts.
Spears as sharp as reeds,
And spears of tempered steel,
Proliferate like snowflakes.⁴⁷
Buckler-bearing troops lead the way;
Strong bows and sturdy crossbows⁴⁸ come next.
Cannons are drawn behind their carts;
Battle-axes and lances follow in their wake.
The generals in their saddles,
Like the fierce tigers of the Southern Hills,⁴⁹
Are ready for battle and given to combat.⁵⁰

The horses they sit astride,
Like the coiled dragons of the Northern Seas,
Are adept at struggle and prone to fight.⁵¹
Truly, their blades and spears are as turbulent as tumbling waters;
In fact, the men and horses sweep forward like tempestuous winds.⁵²

Of the events of their journey there is nothing to tell.

One day, they were met by a mounted scout who told them not to proceed any further and then led them up to the outskirts of Tung-ch'ang prefecture, at which point the commander-general dispatched a courier, bearing his blue commander's standard, to report their arrival and stationed his infantry and cavalry outside the city wall. When Grand Coordinator Chang Shu-yeh learned that Commander-general Chou Hsiu, and the infantry and cavalry under his command, had arrived, he went out to meet him, together with the prefect of Tung-ch'ang, Ta T'ien-tao. Upon arriving back in the courtroom of the prefectural yamen, and exchanging the conventional greetings, they sat down together to discuss the military situation, and the relative urgency of the information available to them.

After bivouacking overnight, the infantry and cavalry set out early the next morning in order to assume their duties in defending the front against the enemy. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when Han Ai-chieh and her mother, in the Hsieh Family Tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, learned of Ch'en Ching-chi's death, Han Ai-chieh gave herself over to weeping, by day and by night, and refused to consume either tea or food. She indicated that if she could only go to the commandant's yamen inside the city and be able to see Ch'en Ching-chi's corpse:

She'd be prepared to die if she must.

Her father and mother, along with others, did everything they could to talk her out of it, but she refused to be dissuaded. Han Tao-kuo, finding himself:

At a loss for what to do next,

sent their servant to the commandant's yamen, where he learned that Ch'en Ching-chi's corpse had already been encoffined and buried on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city.

When the servant returned and reported this news, Han Ai-chieh expressed the desire to go burn paper money at his tomb, and weep over his grave, as an expression of her grief over the demise of their relationship. Her parents felt compelled to go along with this and proceeded to hire a sedan chair for her, and pay a visit to the Temple of Eternal Felicity. When they asked Abbot Tao-chien where the tomb was located, he ordered a novice to take them behind the temple and point out the location of the tomb.

Han Ai-chieh got out of the sedan chair, went in front of the tomb, lit the paper money, and bowed before it, calling out as she did so, "My darling brother:

I really looked forward to living in harmony with you until our old age.

How could I have anticipated that this day you would be dead?"

So saying, she commenced to weep out loud and then fell down in a faint, knocking her head on the ground so hard that she lost consciousness. This threw Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh into a panic, and they rushed over to help her up, calling out to her as they did so, but she did not respond, which panicked them even further.

Who should appear at this juncture but Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi's wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who arrived in two sedan chairs to conduct the ceremony of revisiting the grave on the third day after the burial, accompanied by their attendants, carrying the three sacrificial animals and other ritual offerings, in order to burn paper money on behalf of the deceased. On their arrival, they saw a young woman, wearing plain white mourning garments and a mourning cap on her head, who had:

Fallen to the floor in tears, while a man and a middle-aged woman were attempting to help her up, though she fell down again:

Oblivious to human affairs.

They were startled by this and asked where the man was from.

Han Tao-kuo and his wife came forward to greet them with a bow and told them what had happened up until that point, saying, "This is our daughter Han Ai-chieh."

When Ch'un-mei heard the name Han Ai-chieh she remembered that she had met her in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in the past and also recognized Wang Liu-erh. Han Tao-kuo then went on to tell her all about how they had been forced to leave Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital.

He then went on to explain, "Our daughter was acquainted with Master Ch'en Ching-chi but did not realize that he had died, and on finding out, wanted to come see his grave and burn paper money on his behalf. We did not anticipate that on arriving here she should collapse in tears this way."

The two of them then continued trying to resuscitate Han Ai-chieh for what seemed like half a day before she finally spit up a mouthful of sticky sputum and regained consciousness. She choked inarticulately for a while, before giving way to a fit of weeping.

She then got up and proceeded to kowtow to Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing four times:

Just as though inserting a taper in its holder;

while saying, "Although he and I were guilty of:
Cohabitation amid the dewdrops,
the two of us:

Swore to be as faithful as the hills,
And vowed to be as loyal as the seas.⁵³
We looked forward to living in harmony together until our old age.

Who could have known that:

Heaven should fail to comply with our wishes,⁵⁴
and he should predecease me one day, leaving me:

On the ground on all fours?

While he was still alive, he gave me a handkerchief of Wu silk with a love poem in the form of a quatrain inscribed on it. I knew that he had a wife at home, but I was willing to subordinate myself to you as his concubine. In case you don't believe me, I'll show it to you."

So saying, she pulled the handkerchief of Wu silk with the quatrain inscribed on it out of her sleeve so Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing could read it. The poem read as follows:

The handkerchief of Wu silk is inscribed
with a palindrome;
From a flourish of my writing brush the
ink is still fresh.
I have dedicated it to my affectionate
love Han Ai-chieh;
That we may enjoy the century-long love
of mating phoenixes.

Han Ai-chieh went on to say, "I also gave him a little perfume sachet embroidered with two mandarin ducks, for him to suspend from his belt. It had double-headed lotus blossoms depicted on either side, on each petal of which I had stitched a character, so that they read:

Admiringly tendered to my lover,
I'll follow you wherever you go."

Ch'un-mei then asked Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, "Why did we not find this perfume sachet?"

"It was suspended inside his tunic," responded Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, "and I put it inside the casket when he was encoffined."

When they had finished offering their sacrifices before Ch'en Ching-chi's tomb, Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing invited the mother and daughter into the temple where a repast was prepared for them to eat. When Han Ai-chieh's parents saw that:

The light was beginning to wane, they urged her to get ready to go, but she did not want to leave.

Kneeling down in front of Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, she wept, saying, "I do not want to return with my mother and father. I would rather join you in wearing mourning and living as a widow, in order to honor our relationship, and show that:

While living I served as his concubine;
When dead I remain close to his spirit."

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing did not choose to say anything in response to this, but Ch'un-mei said, "My sister, I fear that someone still in the springtime of her youth as you are will find it difficult to remain chaste. The best years of your life will be wasted."

"Mistress," responded Han Ai-chieh, "how can you say such a thing? Having committed myself to him, even if:

My eyes were gouged out or my nose broken,
I would feel obliged to maintain my fidelity and swear never to marry anyone else."

She then turned to her parents and enjoined them, saying, "The two of you elders should return by yourselves. I wish to join my mistress and my sister as residents of their household."

Wang Liu-erh:

Shed tears from her eyes, and wept, saying, "We had hoped that you would support the two of us in our old age. We have only just rescued you from:

A tiger's lair and a dragon's pond,⁵⁵
and today you propose to abandon us."

All Han Ai-chieh said in response was, "I will not go back with you. Even if you managed to take me with you, I would only commit suicide."

When Han Tao-kuo saw that his daughter was adamant about not returning with them, he and Wang Liu-erh cried together over her decision and shed tears as they set out for the tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing; while Han Ai-chieh joined Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing as they rode back to the commandant's yamen in their sedan chairs. On the way back, Wang Liu-erh could not bear the thought of relinquishing her daughter and wept over it again and again:

In sorrow and distress.

Han Tao-kuo, for his part, feared that it was getting late and hired two horses to speed them on their way. Truly:

When the horse is slow and the mind beset⁵⁶
the road ahead is endless;

One's person resembles floating duckweed⁵⁷ or tosses like tumbleweed.

There is only the moon as it hovers over the gates of the capital;

That shines indifferently on the grief of those going west and east.⁵⁸

HAN AI-CHIEH SEEKS HER FATHER AND MOTHER IN HU-CHOU; CH'AN MASTER P'U-CHING RESCUES SOULS FROM PERDITION

Some words of admonition

In this human life people should not rely upon heroism;
Their degrees of skill at their jobs are sure to differ.
Even fierce tigers are bound to meet more ferocious beasts;
The most poisonous serpents are also fearful of centipedes.
His seven captures of Meng Huo made Chu-ko Liang famous;¹
For prevailing over Kuan Yü twice Lü Meng was admired.²
The judiciousness of Li An marked him as a prudent man;
And enabled him to fly high and evade his predicament.³

THE STORY GOES that when Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh returned to the Hsieh Family Tavern without their daughter, they were faced with the prospect of:

Sitting at home as their resources ran out.⁴

They therefore sent Ch'en the Third to invite Magnate Ho to visit them as before. When Magnate Ho found out that Liu the Second had been killed by the local authorities, so that the threat that he posed was eliminated, he came back and resumed his affair with Wang Liu-erh.

In the course of a conversation with Han Tao-kuo, he said, "Since your daughter, Han Ai-chieh, is preserving her chastity as a member of the commandant's household, and refuses to come back, I propose that once I have sold off my shipment of merchandise, and collected what I am owed, the two of you can come with me on my return to my home in Hu-chou. That would surely be preferable to carrying on this business of yours here."

"If you deign to be so considerate of us, sir," responded Han Tao-kuo, "that would be wonderful."

One day, after Magnate Ho had sold off his merchandise, and collected what was owed him, he hired a boat and set out for Hu-chou, taking Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh with him.

To resume our story, when Han Ai-chieh had settled into Chou Hsiu's household, she and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing both remained chaste out of respect for Ch'en Ching-chi, addressed each other as sisters, and got along very well, spending their days keeping company with Ch'un-mei. At the time, Chou Chin-ko was already five years old, Sun Erh-niang's daughter Chou Yü-chieh was nine, and the women had nothing to do but look after the children.

Who would have thought that after the death of Ch'en Ching-chi, and Chou Hsiu's departure on his military campaign, despite the fact that every day Ch'un-mei enjoyed:

Delicacies of every variety, and Clothes of satin and brocade;

while on her head:

What glitters is gold,
What is white is silver,
What are round are pearls,
What sparkle are jewels; and She lacked for nothing;⁵

she found the nights difficult to endure:

Sleeping in solitude on her lonely pillow,⁶
While flames of desire consumed her heart.

She noticed that Li An was a handsome fellow and was impressed by the way in which, after the death of Chang Sheng, he had continued conscientiously to patrol the premises, both early and late.

One day, during the winter, he was on the night shift in the duty room when he heard someone knocking on the rear gate and promptly asked who it was; to which the only response was, "Just open the door."

Li An hastily unfastened the door only to see someone force their way inside and hide out of the lamplight. When Li An took a look at the person, he saw that it was the wet nurse Chin-kuei.

"Nurse," said Li An, "what are you doing here at such an hour?"

"I have not come on my own initiative," said Chin-kuei. "It is my mistress in the rear compound who sent me here."

"What did the mistress send you here for?" asked Li An.

Chin-kuei laughed, saying, "You wouldn't understand it. She wanted me to see if you had gone to sleep or not, and entrusted me with something to give to you."

So saying, she pulled a bag of clothing off her shoulder and said, "These are for you, and this bag also contains some women's clothing for your mother. The mistress feels much indebted to you for escorting His Honor's cartloads of luggage on the way home, and for saving her life. If it had not been for you, she also would have been slain by that rascal Chang Sheng."

When she had finished speaking, she left the clothes behind and went out the door.

After going only two steps, she turned around and said, "There is another item of importance."

So saying, she pulled out a large ingot of silver weighing fifty taels and tossed it to Li An, after which she continued on her way. The rest of the night passed without incident.

Early the next morning, Li An got up and went straight to his home, taking the clothes with him to give to his mother.

"Where did these things come from?" his mother asked.

Li An told her what had happened the night before; but when she had heard him out, his mother became upset and said, "At the outset, Chang Sheng committed a crime, for which she had him beaten to death with a hundred strokes of the bamboo. What could there be behind her giving you these things today? I am already more than sixty years old at present, and since the death of your father, you are the only person I have left to look to. If you do something that gets you into trouble, who would there be for me to depend on? You had better not go back there tomorrow morning."

"If I don't return," said Li An, "and she should send someone to fetch me, what will you have to say?"

"I will just tell them that you have come down with a severe cold," his mother said.

"If I should end up not returning," said Li An, "wouldn't that serve to make His Honor annoyed with me?"

"You might as well go visit your uncle the Shantung Yaksha Li Kuei," said his mother. "After staying there for a few months, you can come back to check out the situation."

Li An, who was both a filial and obedient son, opted to take his mother's suggestion and proceeded to pack up his luggage and set out for Ch'ing-chou prefecture in order to seek refuge with his uncle Li Kuei.

When Ch'un-mei saw that Li An had not returned, she sent a junior servant to summon him on three or five occasions. At first, his mother said that he was at home recuperating from an illness, but when she saw that people came back to check on the situation, she explained that he had returned to his native place to try to make a living. Ch'un-mei suffered heartfelt frustration at this news. But no more of this.

Time flies by swiftly;⁷

The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.⁸

The twelfth month ended and spring began,

During the primal decade of the first month.

Commander-general Chou Hsiu, at the head of his twelve thousand troops, had been encamped at Tung-ch'ang prefecture for some time, when he sent his servant Chou Chung to deliver a letter to his family, directing them to send Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang to join him there, along with his children Chin-ko and Yü-chieh. When his dependents were ready to get into their carts and set out, they left only Chou Chung behind, having instructed him to go and invite Chou Hsiu's cousin Chou Hsüan to leave his country estate and come to look after the household during their absence.

It so happens that Commander-general Chou Hsiu had a cousin named Chou Hsüan who lived on his country estate, and who agreed to join Chou Chung in looking after the household along with Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh, while Chou Jen and a contingent of military guards escorted the vehicles of the other family members on their way to Tung-ch'ang prefecture. With regard to this trip, truly:

It was not to save their lives or reputations that they left their home;

But how could they have known how few persons survive such expeditions?

There is a set of verses that describes the heroic leadership of Commander-general Chou Hsiu. At this time, when the Central Plain was in a state of turmoil, it was his ambition to overcome the barbarians. Behold:

In all four quarters bandits arise like swarming bees;
The flames of beacon fires flare up turning the sky red.
A display of the general's wrath may pacify the realm;
Sweeping away the barbarians, and making them submit.

He has long chosen to prefer public over private interests;
And pledged his life to his country
as if it were not his.
His dagger-axe can shroud the sun
to aid him in battle;
He is able to win the first place in the Hall of Fame.

Beyond the Yen-men Pass the autumn wind is tempestuous;
Clad in metal armor he must sleep
under the cold moon.
He has forced his steed to sweat
for twenty years;
Only to achieve streaks of snowy white in his hair.

The Son of Heaven sees his worth from miles away;
And has rewarded his efforts with praise repeatedly.
A golden seal hangs at his elbow,
as big as a dipper;
As surely befits a hero of such imposing stature.⁹

One day, under the supervision of Chou Jen, the vehicles that were carrying Chou Hsiu's dependents arrived in Tung-ch'ang. When the commander-general saw that Ch'un-mei, Sun Erh-niang, Chin-ko, and Yü-chieh, along with their attendants, had arrived, and that:

 Their journey had been a safe one,¹⁰

he was utterly delighted and arranged for them to be housed in the rear compound of his headquarters.

Chou Jen told him, "I invited your cousin Chou Hsian from your country estate to come and look after your household, along with my father Chou Chung."

Commander-general Chou Hsiu also asked, "Why is Li An nowhere to be seen?"

"Why bring up the subject of Li An?" Ch'un-mei expostulated. "Because I was feeling grateful to that rascal for apprehending Chang Sheng, I gave him two sets of clothes for his mother to wear. But that evening, while patrolling the premises, he went into the rear compound and made off with a package of fifty taels worth of rental income from your country estate that was lying on a table in the parlor. I sent servants to his mother's place to summon him a number of times, but he claimed to be sick and failed to return. And the last time I sent someone after him, he was told that he had absconded to his native place in Ch'ing-chou."

"That rascal," responded Chou Hsiu. "I had always treated him favorably, and he has turned out to be as ungrateful as that. When I have the time, I will send people there to arrest him."

Ch'un-mei chose not to mention anything about the affair of Han Ai-chieh. After some time had passed, Ch'un-mei observed that Chou Hsiu was preoccupied every day with military affairs and was utterly devoted to serving the national interest on the Emperor's behalf:

 Straining his heart and taxing his mind,¹¹ while not even taking the time to eat during the day. As for the gratification of sexual desires within the bed curtains, it was a long time since he had indulged in them. She observed that Chou I, the second son of the old family servant Chou Chung, was eighteen years old, possessed:

 Clear-cut brows and sparkling eyes;

and was willing to:

 Exchange looks with eyes and eyebrows.

Consequently, the two of them began a clandestine affair and became attached to each other.

 Morning after morning and evening after evening, the two of them played board games and drank wine together in her room, while the only person who remained unaware of what was going on was the commander-general.

Who could have anticipated that, one day, Emperor T'ai-tsung of the northern state, the Great Chin, having overcome the state of Liao, and observed that in the Eastern Capital of the Sung dynasty Emperor Ch'in-tsung had ascended the throne, assembled a powerful contingent of barbarian troops and launched a two-pronged invasion of the Central Plain. The grand marshal Nien-mo-ho led a force of one hundred thousand infantry and cavalry through the Ching-ching Pass in T'ai-yüan prefecture in an attempt to invade the Eastern Capital; while the secondary marshal Wo-li-pu led his forces from T'an-chou in an attempt to seize Kao-yang Pass. The Sung armies defending the frontier:

 Proved unable to resist them.¹²

This information threw the minister of war Li Kang and the general-in-chief Ch'ung Shih-tao into a panic, and that very night they issued urgent military dispatches ordering the commander-generals of Shantung, Shansi, Honan, Hopei, Kuantung, and Shensi to muster the infantry and cavalry in their six jurisdictions, and occupy the strongholds therein, in order to defend their territories, and fend off the enemy. Consequently, Liu Yen-ch'ing, the commander-general of the Shensi region, led the forces of Yen-sui; Wang Ping, the commander-general of the Kuantung region, led the forces of Fenchiang; Wang Huan, the commander-general of the Hopei region, led the forces of Wei-po; Hsin Hsing-tsung, the commander general of the Honan region, led the forces of Chang-te; Yang Wei-chung, the commander-general of the Shansi region, led the forces of Tse-lu; and Chou Hsiu, the commander-general of the Shantung region, led the forces of Ch'ing-yen against the Chin invaders.

To resume our story, when Commander-general Chou Hsiu learned that a powerful contingent of barbarian troops had come to attack the frontier, and received the urgent military dispatch from the Ministry of War, he mustered his infantry and cavalry:

Donned his complete suit of armor,¹³

And marched away at double stages.

By the time his mounted scouts reached the Kao-yang Pass the Chin marshal Wo-li-pu's infantry and cavalry had already penetrated the pass and slain an enormous number of men and horses.

This happened during the first decade of the fifth month.

The armies endeavored to arrest each other; but Yellow sand flew up in all four directions, and

The tempestuous winds blinded their vision.

Chou Hsiu led his troops into battle, but the Chin commander Wo-li-pu, while urging his cavalry forward in a counterattack, launched an arrow that buried its shaft in his neck, penetrating his throat and causing him to fall off his horse and die. The enemy officers tried to secure his corpse with hooks and cords, but his own men dashed forward, seized his body, and carried it away on horseback. The soldiers wounded in this engagement were without number. Alas, on the day that Commander-general Chou Hsiu died in battle, he was only forty-six years old. Truly:

Loyal generals exert themselves to serve their home and country;¹⁴

But the blood of both the worthy and the stupid stains the sand.¹⁵

A man of yore whose thoughts on this subject were inexhaustible has left us a quatrain to express his feelings, which reads:

Victory and defeat are outcomes that military men cannot anticipate;¹⁶

Security and danger in the final analysis are things decided by fate.

Advancing to battle without obtaining victory

he dies before his time;¹⁷

The sun sets and the rivers flow in spite of one's insuperable grief.¹⁸

There is also a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that reads:

A handsome hero whose aim it was to stabilize the state and pacify the land;¹⁹

His heart was motivated by correct principles²⁰ and the will to rout the enemy.

He was as given to planning national affairs

as dealing with family matters;

And was practiced at carrying secret tallies and wearing tiger-head tallies.²¹

The barbarian cavalry was invincible,

While the prowess of his men was lax.

His troops were unwilling to risk their lives and his officers were inept.

It was a pity that he suffered such a death upon the sandy battlefield;

And that for untold years his heroic spirit could not find expression.

When the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh saw that Commander-general Chou Hsiu had perished on the battlefield, he immediately:

Sounded the gong for his troops to retire,²² took stock of his losses, withdrew to defend Tung-ch'ang, and submitted an urgent memorial to the throne. But no more of this.

When the retreating troops carried Chou Hsiu's corpse back to Tung-ch'ang, Ch'un-mei and her entire household, both high and low, were so upset that:

Their cries shook the heavens,

as they proceeded to encoffin the body and turn over his military credentials and official seals to the authorities. One day some time later, Ch'un-mei, along with her servant Chou Jen, took charge of the coffin and returned with it to Ch'ing-ho district. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.

To resume our story, ever since Ch'un-mei departed, Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh had stayed at home, where they:

Chose to consume only plain tea and simple fare,²³

Remaining chaste and preserving their widowhood, as the days and months passed by. One day, as spring expired and the summer began, when the scenery was bright and fresh, and the days grew longer, they became weary of their needlework, and the two of them strolled out to the ornamental pavilion outside the library on the west side of the courtyard, where they saw that:

The many flowers were in full bloom,²⁴
Orioles sang and swallows chattered,²⁵ and they were:

Touched with heartache by the scene.²⁶

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's heart remained relatively unperturbed, but Han Ai-chieh could not get the thought of her lover Ch'en Ching-chi out of her mind. With regard to all things, she was:

Bereft of thought or feeling, and Saddened by whatever she saw.²⁷
The mouth divulges the sprouts of the mind,²⁸
And gives shape to them in poetic language.

They took turns composing some quatrains that testify to this.

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:

As flowers bloom in the quiet courtyard
the sun begins to shine;
Outside the tightly locked double doors
the white day brightens.
Collapsed against the silver screen I wake from my spring sleep;
Upon the branch of a green locust tree
I hear an oriole's cry.

Han Ai-chieh's read:

The spring season is coming to an end²⁹
as the summer begins;
Meandering in my upturned shoe-tips I venture out the door.
As evening comes I lean in depression on my dressing table;
If I were to neatly paint my eyebrows³⁰ for whom would it be?³¹

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:

Wiping the mirror with a red cloth by light from the window;
I paint my mothlike eyebrows so they slope to either side.
When my lotus feet are lightly animated³²
where is there to go?
Smiling beside the stairs I pluck the pomegranate blossoms.³³

Han Ai-chieh's read:

My countenance looks like snow and my spirit resembles jade;
I am not yet ready to banish romance for fear of defilement.
As I gaze at my visage I pity myself and also feel regret;
Who is left to savor the beauty of my newly applied makeup?³⁴

Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:

Sedge grass spreads over the ground
as thick as a rug;
Elm pods are strewn everywhere like scattered coins.
Who could have foreseen that rascal to be so fickle?
Drunken the whole day long he sleeps under the flowers.

Han Ai-chieh's read:

Besetting sorrow continues to cause
my brows to peak;
Why has my face looked so distressed for the last year?
Ever since we parted all day long my soul is disturbed;

There is no road to Heaven that might allow us to meet.

When the two sisters had finished reciting their quatrains, without their knowing it:

Tears trickled down their cheeks.³⁵

Chou Hsüan came upon them at this point and admonished them, saying, "You two sisters ought not to disturb yourselves so. You would do better to stifle your sighs and examine your own conduct. I have had a number of dreams in the last few days that appear to be inauspicious. I dreamed of a bow hanging from a flagstaff, and the flagstaff appeared to be broken. But I don't know whether this should be interpreted as inauspicious or auspicious."

On hearing this, Han Ai-chieh remarked, "I fear it may portend that His Honor has suffered some mishap on the frontier."

As they were wondering about this, all of a sudden they saw their servant Chou Jen, dressed in mourning garments, and in a state of obvious agitation, who came in and reported, "A calamity has occurred. His Honor, thus and so, on the seventh day of the fifth month, was killed in battle at the frontier pass. The First Lady and the Second Lady, along with their dependents, have brought the cart with his bier home with them and have just arrived."

This threw Chou Hsüan into a state of consternation, and he promptly ordered that the front reception hall should be swept out and straightened up so that Chou Hsiu's coffin could lie in state there, and the sacrificial offerings could be formally presented. The entire household, both high and low, then proceeded to give voice to grievous lamentations, and Chou Hsüan made arrangements for funeral services to be held on the seven weekly commemorations of Chou Hsiu's death, and for Buddhist monks and Taoist priests to hold scripture readings on his behalf. His children, Chou Chin-ko and Chou Yü-chieh:

Donned hempen garments and put on mourning apparel;

while visitors came and went to offer their condolences. A day was chosen for the funeral procession, and he was duly buried in his family's ancestral graveyard. But there is no need to describe this in detail.

To resume our story, on behalf of his nephew the five-year-old Chou Chin-ko, Chou Hsüan submitted a memorial to the throne asking that an officially ordained sacrifice be offered at the site of Chou Hsiu's burial, and that his son should be allowed to succeed to his father's official position. An imperial decree was duly issued to the Ministry of War that read as follows:

The deceased Commander-general Chou Hsiu has devoted his life to repaying his country, and died in the course of serving the ruler. His loyalty and courage are worthy of commendation. Officers should be deputed to conduct a sacrificial ceremony at his grave site, and a tablet should be erected at the head of his tomb engraved with his posthumous title as commander-in-chief. His son should be properly nurtured until he reaches the age at which he can succeed to his father's hereditary position.

As for Ch'un-mei, when she was not caring for her son, her lascivious desires were stronger than ever, and she often kept Chou I in her perfumed boudoir for days at a time. As the mornings and evenings succeeded one another:

She indulged her lust without restraint, until one day she came down with a hectic fever and other symptoms of consumption. Although she took medication for this every day, her appetite for food and drink diminished, her temperament became depressed, and:

Her body became as thin as a stick of kindling,³⁶

but her lascivious desires did not abate.

One day, sometime after the celebration of her birthday, and during the hottest period of the summer in the sixth month, she was sleeping late when, unexpectedly, as she and Chou I embraced each other on her bed, and he had just ejaculated, a burst of cold air emerged from her nostrils, her vaginal secretions formed a pool on the bedding, and:

Alas and alack,

she expired on top of Chou I's body. At the time of her death she was only twenty-eight years old.

When Chou I realized that she was no longer breathing, he was reduced to a state of panic, stole some gold and silver and other valuables from her trunk, secreted them in his clothing, and fled from the premises. The maidservants and wet nurses:

Did not dare to conceal these events,³⁷

and reported them to Chou Hsüan, who proceeded to put the family's senior servant Chou Chung in manacles and force him to help them track down Chou I.

Strange as it may seem,

he had gone to his aunt's home outside the city to seek refuge and was apprehended there, tied up with a length of rope, and brought back to face the music. Chou Hsüan understood what had happened but was afraid that if the scandal leaked out it might prevent Chou Chin-ko from succeeding to his father's hereditary position. He therefore had Chou I taken to the front reception hall where:

Without permitting any further explanation,

he had him beaten forty strokes with the heavy bamboo, which caused him to die on the spot.

Chou Hsüan then entrusted Chou Chin-ko to the care of Sun Erh-niang and undertook to make the funeral arrangements for Ch'un-mei, having her coffin taken to her husband's ancestral graveyard and buried in the same tomb with the commander-general. He also dismissed the two wet nurses, along with the two concubines Hai-t'ang and Yüeh-kuei, so they could seek employment elsewhere and find husbands for themselves. This left only Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh, who refused to leave, though he urged them to do so.

One day, unexpectedly, the infantry and cavalry forces of the Great Chin regime succeeded in capturing the Eastern Capital of Pien-liang and took the retired Emperor Hui-tsung and his son Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity in the northern regions. As a result:

The Central Plain lacked a ruler,³⁸
The four quarters were disrupted,
Military weapons were everywhere,
The masses felt driven to flight.³⁹
The common people faced the calamity of disruption;⁴⁰
The populace was forced to suffer in dire straits.⁴¹

A large force of barbarian troops had already slaughtered its way across the borders of Shantung province with the result that among the people:

Husbands fled and wives scattered,
Specters cried and spirits howled.⁴²

Even fathers and sons were no longer able to care for each other. Ko Ts'ui-p'ing was taken back by her mother's family, while:

Everyone else fled for their lives.⁴³
Only Han Ai-chieh was left:
Without a place to seek protection.

She had no alternative but to pack her luggage, dress herself in plain traveling clothes, leave Ch'ing-ho district, and set out for Lin-ch'ing in order to find her parents. But when she arrived in Lin-ch'ing, she found that the Hsieh Family Tavern had been closed and its owner had fled.

Unexpectedly, she ran into Ch'en the Third, who said to her, "Last year, your parents went to Chiang-nan with Magnate Ho to live with him at his home in Hu-chou."

Han Ai-chieh, consequently, set out to seek her parents there, supporting herself along the way by singing songs and accompanying herself on the moon guitar.

When hungry she ate, when thirsty she drank;
Stopping by night and traveling by day;
As flustered as a dog who has
lost his way home;
As flurried as a fish who has escaped the net.

Her bound feet with their upturned toes were small, and she was beset by:

A myriad pains and a thousand hardships.⁴⁴

After traveling for a few days, she reached the area around Hsü-chou. It was getting late, and she was passing through a solitary village when she came upon an old lady in her seventies.

Her hairdo resembled two strips of snow,
Her chignon was tied into a bag of silk, and she was busy at the stove, pounding rice and preparing a meal.

Han Ai-chieh went up and bowed to her, saying, "I am a native of Ch'ing-ho district. On account of the current disruption, I am heading to Chiang-nan to seek my parents. I did not realize that it was this late and wonder if you might let me stay overnight at your place. I will leave first thing in the morning and will be sure to pay you for it."

The old lady contemplated the young woman and thought to herself, "She does not look like the maidservant of an impoverished household.

Her movements are cultivated;
Her demeanor is not ordinary."⁴⁵

Behold:

Her raven locks have not been dressed;⁴⁶
She is thinking only of how well-off
she used to be.
Her brows are knit like distant peaks;
She recalls the wealth and distinction of former years.
During the autumn night the moon is hidden by misty clouds;
The peony blossoms have been buried beneath layers of dirt.⁴⁷

"If you are seeking a place to spend the night," the old lady said, "please have a seat on the k'ang while I finish cooking this meal. There is a crew of men engaged in dredging the riverbed who are coming to eat it."

The old lady was tending a stove on top of the k'ang, and in no time at all she produced a large kettle's worth of dried rice mixed with beans and other grains. She also chopped up two large platters of fresh vegetables and flavored them with a pinch of salt. What should appear at this point but a crew of men whose hair was disheveled, whose legs were bare, who wore breechcloths around their waists, and whose feet were caked with mud.

Putting down their spades and shovels, they asked, "Old lady, is our food ready or not?"

"Help yourselves, and eat your fill," the old lady responded.

Thereupon, they proceeded to help themselves to the food and then went their separate ways to consume it.

As they were eating, one of them, who looked thirty-three or thirty-four years old and had a dark complexion and graying hair, asked the old lady, "Who is that person sitting on the k'ang?"

"This woman," the old lady said, "is a native of Ch'ing-ho district who is on her way to Chiang-nan to look for her parents. Since it is already late in the day, she has asked to spend the night here."

The man in question then asked her, "Lady, what is your name?"

"My surname is Han," Ai-chieh replied, "and my father is named Han Tao-kuo."

The man then came forward and took her by the hand, saying, "Sister, are you not my niece, Han Ai-chieh?"

"You look rather like my uncle, Han the Second," exclaimed Han Ai-chieh.

The two of them then:

Embraced each other by the neck and wept.

He then went on to ask, "Where are your father and mother? I thought you were all in the Eastern Capital. How do you happen to be here?"

Han Ai-chieh then proceeded from the beginning to tell him in detail what had happened and concluded by saying, "Because I had married into Commandant Chou Hsiu's household, after the death of my husband I have maintained my chaste widowhood up until now. On learning that my parents accompanied Magnate Ho to his home in Hu-chou, I determined to go in search of them. Because of the current disruption, there was no one available to go with me, and I have chosen to set out alone, supporting myself on the way by singing songs. I could hardly have anticipated that I would encounter my uncle here."

"Ever since your parents moved to the Eastern Capital," said Han the Second, "I have lacked any reliable means of livelihood. Being forced to sell my house, I have ended up working as a common laborer here, engaged in dredging the riverbed in order to earn a bowl of rice for myself. Under the circumstances, I might as well join you in going to Hu-chou in search of your parents."

"Should my uncle decide to go with me," said Han Ai-chieh, "that would certainly be wonderful."

He then filled a bowl with rice and gave it to Han Ai-chieh to eat. Han Ai-chieh sampled a mouthful but found it so coarse that she could hardly swallow it and gave up after consuming only half a bowl. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.

At dawn the next day, the crew of workers departed to continue their job, but Han the Second, after paying the rent he owed to the old lady, took Han Ai-chieh with him and went out the door, as they set out on their journey together.

Han Ai-chieh was delicate by nature, and her bound feet with their upturned toes were small. She had an assortment of valuables such as hairpins and combs with her, which she sold off piecemeal in order to support them along the way. On reaching Huai-an, they boarded a boat and continued to wend their way toward Hu-chou in Chiang-nan. After some days, they found their way to Magnate Ho's home in Hu-chou and were reunited with Han Ai-chieh's parents.

Han Ai-chieh Encounters Han the Second on the Road

Who could have anticipated that Magnate Ho had already died. He had no wives or concubines in his home other than Wang Liu-erh and left behind merely a daughter who was five years old, and an estate consisting of several acres of paddy fields. In less than a year, Han Tao-kuo also died, and since Wang Liu-erh had already had an affair with Han the Second, she took her brother-in-law as her mate, and they supported themselves by farming on Magnate Ho's property.

There were numerous affluent young men in Hu-chou who noticed how clever and good-looking Han Ai-chieh appeared to be and sought to marry her. Han the Second also urged her repeatedly to take a husband, but Han Ai-chieh deliberately cut off her hair, defaced her appearance, and became a Buddhist nun, swearing never to marry anyone again. Two years later, at the age of thirty-one, she came down with an illness and died. Truly:

Before her chaste bones have been buried under three feet of soil;
Her resentful soul first finds its way to
the nine-layered heavens.

Thus it was that Han the Second and Wang Liu-erh ended up as man and wife and inherited Magnate Ho's estate and landed property. But no more of this.

To resume our story, when the invading infantry and cavalry of the Great Chin regime succeeded in seizing Tung-ch'ang prefecture and threatened to make their way to Ch'ing-ho district, behold:

The officials endeavor to flee;

The city gates are shut by day.⁴⁸
The masses are moved to flight;
Fathers and sons are separated.

Behold:

Smoke arises in all four quarters;
The sun is hidden by yellow sand.
Rapacious boars and long serpents,⁴⁹
Attempt to swallow each other up.⁵⁰
Dragons contend and tigers battle,⁵¹
Each contending for its dominance.
Black standards and crimson flags,
Overspread the suburban landscape.
Men shriek aloud and women weep,⁵²
A myriad homes are terror-struck.
Foreign troops and alien generals,
Are like gathering ants or swarming bees;⁵³
Their short swords and long spears,⁵⁴
Resemble thick forests and dense bamboos.⁵⁵
In place after place, dead bodies and human bones lie scattered higgledy-piggledy;
In pile after pile, split blades and broken swords are discarded in jumbled heaps.⁵⁶
Every parent holds a son or embraces a daughter;
Every home closes its gates and locks its doors.⁵⁷
Nine out of ten houses have been vacated,⁵⁸
No longer resembling rural or urban communities.
The deer flee and the squirrels scatter;
Leaving no trace of ritual, music, or formality.

Truly, it is a case of:

The palace ladies weep into their red sleeves;
The royal sons flee in their civilian disguise.⁵⁹

At this juncture, when Wu Yüeh-niang in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that the barbarian troops were approaching and saw that family after family had locked the gates to their houses and fled in disorder, she felt compelled to do likewise and got together some gold, pearls, and other valuables to take with her. At that time, her elder brother Wu K'ai had already died, so she set out accompanied only by Wu the Second, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and her ten-year-old son Hsiao-ko.⁶⁰ After seeing that both the front and rear doors to the residence were securely locked, they headed for Chi-nan prefecture to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou. By so doing, she hoped, on the one hand, to escape the invading army, and, on the other hand, to formalize Hsiao-ko's betrothal to Yün Li-shou's daughter.

Along the way:

Every individual they met was feeling panicked;
Each and every one of them in a state of shock.

The unfortunate Wu Yüeh-niang, dressed in her traveling clothes, along with Wu the Second and the other males and females, five of them in all, fell in with the crowds of other fleeing refugees, managed to squeeze their way through the city gate, and made their way into the suburbs. As they proceeded on their way, they arrived at a crossroads in the open countryside where they encountered a Buddhist priest whose body was clad in a purplish-brown cassock, who held a metal staff with nine rings attached to it in his hand, who wore straw sandals on his feet, and over whose shoulder he carried a calico bag containing his sacred texts.

Stepping forward in large strides, he proceeded to press his palms together in front of his chest and bow to her in the Buddhist fashion, saying in a loud voice as he did so, "Lady Wu, where are you going? Pray hand my disciple over to me."

This startled Yüeh-niang so that she:

Turned pale with consternation, and addressed him saying, "Master, what disciple is it that you are asking for?"

"Lady," the monk replied, "you had better not pretend to be:

Still asleep in dreamland.

You must remember how, ten years ago, on the eastern spur of Mount T'ai, you were being pursued by Yin T'ien-hsi and sought refuge for the night in my mountain cave. I am that same Ch'an Master Snow Cave, whose religious name is P'u-ching. You promised then to let me have your son as a disciple, so why have you not turned him over to me?"

"Master," interjected Wu the Second, "you are a Buddhist monk. How can you be so:

Unamenable to reason?⁶¹

In this year of political upheaval we are fleeing for our lives. It is her hope that in the future this only child of hers will be able to carry on the ancestral sacrifices. How could she bear to relinquish him to you so he could abandon lay life and become a monk?"

"Are you really refusing to turn him over to me?" the monk asked.

"Master," said Wu the Second, "don't talk such nonsense, or hinder us from making our escape. I fear that the barbarian army may show up at any moment.

Who knows in the morning what evening may bring."⁶²

"Since you refuse to turn my disciple over to me," said the monk, "it is already late in the day, and you cannot proceed any further. The barbarians have not yet come this far. You might as well come with me to stay overnight at this temple, before leaving first thing in the morning."

"Master," inquired Wu Yüeh-niang, "what temple is that?"

The monk merely pointed with his finger and said, "the one up there by the side of the road."

As the monk led the way forward, they found themselves at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, which Wu Yüeh-niang recognized as the one that she had visited once before in the past. By the time they arrived there, the abbot and more than half of the resident monks had already fled, leaving behind only a handful of Ch'an monks who were sitting in the lotus position in the meditation hall in the rear, where a large glazed censer was burning incense before an effigy of the Buddha. At the time, the sun was already sinking behind the hills. Behold:

The teeming crossroads are all ablaze with
the light of burning lanterns;
The Temple of the Nine Stars is enhanced by fragrant mist and tolling bells.
The wheel of the bright moon is suspended underneath the blue heavens;
A handful of scattered stars serves to light up the azure firmament.
Within the camps of the Six Imperial Armies,
The wailing of painted bugles frequently resounds;
On the upper floors of the five drum towers,
Water drips in the bronze tanks of the clepsydras.
On all four sides the evening fog,
Densely encompasses the dancing pavilions and singing platforms;
In the three markets a cloak of mist,
Faintly enshrouds the green gauze windows
and vermilion gates.
Pair by pair, the strolling beauties
return to their boudoirs;
One by one, the young scholars close the blinds in their studies.⁶³

That evening, Wu Yüeh-niang, along with Wu the Second, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and Hsiao-ko, five males and females in all, spent the night in the abbot's quarters at the temple. Some of the junior monks recognized her and provided Yüeh-niang and the others with something to eat. Meanwhile, Ch'an Master P'u-ching assumed the lotus position on a platform in the meditation hall, where he kept time by beating on a wooden fish as he recited the sutras. Yüeh-niang, along with Hsiao-ko and Hsiao-yü, slept on the bed, while Wu the Second and Tai-an slept together on the floor. As people who had been suffering from alarm and fatigue, they fell fast asleep.

The only one among them who failed to sleep soundly was Hsiao-yü, who got up in the abbot's quarters and watched through a crack in the door as P'u-ching recited the sutras.

As the third watch of the night gradually approached, behold:

The metallic autumn wind grew desolate;
The slanting moon appeared more somber.
The bustle of human activity subsided;⁶⁴
The myriad pipes of Heaven were silent.

On looking at the large incense-burning censer in front of the effigy of Buddha, she saw that it was:
Half alight but not extinguished.

When Ch'an Master P'u-ching realized that:

The empire was in a state of disorder,
The population was suffering distress,

and that:

The corpses of those killed in battle,
Appeared to be incalculable in number;

He exerted his compassionate feelings,
To dispense his boundless benevolence.
Addressing himself reverently to the Buddha, he recited a spell for dispelling enmity, intended to:
Rescue the incarcerated souls,⁶⁵
Free them from old resentments,
Clear impediments in their way,
So they could be reincarnated,
Without any remaining residues.

Thereupon, he recited the spell for dispelling enmity more than a hundred times.

Shortly thereafter:

A cold breeze blew forlornly,
A chilly wind began to sough,⁶⁶ and several tens of ghosts appeared, some of them:
With scorched heads and singed scalps,
Disheveled hair and mud-stained faces.

Others:

With ruptured fingers and broken arms,
Gutted stomachs and gouged out hearts.

And still others:

Without heads and with crippled limbs;

Or with:

Locked cangues hanging on their necks.

They had come to be enlightened by the Ch'an Master's recitation of the spell and:

Lined up neatly to either side of him.⁶⁷

The Ch'an Master then addressed them, saying:

"You group of living individuals,
Seek to repay enmity with enmity,⁶⁸
Unwilling to seek reconciliation.
Whenever can this come to an end?

You must listen carefully to what I say, if you wish to pursue your separate paths to reincarnation. There is a gatha that says:

I urge you not to harbor enmity;
Acute enmity is hard to resolve.
Enmity can arise in one any day,
But cannot be resolved for ages.
If one repays enmity with grace,
It is to pour hot water on snow.
If you requite hatred with hate,
It is a wolf meeting a scorpion.
I sense those who harbor enmity,
Permit enmity to devastate them.⁶⁹
Those who sense this and repent,
Are able to grasp their natures,
Understand their original minds,⁷⁰
And rid themselves of animosity.
The potency of this sacred text,
Redeems one from his evil karma.
Each of you may be reincarnated,
If you harbor no further enmity.
The head is altered and the face replaced, as the wheel of transmigration turns;
It is useless to try to grasp what awaits you in the predestined life to come."⁷¹

At this juncture, the crowd of ghosts thanked him and then disappeared. Hsiao-yü had been surreptitiously scrutinizing them but did not recognize anyone.

In a little while, another man appeared, who was more than six feet in stature.

His appearance was stately,⁷²

He was fully clad in armor, and his breast had been pierced by an arrow.

"I am Commander-general Chou Hsiu," he said. "In the course of contending with an enemy general, I died on the field of battle. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the second son of Shen Ching, with the name Shen Shou-shan."

Before he had even finished speaking, another person appeared, dressed in impressively immaculate clothing, who said, "I am the wealthy gentleman from Ch'ing-ho district, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who died after suffering a leakage of blood in my urine. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the second son of the wealthy gentleman Shen T'ung, with the name Shen Yüeh."

Hsiao-Yü recognized him to be her former master and was too scared to utter a word.

After this, another person appeared, carrying his head in his hands, while his whole body was covered with blood, and said, "I am Ch'en Ching-chi, who was murdered by Chang Sheng. Thanks to the Master's deliverance and the power of the scriptures, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a son of the Wang family."

After this, a woman appeared who was also carrying her head in her hands, while her chest was covered with blood, and said, "I am the wife of Wu Chih, and concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, P'an Chin-lien, who had the bad luck to be slain by my enemy Wu Sung. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn in the Eastern Capital as a daughter of the Li family."

After this, another man appeared who was dwarflike in stature and whose countenance was purplish and said, "I am Wu Chih who died as a result of Dame Wang's persuading P'an Chin-lien to poison me. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in Hsü-chou as a son of the peasant family named Fan."

After this, another woman appeared whose face was thin and sallow, while her body was dripping blood, and said, "I am Li P'ing-erh, the wife of Hua Tzu-hsü and concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who died from a case of acute metrorrhagia. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the daughter of Commander Yüan."

After this, another man appeared, who said, "I am Hua Tzu-hsü, who suffered the misfortune of being exasperated to death by my wife. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a son in Battalion Commander Cheng's family."

After this, another woman appeared with her footbindings wrapped around her neck, who said, "I am the wife of Hsi-men Ch'ing's servant Lai-wang, Sung Hui-lien, who:

Hanged herself until dead.

Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a daughter in the Chu family."

After this, another woman appeared, who had:

A sallow face and emaciated flesh,⁷³ and said, "I am the wife of Commander-general Chou Hsiu, P'ang Ch'un-mei, who perished from sexual exhaustion. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a daughter in the K'ung family."

After this, another man appeared:

Who was stark naked with disheveled hair,⁷⁴

Whose entire body was covered with weals, and identified himself, saying, "I am Chang Sheng, who was beaten to death. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn as a son in the impoverished Kao family attached to the Ta-hsing guard in the Eastern Capital."

After this, another woman appeared, with a rope around her neck, and said, "I am Sun Hsüeh-o, the former concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who unhappily:

Hanged myself until dead.

Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated as a daughter in the family of the impoverished Yao family outside the Eastern Capital."

After this, another young woman appeared with her footbindings wrapped around her neck, and said, "I am Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter and Ch'en Ching-chi's wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, who also unhappily:

Hanged myself until dead.

Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated as a daughter of Chung Kuei, a policeman who resides outside the wall of the Eastern Capital."

After this, another young man appeared and identified himself with the words, "I am Chou I, who was also beaten to death. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn as a son in the Kao family that resides outside the wall of the Eastern Capital and am named Kao Liu-chu."

When they had done speaking, they all suddenly disappeared.

Hsiao-yü was so astonished by this that she shivered in awe and thought to herself, "So this monk is capable of communicating with the ghosts of the departed."

She wanted to go back to bed and tell Yüeh-niang about it, but who could have anticipated that Yüeh-niang was fast asleep, and her numinous soul's true being dreamt that, together with Wu the Second and the others, she was still on her way to Chi-nan prefecture, with the string of a hundred imported pearls, and a gem-studded chatelaine in hand, in order to seek refuge from the invading army with Yün Li-shou, and finalize the betrothal of Hsiao-ko to his daughter.

Eating when hungry, drinking when thirsty;⁷⁵

Stopping by night and traveling by day;

they arrived in Chi-nan prefecture, where she asked an elderly man where Assistant Regional Commander Yün Li-shou was stationed.

The elderly man pointed the way out to them, saying, "He is stationed at a place, some two li from here, called the Ling-pi Stockade, which faces the river on one side and the mountains on the other. This Ling-pi Stockade is located on top of the city wall, and there are a thousand troops and horses stationed there. Assistant Regional Commander Yün Li-shou is the stockade commander there."

When Wu Yüeh-niang and her companions, five persons in all, arrived at the gate of the stockade, and Yün Li-shou learned that she had come to consummate the betrothal of their children:

He greeted her like an old acquaintance,⁷⁶ as they exchanged the customary amenities. It so happened that his wife had recently died, so he asked a neighbor called Old Mrs. Wang to keep Yüeh-niang company, provided her with a lavish feast of wine and food in the rear hall of the stockade, and saw that Wu the Second and Tai-an were entertained in another place.

In the course of their conversation, Yüeh-niang mentioned her need to flee from the invading army, and her desire to consummate the betrothal of their children. She also brought out the string of a hundred imported pearls and the gem-studded chatelaine and presented them to him as a provisional betrothal gift. Yün Li-shou accepted them but did not have anything further to say about the betrothal.

That evening, he also arranged for Old Mrs. Wang to spend the night with Yüeh-niang, and to feel her out in order to ascertain her sentiments toward himself.

In the course of doing so, she said to Yüeh-niang, "Although Yün Li-shou is a military official, he is:

A book-reading gentleman;⁷⁷

and ever since you and his wife betrothed your children to each other by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of your blouses, you have been on his mind. Unexpectedly, his wife died, and he has been living as a widower ever since. At present, he is serving as the commander of this mountainous stockade. Although his position is not high:

When mounted he commands the troops;

When dismounted he rules the people;⁷⁸ and their life and death are in his hands. If you see fit not to reject him, he would like to:

Unite with you in connubial bliss,⁷⁹

That you may share your mutual joy.⁸⁰

Your son would also benefit from such a marriage alliance. Once peace has been restored, it would not be too late to return home together."

When Yüeh-niang heard this proposition, she:

Turned pale with consternation,

and was speechless for some time.

Old Mrs. Wang reported what she had said to Yün Li-shou, and the next evening he prepared wine in the rear hall and invited Yüeh-niang to have a drink with him there. Yüeh-niang thought that it was only to formalize Hsiao-ko's betrothal to his daughter and lost no time in joining him there, where they sat down together.

Yün Li-shou then said to her, "Sister-in-law, you may not be aware of it, but although I am only in charge of this mountainous stockade here, I command a considerable body of both infantry and cavalry and possess quantities of money and silk, fancy clothing, gold and silver, and other valuables. The only thing I lack is a wife to take charge of my household. For some time I have thought of you:

Like a thirsty person longing for drink;

Like a parched person longing for coolness.

I could hardly have anticipated that you would show up here today in order to formalize the betrothal of your son to my daughter.

Heaven has granted this affinity,

That we may share our mutual joy.

If we end up here as man and wife:

We can enjoy a lifetime of bliss.⁸¹

There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme."

When Yüeh-niang heard this proposal she was enraged and cursed at Yün Li-shou, saying, "Who could have known that you are nothing but:

The skeleton of a dog wrapped in human skin.

My late husband did not treat you with disrespect. How can you now come out with such:

Language fit only for a dog or a horse?"

Yün Li-shou only laughed at this and then, stepping forward to embrace Yüeh-niang, said to her, "Lady, you were residing in a home of your own. What did you come to my place here for? It has always been true that:

It is easier to do business when the customer comes to your door.⁸²

I don't know why it is, but I no sooner set eyes on you than you captivated by soul. There is no alternative. For better or for worse, you must marry me."

So saying, he brought over some wine to share with Yüeh-niang.

"Go up front and call in my younger brother," said Yüeh-niang. "There is something I need to say to him."

Yün Li-shou laughed at this and said, "Your younger brother and your servant Tai-an have already been killed by me."

He then said to his attendants, "Bring those things here to show to the lady."

In no time at all, by the light of the lamp, they brought in the two heads of Wu the Second and Tai-an, dripping with blood. This so perturbed Yüeh-niang that:

Her complexion turned the color of dirt, and she:

Fell to the floor in tears.

Yün Li-shou responded by:

Stepping forward and lifting her up,⁸³
saying as he did so, "Lady:

There is no need for you to be upset.⁸⁴
Since your brother is already dead, you can become my wife. I am a regional commander, so such a marriage:
Would not dishonor you in any way."⁸⁵

Yüeh-niang thought to herself, "Since this lousy character has already slain my brother and my servant, if I don't go along with him, I am likely to forfeit my life as well."

Thereupon, she pretended that:

Her anger had changed to joy, and said, "You will have to agree to my conditions before I will consent to be your wife."

Yün Li-shou responded, "No matter what your conditions may be, I will agree to them."

"If you first formalize my son's marriage," said Yüeh-niang, "I will then agree to become your wife."

"That's no problem," responded Yün Li-shou.

So saying, he proceeded to call his daughter out and pushed her over to Hsiao-ko so they could:

Share a loving cup,
Tie a nuptial knot,⁸⁶

and become man and wife. Only after that did he pull Yüeh-niang over to him and propose to engage in the game of clouds and rain together; but Yüeh-niang resisted him and refused to comply.

Yün Li-shou was enraged at this and cursed her, saying, "You worthless woman! You tricked me into consummating the marriage of my daughter to your son, and now presume that I would not dare to kill your son."

So saying, he went to the head of the bed, where he:

Picked up a sword and brought it down in a sweep,
Scattering blood for a distance of several paces.

Truly:

When the three feet of sharp blade struck the neck,
The flood of fresh blood inundated everything around.

When Yüeh-niang saw that he had hacked Hsiao-ko to death, she couldn't help uttering a loud cry, which caused her to:

Wake up with a jerk, revealing it all to be but:

A dream of the Southern Branch.

She was so perturbed by this that:

Her whole body was covered with sweat,
And her entire anatomy oozed moisture,

as she cried out, "How strange! How strange!"

"Mistress," asked Hsiao-yü, who was lying at her side, "what are you crying about?"

"Just now, I had an inauspicious dream," Yüeh-niang responded and then went on to tell her all about it.

"I was unable to sleep a little while ago," said Hsiao-yü, "and got up to go and spy surreptitiously on what that monk was doing through a crack in the door. It turns out that he has been communicating with ghosts the whole night long. Just now, my late master, the Fifth Lady, the Sixth Lady, Brother-in-law Ch'en, the commandant Chou Hsiu, Sun Hsüeh-o, Lai-wang's wife Sung Hui-lien, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all came to speak to him and then went their separate ways."

"Many of them are buried in the graveyard behind this temple," said Yüeh-niang. "It is not surprising that:

The stranded souls of the unjustly dead, should manifest themselves during the quiet of the night."

Mistress and servant were unable to go back to sleep, and before they knew it, it was the fifth watch, and the cocks crowed. Wu Yüeh-niang hastily got up, washed her face, and went into the meditation hall in order to pay obeisance to the Buddha and burn incense.

Whom should she encounter there but Master P'u-ching, who was sitting on his meditation platform and addressed her in a loud voice, saying, "Lady Wu, have you achieved enlightenment now?"⁸⁷

Yüeh-niang then knelt down and made him an obeisance, saying, "Permit me to inform your reverence that your disciple, née Wu, with her:

Fleshly eyes and mortal body,⁸⁸ did not recognize you to be the incarnation of an ancient Buddha. But thanks to the dream from which I have just awakened, I am now enlightened."

"Since you have already achieved enlightenment," the Master responded, "there is no need for you to continue on this journey. Should you do so, things will turn out the way they did in your dream, and all five of you will lose your lives. The fact that you and your son encountered me is something that was:

Both ordained and fated to happen to you,⁸⁹

because in days past you planted the seeds of your good fortune. Were that not so, it would have been difficult for you to avoid:

The splitting up of your flesh and blood.⁹⁰

Initially, your deceased husband Hsi-men Ch'ing committed evil deeds and was anything but virtuous. This son of yours was reborn into your family in order to dissipate your wealth and destroy your property and would have ended up with:

His body and his head in different places.⁹¹

I will now undertake to lead him to salvation as my disciple. As the saying goes:

Should a single son leave the home to be ordained,

Nine generations of one's ancestors will be saved.⁹²

This will also have the benefit for your late husband of:

Compensating for his evil karma, so that he too may achieve salvation. If you don't believe me, follow me, and I will allow you to see for yourself."

Thereupon, he strode into the abbot's quarters, where they could see that Hsiao-ko was still asleep on the bed. The Master raised the staff in his hand and touched him on the head with it, while telling Yüeh-niang and the others to take a look. All of a sudden, he turned over, and they could see that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing:

With a heavy cangue around his neck,⁹³

And iron chains enclosing his waist.⁹⁴

The Master then touched him again with his staff, and just as before, he appeared to be Hsiao-ko asleep on the bed. When Yüeh-niang saw this, without knowing it, she began to weep out loud, concluding that Hsiao-ko was a reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing.

Before long, Hsiao-ko woke up, and Yüeh-niang said to him, "You must now follow the Master to leave home, take the tonsure, and be anointed as a priest before the Buddha."

In a piteous state, Yüeh-niang embraced him and wept bitterly, feeling that she had raised him in vain in the expectation that upon reaching the age of fifteen he would be able to inherit and perpetuate the ancestral line; and never having anticipated that on meeting this Ch'an Master he would be spirited away into a celibate life. Wu the Second, Hsiao-yü, and Tai-an were also overcome with grief.

Thereupon, Master P'u-ching took charge of Hsiao-ko, conferred the religious name of Ming-wu upon him, and bade farewell to Yüeh-niang; saying to her on the way out, "You do not need to proceed any further. Before long, the barbarian army will withdraw; the territory will be split between two separate dynasties; one to the south and one to the north; and the Central Plain will have a ruler of its own. In no more than ten days:

Ch'an Master P'u-ching Spirits Away Hsi-men Hsiao-ko

The armed troops will be withdrawn;
 And the territory will be pacified.
 You can thus return to your home and:
 Spend your days with peace of mind."⁹⁵

"Master," Yüeh-niang responded, "once you have accomplished my son's salvation:
 On what day of what year, will mother and son ever be able to see each other again?"
 So saying, she instinctively took hold of Hsiao-ko and began to weep out loud.
 "Lady," said the Master, "stop your crying. Another Master is arriving over there."
 This fooled them all into swiveling their necks to look in the direction to which he pointed, whereupon, along with Hsiao-ko, he:
 Transformed himself into a gust of clear breeze,⁹⁶
 and disappeared from sight. Truly:
 Having thrice descended to the mundane world where he was not recognized;
 All of a sudden he flew away over the summit of Mount T'ai's Eastern Peak.

We will say no more here about how Master P'u-ching spirited Hsiao-ko away.

To resume our story, after this event Wu Yüeh-niang, Wu the Second, and the others continued to stay at the Temple of Eternal Felicity. In less than ten days time, sure enough, the Great Chin regime set up Chang Pang-ch'ang as a puppet emperor in the Eastern Capital, with a hierarchy of civil and military officials. The two Sung dynasty emperors, Hui-tsung and Ch'in-tsung, were subsequently taken to the north in captivity. The Prince of K'ang:

Escaped across the river on a clay horse,⁹⁷ and assumed the throne in Chien-k'ang. This was Emperor Kao-tsung of the Southern Sung dynasty, who appointed Tsung Tse as general-in-chief and succeeded in retaking parts of Shantung and Hopei from the Chin invaders. The country was thus split into two regimes, the Chin dynasty in the north and the Southern Sung dynasty in the south. As a result:

The realm under Heaven was once again at peace,⁹⁸ and

The people were able to resume their vocations.

When Wu Yüeh-niang returned home and opened the gate to her residence, she found that nothing of the family possessions or the household furnishings had been lost. Later on, she changed Tai-an's name to Hsi-men An and allowed him to inherit what was left of the family property. Henceforth, people addressed him as the Honorable Young Hsi-men, and he supported Yüeh-niang during her old age. She lived on to the age of sixty-nine before dying a natural death, which was the reward she had earned by doing good deeds and reciting the scriptures during her lifetime. There is a poem that testifies to this:

An idle glance at this transmitted text leaves
one with confused feelings;
Who fully understands the extent to which the Way of Heaven is cyclical?⁹⁹ Hsi-men Ch'ing's wealth and corruption made it hard to continue his line; Ch'en Ching-chi's licentious cavorting ensured his eventual annihilation.
The goodness of Meng Yü-lou and Wu Yüeh-niang vouchsafed them long lives;
The wantonness of Li P'ing-erh and Ch'un-mei led to their early deaths.
It is not strange that P'an Chin-lien should meet with an awful fate;
And her ill repute last for a thousand years,¹⁰⁰ perpetuated in fiction.

CHIN P'ING MEI
